

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ## PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, May 23, 1861.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2° Boundaries of Burghs Extension (Scotland) Act Amendment.
3° Landed Property Improvement &c. (Ireland).

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL stated that, in consequence of the count-out on Friday last, it was necessary that he should move that the House immediately resolve itself into a Committee of Supply.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE DOCKYARDS.—RESOLUTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Control and Management of Her Majesty's Naval Yards; and to move—

"That it is expedient that such reforms should be made in the control and management of the Naval Yards as will tend to promote greater efficiency, and, consequently, to ensure greater economy in those establishments."

The Commission to whose Report he desired to draw the attention of the House was appointed to inquire into the state of our naval yards; it was composed of very able men; it sat for a considerable period; and it examined no fewer than seventy-two witnesses, to whom 11,299 questions were put. He ventured to assert that there was not one of the witnesses who did not admit that the management of our dockyards was inefficient; the evidence accumulated proofs of everything that was stated in the Report of the Commissioners. It appeared that there was no harmony of action between the leading officers of the dockyards. The Controller of the Navy, who was responsible for the management, had no control over the Storekeeper; in fact, between these two officers there was scarcely any communication which could lead to accurate proceedings. The accounts, though minute, were mystified and irregular, and, as stated by some of the principal witnesses, they were of little or no value for any practical purpose. To show the House how true this was, and how long the system described had existed, he would quote some of the evidence given before the Commission; among others that given by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham). The right hon. Baronet stated to that Commission that so little control was there over the appropriation of the public money that, while he was First Lord of the Admiralty, or before he was First Lord, a large building was erected, for which no Vote was given by the House, and of which, in point of fact, the House was not even informed. The right hon. Baronet stated, moreover, that this state of things still continued, and that there was no check against such an enormity recurring. There was similar evidence given by the Accountant General of the Navy, Sir Richard Bromley, that, though the House of Commons had details of small sums—of £100, £200, £2,000, and so on—they were not aware that the Accountant General had no means of knowing whether a ship cost £120,000 or £220,000. This was not the case in any mercantile firm. A mercantile firm would be ruined if its accounts were kept in that way. There was also this striking and startling fact in the evidence of the late Controller of the Navy (Sir Baldwin Walker), that at various times after his programme had been approved by the Board of Admiralty and he had sent orders to the dockyard to commence a certain vessel then for the first time. He discovered that the materials for the vessel he had ordered were not in store; and he stated further, that on several occasions, for want of seasoned timber, works were stopped, and that on other occasions unsound timber had been used in the construction of ships of war. Now, this was a state of things deeply to be regretted and deplored. He did not know what answer his noble Friend opposite (Lord Clarence Paget) would give to the Motion before the House. He might say that the evidence did not bear out the recommendations of the Commissioners, or he might state that a Committee was now sitting upstairs on the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, or he might assert that it was the intention of the Government to carry out many of the recommendations of the Commissioners. He only hoped he might hear this latter statement from his noble Friend opposite; but, with regard to the examination by the Committee upstairs into the Board of Admiralty, this had not much to do with the question now before the House. If the noble Lord should say there was not sufficient evidence to support the recommendation of the Commissioners, on that point he joined issue with the noble Lord. He should be very reluctant to bring forward a blue book containing 11,229 questions, or to quote much from it; but there were a few answers that he should like to read to the House. Not many Members had time to read the whole of the evidence and the Report. Probably the noble Secretary of the Admiralty had not been able to examine it minutely. But it was a question of such importance to the country, to the taxpayers, and to the House of Commons, that it ought to be thoroughly sifted and examined; and he hoped he should obtain the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, while he brought forward some of the recommendations of the Commission. One change recommended by his noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty himself was that there should be another Lord of the Admiralty specially charged with dockyard management. In that he (Sir Frederic Smith) agreed; and he regretted that this was not recommended by the Commissioners, for it would solve one of the great difficulties at present existing, by putting the Controller of the Navy in perfect harmony with the Storekeeper. It was recommended by the Commissioners that the Storekeeper General should be placed under the Controller. Probably his noble Friend would tell him that the Controller would be sorry to have that responsibility placed upon him. He certainly had a great deal to do at present; but he (Sir Frederic Smith) thought the point of so much importance that he doubted if the House would begrudge one or even two additional Lords if such an advantage could be attained. What the House wanted, and what the country wanted, was that their money should be well spent, that they should know how it was spent, and that they should get their money's worth for their money. But this was not the case at present. For instance, take the manner in which contracts were made:—it was done in a very slovenly manner. For instance, let us look at the case of the Warrior. The Warrior was a vessel of an entirely new construction. The drawings were prepared by the Surveyor of the Navy, and by him sent out to certain builders calling upon them for tenders. He was about to propose that his noble Friend opposite should institute a system by which there should be an estimate of all the great ships we construct. He trusted that his noble Friend would not say it was not possible to draw out these estimates, because if he did he (Sir Frederic Smith) would join issue with him on that point also. Well, then, if it were possible to prepare such estimates, we ought to have them. If it should be said that the preparation would occupy some time, then he said the course taken with regard to the Warrior was most improper. The ship was most difficult of construction; everything about the vessel was quite new; the iron was of unusual dimensions; the scantlings were the largest ever known—in fact, the whole of the work was quite of a new character. Well, how long did the House suppose the builders were allowed to make up their minds as to the price they would charge for different portions of the work? A month? No. A week? Not a week. Four clear days only was the time allowed for all their calculations. One was not, then, astonished to find that alteration after alteration was made in the Warrior with vastly increased cost as the consequence; all because sufficient time was not allowed at first. In fact, it was impossible for any set of men to make in four or five days, or, in fact, in four or five weeks, an accurate tender for such works as those of the Warrior. Some calculations must have been made also by the Admiralty; else how could an opinion be formed by the Controller with regard to the prices of the tenders? The lowest tender was not the one accepted. And why was that? Because the builders offering the lowest tender required sixteen or eighteen months for the completion of the vessel; whereas the tender which was accepted was for the work to be completed in eleven months. The lowest tender was thrown aside and another accepted at 50s. a ton higher, because the contractor undertook the ship in eleven months, whereas the contractor whose tender was the lowest required eighteen months. But was the Warrior built in eleven months? No, nor in twenty-four. In fact, it must have been evident on the slightest consideration that it could not be done, the Warrior being the first of the kind, and a pattern of her class. Another blunder was in not allowing the contractor to get his iron beams where he liked, but insisting on his taking them of the Butterley Company.

Then take the case of the gunboats. Of the 276 gunboats mentioned in the book now in the hands of hon. Members only 27 were built which did not require alterations. And these alterations, of course, involved increased cost, and the country was the loser. The most startling paragraph in the Report was this:—"We regret to state that in our opinion the control and management of the dockyards is inefficient," and this inefficiency the Commissioners attribute to "the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, the defective organization of the subordinate departments, and the want of clear and well-defined responsibility." Now, after the number of years our dockyards have been carried on, and considering the number of able men who have been at their head, one was astonished to hear such a statement in the Commissioners' Report. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) made some improvements in the dockyards while he held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, for which the country was indebted to him; but, then, he told us, in his examination before the Commission, that an entire building had been constructed without any authority whatever. And then the Commissioners went on to say that in their opinion that inefficiency was caused by the constitution of the Board of Admiralty; and Sir Baldwin Walker testified to the want of control over the subordinate departments. The Commissioners complained of the general want of control and well-defined responsibility, and Sir Baldwin Walker repeated this over and over again in his evidence. The Report further stated that there were no means of checking the expenditure, and Sir Baldwin Walker and Sir Richard Bromley gave evidence on that point. Sir Baldwin Walker, the late Controller, said that during the thirteen years he had held that office he had seen six or seven changes in the general management of the dockyards, each new officer altering what had been done by his predecessor. It appeared from the evidence that it was competent for one member of the Board to give the order for large works without the knowledge of the First Lord, and it was competent for two members of the Board to alter contracts without the authority of the Board. Sir Richard Bromley said he had known fifteen First Lords since 1829, and altogether as many as ninety-seven changes in the Board of Admiralty. It really was, then, time that some well-organized system was settled, by which these unfortunate changes should be avoided. He thought there should be a Minister of Marine, who should be held responsible for the control and management of the dockyards. The dockyards should be looked upon as a large manufacturing establishment for the building and repairing Her Majesty's ships; and the Minister should have the appointment of the Controller, not for his own tenure of office only, but during the good conduct, or during the life of the person appointed. The Commission recommended that the Controller General should have the appointment of Superintendents of the dockyards; but here he differed from them, and he thought these appointments should be in the hands of the First Lord. The suggestion if adopted would be likely to saddle the country with an unnecessary number of officers. The Report proceeded to set out complaints which were general in the dockyards as to the mode in which the stores were kept. Sometimes the complaint was that the article required was not to be found; in others, the timber was deficient and of bad quality, or was not supplied according to order. Sir Baldwin Walker gave evidence on this point. Then the Commissioners said, with regard to the accounts, that "the system of accounts is elaborate and minute, but as far as we can judge its results are not to be relied on for any practical purpose." The accounts not trustworthy! It was really a great pity that there should be a management to produce such results. Then the Commissioners went on to say that the Accountant General said he could, if he were permitted, put the accounts on a better system, but then he must have an increased number of clerks. Well, how many had he now? Why, no less than 177. He (Sir Frederic Smith) could not imagine what he could want with a larger staff. He rather thought it was the number that created the difficulty, and that if 100 were taken off, and the work done with the remaining 77, it would be better done. Not that he wished to discharge any of the present corps; but he really thought that as they died off the vacant places should not be filled till a great reduction had been arrived at. Why, in the different Departments in the Metropolis there was a whole army of clerks; and if the Admiralty and War Office clerks alone were armed with rifles, and sent to the outskirts of London, they would form a respectable force for its defence. Altogether there were 650 clerks in the Admiralty, and to be told that the accounts could not be efficiently kept because there was not a sufficient number of clerks to do the work, did seem extraordinary. The Commissioners went on to say that the Accountant General had never had the control of the Dockyard accounts since 1832. Next, that the valuation of the stores was made in the office of the storekeeper, but was not checked in any way. In point of fact, the audit at present instituted was of no kind of use. It was an internal audit; and an audit to be effectual ought to be external. The opinion had been repeatedly expressed that large retrenchments might be effected in the present Dockyard expenditure, and he hoped his noble Friend would tell them what improvements they were which were to be productive of economy; for the House was entitled to have the work done at the least possible cost. It was not enough to say that there was no peculation. He agreed with his noble Friend that there was none; but unless they could infuse into the different Dockyards the spirit of economy nothing could be done. The inquiry recently made showed the system to be defective in many points. One defect seemed to him to be that the experienced men at the head of the building department in our Dockyards were not now called upon to make drawings and plans for the ships which they constructed, although they were quite competent to do so. These drawings and plans were now made by one man or in one central department; but if the Dockyard builders were allowed to make them, it would, he thought, produce among them a spirit of emulation and of rivalry which would lead to ships being not only well built, but economically built, and would altogether be productive of the best results. At present there was no proper control over the expenditure of the navy. They ought to have an estimate of what every ship was expected to cost, together with an account of its actual cost, and they ought to require a strict account of the reason if the actual exceeded the estimated expense. But there was no man in the House, and scarcely any man out of the House, who could imagine how the work was apportioned out to the workmen. He remembered that in the year 1825 he was appointed to superintend a department in the Tower, and soon after his appointment the clerk of the works asked him to come down to the Tower, as he could not find work for the men. His answer was, "Why I thought the proper course would be to supply men for the work, and not work for the men." But he was told, "Oh, no, that is not the practice here; we first engage a certain number of men, and then our business is to find work for them." He said he would certainly alter that practice, and he would begin by reducing the men now engaged. Oh, but, he was told, he could not do that, for the men were all Queenborough voters. That was the system in 1825; he hoped there was nothing of that kind now. But he might read an extract from the evidence of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, who stated that one of the buildings at Devonport—a very useful one—was built without the sanction, he might say without the knowledge, of Parliament; certainly they did not know out of what fund the money was taken to defray the cost, which was the Vote for Victualling. If that was the state of things, it was surely time to make inquiry. Again, in order to show the want of proper communication between the departments, Sir Baldwin Walker stated that there were many things of which he ought to have been informed, but which were brought to his knowledge for the first time by his reading them in The Times. Another point Sir Baldwin Walker had very strongly insisted on was the want of the necessary control over the Dockyards. A very extraordinary question was put to the builders in several of the Dockyards, as to whether they felt themselves at liberty to make suggestions upon the designs of vessels submitted to them from which to build. They one and all answered that they should not think of such a thing, for they knew they would be told to mind their own business. He thought this was not a right state of things; for, however able Mr. Watts might be, there could be no harm in having other opinions. He also objected to the present practice of the tenders being opened by the Controller of the Navy, and throwing upon him the responsibility of advising the Board which tender should be accepted. This was a very invidious position to place him in. As he had before stated, in the case of the Warrior, the lowest tender was not taken. The alleged reason for that was that while the contractor employed undertook to construct the Warrior in eleven months, the party offering the lowest estimate required sixteen or eighteen months. Now he thought the Admiralty ought to have made time an element in the contract itself, so that all builders might have been placed on the same footing, and might know what they had to expect.

MR. LINDSAY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'it is expedient that such reforms should be made in the control and management of Her Majesty's Naval Yards as will tend to promote greater efficiency, and consequently to insure greater economy in those establishments,'"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR admitted the great importance of the subject, but said that the great difficulty of this question was to decide the particular reform which should be adopted. The question had been much discussed in Parliament for many years past, and had been considered by various Commissions and Committees—there was a confidential Report on the Navy in 1848; there was a Report of a Committee on the Army, Navy, and Ordnance Estimates; and since then there had been several Committees on the states and managements of our Naval Arsenals and Naval Expenditure—but no proper system of dockyard accounts had yet been adopted. He had no doubt, however, that the Accountant General, with the advantage of the able Report just made, would be competent to introduce very efficient reforms; but having been himself at the head of two dockyards he knew the difficulty of the subject, and great caution ought to be exercised in entering on a system of accounts which, while it added greatly to the cost of the establishment, might not furnish the remedy which was required. In 1853 a new system of manufacturing account-keeping was introduced into Her Majesty's dockyards, which led to the employment of an increased number of clerks and of course to increased expense; but, as it seemed to have no reference to the annual audit, he never could see the advantage of it. As for naval expenditure, that was a matter which we could not shrink from, whilst not only France but the United States are largely increasing their naval expenditure. There had been numerous instances of important aid in building ships being afforded by private yards, and, as an Englishman, he was proud that the country possessed firms which could assist the Government in cases of emergency. The mode of keeping accounts in France was inquired into about the year 1851, and in consequence of those inquiries a better system was substituted. As to the estimate for ships to be built, he thought the best groundwork was to be found in the actual cost of ships already built. Although they might lay down ships of the same class and of the same character in the same yard, there must be a difference in their cost, on account of the varying cost of materials and labour. The Warrior was a great and new experiment, and he was not able to express any opinion as to the cost, but he hoped accurate accounts would be kept of the cost of the iron ship ordered to be built at Chatham, which would afford valuable data for future reference. He thought the Accountant General was perfectly qualified to determine what accounts should be furnished, but he could not conceive it necessary to go into details to the extent of returning to the Admiralty elaborate accounts of the repairs of the innumerable articles which are repairable and kept in store for re-issue. He concurred in the importance of keeping full and clear accounts, but he was not prepared to say that minute details though duly recorded, should be carried forward when they do not form the basis of annual audit.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I am very much obliged to my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham for bringing the important subject of the control and management of Her Majesty's dockyards under the notice of the House. But he has not quite done justice to me in assuming that I am opposed to the Report of the Royal Commission. I have made no remark with regard to that Report, beyond expressing my approval of it and my regret that marginal references, by which Members might more easily refer to the evidence upon which the recommendations of the Report are founded, have been omitted.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he had made no comments on the subject.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The hon. Gentleman, I thought, rather assumed that I was opposed to that Report. [SIR FREDERIC SMITH: No!] All I can say is that, so far from it, the Admiralty are extremely obliged to the Commissioners for their valuable and able Report, and for the careful consideration which they have given to this important subject. The Report contains a number of very important recommendations; and, first of all, with regard to the constitution of the Admiralty. It is obvious, however, that, as the subject is now under the consideration of a Committee composed of the most able Members of the House, it would not be advisable for the Admiralty at this moment to make any changes in the constitution of the department as regards the control and management of the dockyards, even if they deemed any necessary. I come now to the recommendation of the Commission, which it is in the power of the Admiralty to give effect to at once, namely, the important question of accounts. There is no doubt that the accounts of the ship-building departments have not been kept in a satisfactory manner. I make that statement without implying any disparagement of the officers of that department. I am bound to say that I do not think the Commissioners for a moment entertained the idea that there had been any mal-practices in regard to pecuniary matters. The object of the Commissioners was to point out the necessity of keeping the accounts in such a form that the Admiralty and the House of Commons should know what each ship in the navy costs the country. There are, undoubtedly, great difficulties in doing so. If we turn to the French accounts we find that they are complicated by excessive minuteness of detail, and that they are attended with the further drawback that they cannot be produced till two years after the transactions to which they refer. What the Commissioners desire is that the Admiralty should be enabled annually, as soon after the close of the financial year as possible, to present to the House an account of the cost of every ship in Her Majesty's dockyards during the past year. With the view of carrying out the proposal of the Commissioners the Accountant General, who well deserves the encomiums which my hon. and gallant Friends the Members for Chatham and Devonport have passed upon him, has, at the desire of the Board of Admiralty, prepared a form of accounts by double entry, and devised a scheme by which all the bookkeeping and accounts of the ship-building departments shall be entirely committed to the charge of one officer and an assistant at Somerset House. These accounts will thus be brought into one focus at the Admiralty, and from these accounts an annual statement will be made to Parliament of the public expenditure for ship-building. This proposal, which I am happy to say involves not much expense, has been submitted by the Admiralty to the Treasury; I have little doubt that the Treasury will agree to it, and that within a few days this great reform will be commenced. My hon. and gallant Friend, in referring to the system of contracts, is in error in stating that the responsibility of inviting parties to make tenders for Admiralty contracts, and of deciding which tender shall be accepted, rests upon the Controller. That is not so. The fact is that the Controller only submits a list of names to the Board, from which they select those who are to be invited to compete, according to their own judgment; and when the tenders are sent in it is for the Board, and not the Controller, to decide which shall be accepted. I admit that there is much difficulty connected with the time-contracts to which my hon. and gallant Friend referred. In the case of the Warrior there were other tenders which were less than that which was accepted; but the contractors who got the order for the vessel undertook to build it within a shorter period than any of the others. I can quite understand that the Board of Admiralty, under the urgent circumstances of the case, should deem it advisable to accept a tender rather higher than some of the others, in order to get the vessel as soon as possible. It has not been completed within the specified time; but it is certainly not the fault of the late Board, nor of any department of the Admiralty, that the contract has not been fulfilled. The case of the Warrior is a very peculiar one. It is a vessel on an entirely novel plan, and its construction has necessarily been attended with many difficulties. My hon. and gallant Friend has said, with a great degree of truth, that every consideration should be given to all the details of such a vessel before its commencement; but it is almost impossible, in dealing with a new class of vessels, where we have had no experience to guide us, to avoid changes in the original plan. As I stated on a former occasion, certain necessary alterations were ordered by the Admiralty in the Warrior, as to ports and other details; and, while I cannot hold the contractors blameless, I must admit that there were reasons for the delay which has taken place in the completion of the vessel. It is quite true, as my hon. and gallant Friend has said, that some of the dockyard officers, in their evidence before the Commission, unite in stating generally that any proposals which they have submitted to the Admiralty for improvements in shipbuilding have not been encouraged. I believe that the Admiralty would be wise to call together the master shipwrights and other officers of the dockyards, and gather their opinions on questions of difficulty; and I may mention that some of these officers have already been desired to submit plans to the Admiralty for vessels for the defence of the coast. My hon. and gallant Friend seems to hold that what we want is not men for the work, but work for the men. I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend that in the dockyards, so far from our having too little work for the men, the arrears of repairs of ships have accumulated greatly, owing to the large amount of building which has taken place within the last few years. We have a very large body of men now employed on repairs which ought to have been effected a considerable time since. My hon. and gallant Friend, in referring to the evidence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) before the Commission, spoke as if the Admiralty had power to construct public works without the sanction of Parliament. It may be perfectly true that the Victualing Yard at Devonport was built in a great measure without the control of Parliament; but times have changed very much since that was done. The Admiralty have now no power to commence any work without the sanction of the Treasury. That is a great check, to which my hon. and gallant Friend did not allude, and it constitutes a great difference between the present times and those during which the Admiralty had the power of constructing works without any control or sanction. It is also said that the late Controller made complaints that he had no control as to the stock of timber in the dockyards. I believe that there was some justice in those complaints. There has been great inconvenience experienced, but it has arisen from this fact, that our departments are separated, and that, whereas they ought to be all under one roof and in daily communication with each other, we have the Controller of the Navy at Whitehall, while the Storekeeper, an officer intimately connected with him in all business, is at Somerset House. Constant communication between those officers has ceased from the day on which the Controller was removed to Whitehall. It is one of the recommendations of the Commission, in which I heartily concur, that the departments should be re-united. The Admiralty is a great war department, and although we may struggle on in time of peace, yet if war broke out to-morrow it would be found absolutely necessary that all its parts should be brought under one roof. This matter is considered by the Board of Admiralty to be so important that we are already in communication with the Treasury upon the subject, and I hope that before long a great and beneficial change will be made. The hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Devonport (Sir Michael Seymour) thinks that the recommendation of the Commission, that there should each year be laid upon the table an estimate of the cost of ships to be built, could not be carried out. I differ from him. I believe that it can be done; but it can only be done when you have a correct account of what ships cost; therefore, if I were now to lay upon the table an estimate of the cost of what we propose to do this year it would be only deceiving the House. My noble Friend the Duke of Somerset has, in order that we may comply with the general wish of the House that we should give all the information which we can, empowered me to give a sort of rough estimate of what we are really going to do, and that estimate I shall be glad to communicate to the Committee when we get to Vote 10. I cannot oppose the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend. At the same time, I do not think it is necessary, because it is the desire of the Admiralty to carry out the recommendations of the Commission, and as I understand that if it is carried we shall not, by the rules of the House, be able to go into Committee of Supply to-night, I hope that he will not press it.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I see most clearly that the gallant Officer (Sir Frederic Smith) who has introduced the present subject of discussion to the attention of the House, has devoted a careful and patient perusal to the Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the control and management of the Naval Yards. He has deduced several very important points for consideration on the part of Government with respect to the future administration of those departments. I have no intention of following preceding speakers over the same ground, or repeating arguments so ably urged; I will simply reiterate the fact that since the year 1829 no less a number than seventeen First Lords, sixty-seven naval and civilian Lords, and seventeen Secretaries have held office under the uncertain tenure which is the condition of membership of a Board of Admiralty? Every such change, the late Controller of the Navy (Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker) conclusively proved, had necessitated a different arrangement and constant alterations in the Royal Dockyards. One paragraph of that evidence I must instance as affects the supply of timber—

“A short time ago (Sir Baldwin Walker observed) I discovered that at one of the yards they had not got the necessary description of timber to proceed with the works ordered. I called upon the officers of that yard to report why my department had not been made acquainted with the fact. They referred me to several letters on the subject which had been sent forward, but which I had not seen. I then called for copies of all letters sent from the several yards during the previous twelve months, in which the want of timber was pointed out, when I discovered that no less than 114 letters had been forwarded, only ten of which had been seen by my department. Under such a system how is it possible to carry on the duties in a satisfactory manner when the head of the department, who is responsible that the works ordered are performed, is not made acquainted with the state of affairs in the establishment in which the most important of these works are executed.”

Economy, in the fluctuation of opinions contained in the Report, upon the part of the highest authorities examined, is, it appears to me, a simple impossibility. To such constantly changing Boards we commit the sacred trust of our navy—the very right arm of our national strength—with all its manifold departments—the manning of the fleet, the supervision of dockyards, the building, equipment, and repair of vessels, the determination of the best mode and materials of construction, and naval architecture, the supply of stores, the control of expenditure, and, in a word, the maintenance of our navy in a state equal to any emergency, which is indispensable to the security of our commerce, the safety of our shores, and the continuance of our honour and freedom as a nation. This plain statement of the mischievous results which are the consequences of the irresponsible constitution of the Board of Admiralty and the frequent changes of the Board, has a force of argument which no expressions of mine could deepen. The evil is pressing as it is serious, and I need not assure the House that, without party spirit or invidious reflection upon any individual, I speak merely for the welfare of a service whose well-being is bound up in that of the empire itself. I will only further observe that a perusal of the evidence given by Sir Baldwin Walker before the Commission has convinced me that it was quite unnecessary that that gallant officer should have remained in England to be examined by the Committee which is now sitting to inquire into the administration of the Admiralty.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he could not help thinking that any expression of opinion as to what the Executive authority intended to do with respect to the Report of this Commission was somewhat premature—that authority could not have had time to consider, still less to act upon the recommendations of the Dockyard Commissioners. He had no hesitation in saying that time sufficient had not elapsed to allow the authorities to consider, and still less to carry out, the recommendations of the Commissioners, though he felt convinced that the noble Duke at the head of the service was not only able, but most willing to advance any measure calculated to promote the interests of the service. The Report of the Royal Commission had been somewhat strangely dealt with. It was sent to the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the 11th of March, and on the 12th it was placed on the table of that House; so that, without even being read by Her Majesty's Ministers, it was subjected to a good deal of criticism both in and out of doors. It was true that on the whole that Report had been well received, but he thought the distinction had not been sufficiently noticed which was drawn between the cash and value accounts in the dockyards—a difference, nevertheless, which was very important, as affecting imputations cast on officers in the dockyards. These officials were charged with keeping extremely loose and careless accounts, and the Commissioners, in making that charge, very much understated the effect of the evidence brought before them, which clearly showed that the value accounts were not worth a farthing. Persons out of doors supposed that such a state of accounts necessarily inferred purloining the public money; whereas the cash transactions were altogether apart from the value accounts, as the Commissioners took care to point out. And although these value accounts, which pretended to apportion the expenditure between the different offices, were thoroughly unsound, the House was not to fall into the error of supposing that they were of no importance whatever, as without them the House had no means of knowing the cost of any ship, or of comparing one with another. Mr. Watts, the chief constructor, told the Commissioners that he had looked to these accounts for guidance as to the cost of ships for many years, and was not in the habit of making any special inquiries unless the cost of two particular ships was found to be very disproportionate. For his own part, he very much doubted whether the Storekeeper General had sufficient control over his own storekeepers, and whether that department, consequently, did not require scrutiny. The storekeepers again stated that they had not a sufficient number of duly qualified assistants, and that they were obliged to hand over the figures to inexperienced clerks. But it was undoubtedly true that some of the attempts at partial amelioration had resulted in leaving things worse than they were at the beginning, while Boards very often did not follow out their own schemes for improvement. The effect of the change by which an accountant was sent to each yard was to take away the check which previously existed on the storekeepers' notes; and at Woolwich lately a good many errors had been detected by recurring to the old system. He hoped the distinguished Accountant General, Sir Richard Bromley, would do something towards ameliorating the present system of accounts, and that the noble Duke at the head of the department would succeed in restoring a greater degree of harmony between the principal officers. The Controller, Storekeeper, and Accountant General were all pulling different ways, and the jealousy between them was carried to a pitch little short of absurdity. A Board, as a Board, he had always thought a bad governing body where manufactures on an enormous scale were carried on, requiring the firm hand and sound head of a single responsible person; but, assuming a Board of some kind to be a necessity in connection with the Admiralty, the noble Duke, with the assistance of his colleagues, might do much, he thought, to set matters on a better footing. The prevailing impression with regard to the unsatisfactory state of the accounts of the department had been produced in a great degree by the evidence of the Accountant

General, and he therefore trusted that gentleman maintained the same unhesitating language elsewhere. Parliament had voted, within the last eleven years, £42,000,000 for ships and services; and it was not to be wondered at that a great desire should exist in the public mind that a better system of accounting for that money should be devised. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had truly stated that in the course of the inquiry nothing in any way bearing the semblance of malpractice had transpired; had anything of the kind come to light, from the determined spirit with which the Commission was entered upon, it would certainly have been clearly and distinctly reported.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, it was not his intention to press his Motion, which he accordingly begged leave to withdraw.

MR. DALGLISH said, he could not help thinking that the information given by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty with regard to the intentions of the Government was excessively meagre. He had stated, in effect, that the Government were precluded from doing anything by the fact that a Committee on this subject was sitting upstairs. The public thought that the Admiralty was in a bad state, and no half measure would do. The gallant Admiral the Member for Devonport (Sir Michael Seymour) seemed to think that, provided our ships were well built, the dockyard accounts were of trifling importance. He concurred with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that our ships ought to be well built, but he also held that the accounts were of vast importance. What the country required was that our ships should be built of the very best materials and in the best manner; and what the House of Commons was bound to do was to see that economy should be enforced in the dockyards. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) had expressed considerable confidence in the good intentions of the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty. He (Mr. Dalglish) had no doubt that the noble Duke was a very able administrator, but he should be glad if any one would point out in what respect the Admiralty had been improved within the last two years—if any one would point out one step that had been taken to improve it since the time when it was under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich. What improvements had been made in the Department since those for which we were indebted to that right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle? It had undergone no change for the better during the last two years, nor did he believe it would during the next two. The Admiralty was now extensively engaged in manufacturing. They would soon be manufacturing their own steam engines. The reason given for this was that such a system provided a check against overcharge by contractors. But it failed in supplying any correct standard of the charges in consequence of the unsatisfactory state of the accounts, which were kept in the most extraordinary way that ever accounts had been kept. It had been stated that everything manufactured in the Royal dockyards cost 50 per cent more than if manufactured by contract. What was the system adopted in the French navy? They manufactured almost no article in the dockyards which they could get from private manufacturers which they could contract for. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had assured the House that no department of the Government was to blame for the length of time which the Warrior had been under construction. He did not know the facts of the case himself, but he had every reason to believe that after the Warrior was contracted for the changes in respect to details were incessant, and that to those changes the delay might almost entirely be attributed. He found, for instance, that the weight of the screw had been altered from 24 to 42 tons, and that was a change which necessarily involved a very great loss of time. The plan of the ship was drawn by Mr. Watts, of the Admiralty, and perhaps it was the best that could have been adopted; but not one of the great shipbuilders who had furnished designs was asked a single question with regard to the plans which they had designed. With respect to the question of tenders generally, he had no doubt that the system had been very much improved. He believed that the most important step in the direction of that improvement had been taken by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, and he had no hesitation in saying that the country was very much indebted to that right hon. Gentleman. He should like to have seen the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty carry out his views of reform. He could not suppose that it was owing to any lukewarmness on the noble Lord's part that he had not done so. He believed it was out of his power, and that the noble Lord, to whom that House looked for everything in connection with naval reform, had no more power than a mere clerk.

CAPTAIN JERVIS thought some further and clearer explanation was required from the Government with reference to this subject. The House had clearly before it this fact, that for some years past millions of the public money had been voted to be expended in these dockyards, and that money could not now be accounted for in any way. Such was the explanation given by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. The noble Lord admitted that the Report of the Commission was perfectly correct, and the only excuse he could give was, that he was satisfied there had been no embezzlement on the part of any of the officials connected with the dockyards. But that was not a reason which ought to induce that House to vote any further supplies of money on account of these dockyards, until they had received an assurance from the Government that there should be immediately instituted a proper superintendence with regard to these moneys. In order to show the enormous disproportion between the cost of superintendence in these dockyards and that of other Government establishments, he would compare in this respect two of the prominent dockyards with two of the principal factories under the control of the War Office. If they took the dockyard at Woolwich they found that the number of workmen employed was 1,821, while the number employed in the Royal Laboratory was 3,827. The expenditure on account of wages in the dockyard was £109,000, and in the Royal Laboratory £155,000. The cost of superintendence in the dockyard was £18,517, and in the Royal Laboratory £10,681. The number of clerks provided to furnish these accounts was twenty-three in the dockyard, and in the laboratory only nine. Therefore, there had been no stint whatever in providing clerks for the purpose of furnishing the accounts. In the dockyard at Portsmouth there were 3,303 workmen employed, and the cost of wages was £206,000. In the gun factory in the Woolwich Arsenal 3,775 were employed, and the expenditure on account of wages was £196,000. The cost of superintendence in the dockyard was £24,201, as against £7,802 the cost of superintendence in the gun factory.

He could not understand why they should wait for the Report of the Committee that was sitting up stairs before they made any change in the present system of dockyard management. He trusted the Admiralty would take the matter in hand at once, and effect a change of system. A Committee of that House had recommended that an Artillery officer should be held responsible for the manufactures carried on in connection with the Army: and why should an Admiral of high standing not be placed in charge of these Naval Dockyards, and held responsible to the Admiralty for all that was done in them?

MR. WHITBREAD said, that the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Jervis) was under a misapprehension with regard to what had been stated by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. He did not say that he could not tell in what way the monies voted by Parliament had been expended; what he stated was that the value accounts, not the cash accounts, had been so kept that it was impossible to state definitely how much was charged to one ship and how much to another. Neither did his noble Friend say that before any steps were taken in the system of keeping accounts it would be necessary to wait for the Report of the Committee sitting up stairs. On the contrary, he distinctly stated that active measures would be taken for introducing a system of book-keeping by double entry. But the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite was very much mistaken if he thought that was a simple and easy process that could be effected without much labour. He (Mr. Whitbread) did not believe it was possible to institute a fair comparison between the cost of superintendence for dockyards, and that for those establishments under the War Office, because the establishments were so essentially different in their character. The heads of expenditure in the dockyards must be very much more in number, and he was not prepared to admit that the superintendence was at all in excess of what it ought to be. With respect to the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish), that the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty had made no improvement in the administration of that department since his accession to office, he would remind his hon. Friend that the noble Duke had made important changes in the position of the Controller of the Navy—changes which had been since found to be beneficial to the service.

MR. LINDSAY said, he was surprised that the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith) should have been so easily persuaded to withdraw his Motion, for he would venture to say that the Report which had been laid on the Table of the House had been more freely discussed out of doors than any other Report presented to the House since he had a seat in it, and no wonder, for it contained very grave charges against the present system of the Board of Admiralty. He was not satisfied with the answer given by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, for though the Report stated that there had been in eight months, at one dockyard, no less than 8,000 errors discovered in the accounts, the noble Lord had not taken any notice of this grave charge, or stated whether the Report was correct or not. No less than £4,000 had been omitted to be charged for wages, and £1,200 had been charged twice over; while the sum of £5,210, expenses incurred for boilers, had not been charged against the ships to which they had been supplied. He should be glad to know whether these statements, which appeared in the Report, were true or not; more especially as the evidence given to the Commissioners was chiefly given by witnesses from the Admiralty. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whitbread) said the Admiralty were going to adopt another system of accounts, and he (Mr. Lindsay) was glad to hear it; but it was not a sufficient answer to tell the House that a system of double entry was about to be instituted; for if the dockyards were inefficiently superintended a new mode of keeping accounts would not enable the Admiralty to build ships at less cost than before, and the House ought to know in what respect they were to be made efficient, and who was to be responsible. The Commissioners said they were not able to ascertain the cost price of any one article. Now he (Mr. Lindsay) thought they ought to know the cost of every article, and with a proper system of accounts and responsible superintendence they would know the cost of every article. Both the noble Lord and the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Willoughby) had said there was no reason to suppose there had been any malpractices; and he (Mr. Lindsay) would not say there had been any; but they could not say there had not been malpractices when they found that certain sums had been charged twice for wages, and that other sums had been omitted to be charged altogether. In short, the accounts were kept in such a manner that it was impossible to say whether there had or had not been malpractices. He should like to know whether it was a fact that the average cost of the vessels built at Pembroke during the ten years 1848-59 was £33 3s. 5d. per ton for the bare hulls? If it was, then the cost was at least £13 per ton more than it ought to have been. He found that the number of vessels built in those ten years was 44, of which 11 were from 230 to 420 tons register, 11 from 500 to 800 tons, 5 from 1,000 to 1,200, 10 from 2,000 to 2,500, and only 7 of the largest class, from 3,000 to 3,700 tons. Now, he considered that vessels of the smallest class could have been built in private yards in every respect equal to those of the Government at £10 per ton; and those of the next class might have been built equally good for £12 per ton. Taking the price of the smallest craft, however, at £20, the next at £22, the next at £24, and the next at £26, the real cost of the seven largest vessels would have been no less than £49 per ton. He had often stated in the House and he would now repeat it, that with a perfectly organized system at the Admiralty, and a proper system of accounts, the country would receive as much for £8,000,000 as they now did for £10,000,000—or in other words, he conscientiously believed that £2,000,000 could be saved by the adoption of a better system. He was glad to hear that the Admiralty were about to invite suggestions from master shipwrights and other competent persons when they determined upon laying down vessels of a large size. He thought the Admiralty might with propriety go a step further. Our new ships, built after the Warrior, would, he believed, cost from £350,000 to £400,000 each before they were finished. If it were important to invite designs from all quarters for our public buildings, why should we not invite the science of the age to give us the best models of new ships before we embarked on such a vast expenditure for naval architecture? A handsome premium should be offered to induce naval architects to compete. Considering the value of obtaining the best form and lines for new iron ships, a premium of £5,000 would not be too much for the best model; and he would not debar the servants of the Government from competing. It might be doubted whether the right form for iron-plated ships had yet been obtained. In the naval intelligence of the leading journal of the 9th of May it was stated that the Warrior, although lying in the still water of the Victoria Dock, showed unmistakeable indications of being top heavy in her present trim. He was talking the other day with a gentleman from the Southern States of America, who accounted for the bloodless operations at Fort Sumter by the fact that the fort and a battery in the harbour were lined with case iron of about 2 inches in thickness, placed at such an angle that the shot glanced off without doing any mischief. It was worthy of consideration, therefore, whether the sides of our new iron ships could not be built of a form so that shot might glance from the armour sides either into the air or the water. At all events, a great advantage would result from throwing open the question of form to the competition of naval architects in all parts of the world, and it would be well to make experiments upon iron plates at different angles, and see the effect of shot upon them.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON thought that a good deal of the present discussion would have been more appropriate in Committee upon the particular Votes; but after what had fallen from the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), some of whose observations were rather hard both on the present Board of Admiralty and on preceding Boards, he could not allow the conversation to close without saying a few words. He concurred with the hon. Member that it was impossible to over-rate the importance of the matter which the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham had brought under the notice of the House; and, undoubtedly, no Report lately presented had attracted more attention out of doors than this had done; but he could not think that the criticisms passed upon the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty were quite just, or that the present Board of Admiralty was open to the charge of not having met the inquiry in a fair spirit. The hon. Member for Sunderland had gone more into details on the subject matter of the Report than was necessary, and had said much which, proceeding from a Gentleman so competent to judge in matters of this kind, was calculated to excite considerable dissatisfaction, if not alarm, with respect to the alleged extravagance in the dockyards. The hon. Gentleman stated that the cost of building men of war in the dockyard at Pembroke was £33 per ton, while they ought to have been built for £20 per ton. He did not know upon what authority the hon. Gentleman rested that opinion; or whether the hon. Gentleman was referring to the cost of the mercantile marine.

MR. LINDSAY explained that what he had intended to convey was that, taking vessels of several sizes, the larger sizes cost £49 instead of £33 per ton; but that the average price of all the ships of different sizes to which he referred was £33 per ton, whereas it ought not to have been more than £20.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the hon. Gentleman still left the House uninformed of the basis upon which his calculations proceeded. If the hon. Gentleman was comparing these vessels with those of the mercantile marine, the comparison was not a fair one; and if he professed to give the average cost, he must recollect that the average cost would be taken on vessels of different sizes. They might have a frigate of 3,000 tons, as well as a three-decker of 3,000 tons, but no one conversant with the subject would suppose that the one vessel could be built at the same cost as the other. A different rate of man of war involved an additional number of decks, and the number of decks was not included in the tonnage. At the same time he was ready to admit that there were some startling facts in the Report, and it must be admitted that the Gentlemen attached to the Commission had discharged their duty in a manner to deserve the best thanks of the public. He agreed that that Report, as it stood before the public, imposed a serious responsibility on the Board of Admiralty. The question was, whether the way in which the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty had met these statements was such as the circumstances in which he was placed required? He did not see how the Admiralty could have met the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend in a fairer or more complete manner than they had done. In point of fact, the Report involved two points — the constitution of the Board of Admiralty as regarded the care and superintendence of the dockyards, and the mode in which the dockyard accounts were kept. Upon the first point it was a very fair answer to say that the constitution of the Board of Admiralty was under the consideration of a Committee upstairs. He was sorry to hear the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) impugn the constitution of that Committee on the ground that there were too many persons on it that were now, or had formerly been connected with the Board of Admiralty. Whenever the Report of that Committee came before them he hoped it would be shown that the Committee were entitled to the confidence both of the House and the country. His hon. Friend the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) said it was a matter for question whether this great public department of the Admiralty could be best managed by a Board, and he (Sir John Pakington) had ventured on former occasions to intimate the same doubt. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) had stated that this Report proved that there was a want of adequate official control in the dockyards, and he (Sir John Pakington) very much shared in that opinion. The hon. Member also said that there was a want of adequate responsibility, and he (Sir John Pakington) also shared that opinion. But he could not agree with the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis), when he said this was a most simple and easy matter, and that nothing would be more easy than for the Board of Admiralty to appoint an Admiral to superintend the dockyards. If the hon. and gallant officer were a Member of the Select Committee he would soon discover that this was a matter not so easily disposed of. This was a most complicated and difficult question, and required most anxious and dispassionate consideration on the part of those to whom this duty had been delegated. He was one of those who thought that the Government would have done well if they had taken the matter into their own hands, and had decided to investigate the administration of the navy themselves. While he held that opinion, on the other hand he thought it would be injudicious in the Government, after referring the question to a Committee upstairs, to undertake suddenly to reconstruct the naval department. With regard to the other part of the Report of the Commissioners relating to the accounts, it was to be inferred, from what had fallen from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, that the Government were directing their attention to the important matter, and he was sure that the hon. Members for Glasgow and Sunderland would admit that that difficult and complicated subject could not be in more competent hands than those of Sir Richard Bromley, the Accountant General at the Admiralty. The House had heard, likewise, that the Duke of Somerset was engaged in endeavouring to carry out the substance of the Report of the Commissioners, and in effecting those improvements in the accounts which the Report proved to be so necessary. He should have thought the Admiralty to be guilty of a neglect of duty if it had postponed for one day longer than absolutely necessary the consideration of the evils which had crept into the dockyard accounts; but, after the assurance of the noble Lord, and knowing how competent the Duke of Somerset was to deal with the affairs of his department, he was bound to believe that the Admiralty was doing all in its power for the purpose of obtaining an accurate system of accounts.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has been received that the Austrian Government are removing the troops of the late Duke of Modena from the territory of Venetia; and also, whether that Government are transferring troops from Mantua, and other fortresses in Venetia, to Hungary, for the purpose of the collection of taxes in the latter country? In bringing the subject before the House he reminded hon. Members of the present relative position of Austria and Hungary, and of the refusal of the Hungarian Parliament to recognize the constitution which had been promulgated by Austria, and that they claimed their ancient rights. If the conduct of Austria should prove to be harsh towards the Hungarian people, it would drive them to the verge of war. The constitution of Hungary was of as great antiquity as our own, and the people of that country now demanded their rights. That demand was not made by the extreme democratic party but by the moderate party. He had visited these countries, and knew the feelings of the Hungarians. If Kossuth should go into the Carpathian mountains, he could bring about such scenes as were enacted in 1848, for the attachment of the people to him was very strong. Our policy was undoubtedly one of strict impartiality, and it was to be hoped that some constitutional mode would be found of settling the present difficulties. He should be glad if the noble Lord would reply to his Question.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In reply to the Question which has been asked by the hon. Member, I have only to say no information has been received at the Foreign Office with respect to the removal of the troops of the late Duke of Modena from the territory of Venetia, or that the Austrian Government are transferring troops from Mantua and other fortresses in Venetia to Hungary, for the purpose of collecting taxes in that country. I do not think I am at all called upon—nor do I think it would be for the convenience of the House that I should enter upon the question of Hungary. I can only say that the hon. Gentleman seems to have misunderstood what I said on a former occasion on this subject. I gave no opinion in favour of Austria as against Hungary; I only expressed the wish that Hungary may be in the enjoyment of liberty according to her ancient constitution, and that the enjoyment of those liberties may be compatible with the maintenance of the present dynasty. I gave no other opinion than that: but the hon. Gentleman seems to think that the Emperor of Austria has decided upon taking a course hostile to the interests of Hungary; but I am far from thinking that such is the case. I am not disposed to doubt the decision which the Austrian Government has arrived at, nor can I, of course, say what policy it is intended to pursue.

THE OUTRAGE ON CAPTAIN MACDONALD.—QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If there has been any communication between the British and the Prussian Governments, subsequent to the 4th day of March last, with respect to the case of Captain Macdonald, who was arrested and imprisoned at Bonn; and, if so, is there any objection to the production of such Communications? He could only repeat his conviction that the Prussian Government were right in this affair, and that the authorities of this country were wrong. He had reason to believe that the discussion of this question, and the tone adopted by the House of Commons in connection with it, had much rankled in the minds of the Prussian Government and people.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In answer to the question of my hon. Friend I have to state that since the Correspondence was laid before Parliament a despatch has been communicated to the British Government, written by Baron Schleinitz to Count Bernstorff, the Prussian Minister in this country. An answer to that despatch is now on its way to Berlin, and when we know that that answer has been received there will be no objection to its production.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £3,840,477, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of Naval Stores for the Building, Repair, and Outfit of the Fleet, the Purchase of Steam Machinery, and for other purposes connected therewith, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. LINDSAY moved that the first item—£949,371 for timber—should be reduced by £300,000. The sum voted last year, he said, was £722,758, and for a long series of years prior to 1859 the average amount did not exceed £350,000. That was a time, moreover, when we built nothing but wooden ships. In 1859, when it was found necessary to reconstruct the navy, the sum asked for was £450,000, and the amount actually expended was about £600,000. Our wooden fleet was now considerably larger than all the navies of the world combined, and it had been resolved that no more wooden line-of-battle ships should be built. Why, then, should Parliament be asked to vote the enormous sum of nearly £1,000,000 for timber? He hoped it would not be said that the timber had already been contracted for; because, if the Government had really ordered the timber without the knowledge or sanction of Parliament, they had interfered with the most important privilege which the House of Commons possessed—that of controlling the public expenditure. But he might be told that it was necessary to have a large stock of timber on hand. In 1859 the stock on hand amounted to 64,000 loads, and the sum which he was willing to vote would enable the Government to purchase a much greater quantity, and thus have a larger stock than on any previous year, even though they had not a single load at the present moment.

MR. BAXTER said, he thought this one of the most objectionable Votes that had been submitted to Parliament for many years. He had himself given notice of his intention to move that the Vote be reduced by £285,000, in order to equalize the sum with that voted by the House last year; but he thought it would be for the convenience of the Committee that he should merge his Amendment in that of the hon. Member for Sunderland, which he, therefore, cordially seconded. As this would probably be the last opportunity they should have of discussing the Naval Estimates, he thought it necessary, before speaking to the particular Vote under consideration, considering the immoderate demands now made on the public purse, to take a survey of the position in which we stood. The discussions which had taken place this Session showed that, so far from our fleet being insufficient, the maritime superiority of this country never was so undoubted or so overwhelming as at the present moment. It had been shown that we possessed more steam line-of-battle ships and more sailing vessels than all the other Powers of Europe put together. Of men and boys serving in the Royal Navy we had more than there were in the whole mercantile marine of France. The merchant ships of England were increasing in every sea, while the mercantile marine of France was steadily falling off at the rate of about 20,000 tons annually. After the discussions that had taken place in that House, hon. Members must have read with surprise the remarks in the French Senate, from which it appeared that our neighbours had begun to be seriously alarmed lest they should not be able to find men for the Imperial Navy. The boasted maritime inscription of France was every year more and more felt as a hardship and oppression; its effect was to deter men from engaging in seafaring pursuits; it weakened rather than strengthened the maritime power of that country. Witnesses who had been examined before the Royal Commissioners asserted that a general ignorance and misapprehension prevailed in this country respecting the great naval preparations going on in France. He had formerly read some extracts from a book published by a gentleman who had visited the naval yards of France, but the noble Lord at the head of the Government attempted to throw ridicule on the statements because they had appeared in a newspaper. Since then, however, the noble Lord the Member for Totnes (Lord Gifford) and his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish), who had to-night made an admirable practical speech, had visited the great ports of Cherbourg and Toulon, and they told precisely the same thing—that the stories which had frightened so many good people in this country, and to which the Government had given undue encouragement, were mere moonshine. There never was a time when the navy of Great Britain was more thoroughly equipped, or more powerful in proportion to the navies of the other Powers, than at the present moment. In point of fact, we had too many ships. We had a steam reserve in ordinary in the Medway of 69 ships, carrying 1,522 guns, and of 17,558 horse-power; and at Portsmouth of 51 ships, carrying 1,235 guns, with 10,728 horse-power, totally irrespective of the Channel Fleet, the Mediterranean, Pacific, and other squadrons. The French, on the other hand, had no Channel Fleet at all; while, according to the hon. Member for Glasgow, hardly anything was doing at Cherbourg. There might be something mysterious in concealing from the view of Englishmen what was going on, but he at least had failed to discover the formidable phantom squadron which had raised the alarms of so many hon. Members. In such a position, he asked what, in the name of common sense, was the use of voting the large sum now demanded for Naval Stores—£285,000 more than was voted last year? We had so many ships of war that we might station them within two and a half miles of each other all round the coast of Great Britain and Ireland, and yet nearly £1,000,000 was asked for timber this year—£300,000 more than was expended by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich when he reconstructed the British navy. It was one thing to ask the money and another to get the timber. He at first thought there had been some mistake in the estimate for this enormous supply of timber, and he had, therefore, taken up the Report of the Dockyard Commission, where he found some remarkable evidence on the question of the supply of timber. The hon. Member quoted the evidence of Sir Baldwin Walker and the hon. Richard Dundas, Storekeeper General of the Navy; the latter of whom, in reply to Question 961 said—

“I believe we got every load of timber which any amount of money would have got. If we had had more money we could not have got more timber of the requisite dimensions and quality.”

And again, in reply to Question 966,

“If we had had double the sum of money I do not think that we could have got the timber ; we have contracts outstanding ; we have money provided for timber which will not come because we cannot get it."

In 1852-53 the Vote for timber was £270,000; in 1855, it was £451,000; in 1856, £385,000; in 1859, £672,000; and this year—a time of peace—it was no less than £949,000. He thought this demand excessive, and that the Government should not press it when so many Members were absent in consequence of the late recess ; but he hoped the Government would learn a lesson from the discussion, and that, now that the defences of the country were admittedly in a satisfactory condition, the Estimates would next year be upon a more moderate scale. He cordially seconded the Amendment of his hon. Friend, who he hoped would take the sense of the Committee upon it.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET admitted that it did appear rather anomalous that, when the Vote for labour was reduced, the Vote for timber should be increased ; but the explanation was to be found in the unprecedented expenditure of timber that had been going on in the dockyards during the last two years. The result had been that the stock of timber had been reduced to a lower point than was thought to be either safe or prudent by those who were most acquainted with the subject ; and that it was absolutely necessary that the country should be put upon a better footing in this respect. During the last year the consumption of timber had been more than double the ordinary rate of consumption, having been 80,000 loads, instead of between 30,000 and 40,000 loads. The consequence was that the stock of timber about a month ago was reduced to 51,000 loads—much below the usual quantity kept on hand. The fair and proper establishment of timber used to be considered 60,000 loads. It was proposed this year to purchase 73,000 loads, while the year's consumption was estimated at 42,000 loads—or somewhat more than the usual average expenditure of former years—so that at the end of the financial year it was hoped that the stock of timber would be increased to 82,000 loads, or about two years' consumption. He was bound in candour to say—though under the threat of the serious displeasure of the hon. Member for Sunderland, if the Admiralty should have engaged the country in expenditure before the sanction of the House of Commons had been obtained—that the House was pledged to that expenditure of timber ; but, although it might appear objectionable to ask the House of Commons to consider Estimates to which they were already pledged, yet there were particular circumstances which rendered such a course necessary. The hon. Member for Montrose had referred to the evidence of the Storekeeper of the Navy, who had given a complete answer to the objection by saying that there was no possibility of finding more timber in the country, even were a much larger sum voted. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire had last year made a most important statement about the danger and impolicy of allowing the stock of timber to be reduced to too low an amount, and, impressed by that statement, the Admiralty had taken pains to increase the stock. It might be said, What is the use of coming to the House with Estimates when contracts had been already made for its supply, and the House has no power to reduce them ? But an unanswerable argument was afforded in regard to the necessity of taking time by the forelock in making these contracts, in the quotations read by the hon. Member for Montrose from the evidence taken before the Dockyard Commission, showing the difficulty of obtaining the quantities of timber required. The process of getting a quantity of timber of the kind, required in most cases two years, in some three, and in none less than one year. He found, from a report which had been made to the Admiralty, that, of the whole stock of timber, less than one-fourth was English timber ; therefore, it was apparent that the great bulk of the timber required for the purposes of the navy had to be fetched from distant countries. Moulmein and Malabar teak could only be obtained after a long interval, and if the Admiralty were compelled to obtain the sanction of Parliament previous to making a contract for that timber, it would be impossible to procure the timber in time for its needs. It was necessary, therefore, to have running contracts for two or three years in advance. What would be the case if the Government did not anticipate the Vote of the House of Commons ? They had now a gunboat building by a firm who came lately to the Admiralty to ask them to supply English oak and other kinds of timber, because none could be obtained elsewhere, and they had been supplied, not only with English oak, but Dantzic oak, teak, and other timbers, which they had been unable to purchase in the market. Could this be done if they did not order their timber from the sources from whence it came to this country? The Thames Iron Company, also, who were building the Warrior, said they had no means of getting Dantzic oak plank, and they were supplied by the Admiralty. It was necessary, therefore, that a large stock should be maintained, and it would be perfectly impossible that the great business of the Admiralty Department could be carried on unless they had their contracts out in time. There was generally, however, in these Votes, a margin left to allow of reductions if the House thought fit; but with regard to this item of timber not only was the House pledged to the present amount, but they were pledged also to a considerable sum for next year again. It was not only in the case of timber that contracts were made before the Estimates were submitted to Parliament, but also in the case of steam machinery. The sum which the House was now asked to agree to did not cover the whole contract which the Admiralty had entered into for machinery, but there remained at least one-third that would have to be paid for in a future year. Let him only add that he made these frank statements because he thought it respectful to the Committee that they should be made aware of the amount of all liabilities they had incurred, and he hoped and believed that due confidence would be placed in the department which was responsible for the provision of materials for the navy.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH asked, why Government, if the money was already spent, did not at once take a larger Vote?—for it must be remembered that not only was the money spent in the present year, but the House was committed to expenditure for future years also. He considered the House of Commons ought distinctly to know the extent and nature of the contracts into which Government had entered. At present the House was treated with contempt. He wished to know if the whole of the Vote of last year was spent? and if it had not been spent, because the timber could not be procured, where was the necessity of asking for a larger sum now? He also wished to know if it was the same with respect to hemp, canvas, metal articles, coal and fuel, as with respect to timber, and that the supply was purchased for some years in anticipation, and if, when they had purchased it, they were to hand it over to private firms?

Lord Clarenc Paget

MR. FINLAY said, that timber was an article that required to be seasoned, and, therefore, it was necessary to have a large supply of it in store. But if it was necessary to look ahead, these contracts should have been entered into last year, in which case the Government would have been able to consult the House of Commons. The large sum of £1,000,000 now asked for was said to be equivalent only to a two years' supply; but that supply was estimated on the old scale of consumption, when we were building none but wooden ships, whereas iron ships were now superseding the use of wooden ones. He could not concur altogether in the opinions expressed by the hon. Member (Mr. Baxter) as to the present efficiency of the navy. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) on a former occasion made a speech to show that in any naval engagement iron ships would destroy wooden ones very easily. If that were so, he doubted whether our navy could be considered equal even to the navy of France. He considered, however, that the Government had not acted in a very constitutional manner in entering into these contracts, and incurring such large pecuniary liabilities without the knowledge and concurrence of Parliament.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was extremely sorry to see the state of the House whilst this subject was discussed. There were some hon. Members who sat below the gangway present; but behind the Government he saw nobody, and behind the Opposition but very few hon. Members; and he did not think that it was to the credit of the House that when they were discussing a subject of so much importance, both financially and in reference to the defence of the country, there should be so thin a House. He must also regret that when the noble Lord was forming his Government he did not send the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) to the Admiralty, for if he had been a Member of the Board they would have been spared several of these discussions. The hon. Member had rather ungenerously attacked him in reference to the cost of the iron-cased ships. He (Sir John Pakington), however, had never concealed from the House what the cost of those ships would be; and, indeed, in proposing the building of such ships, he had stated distinctly that they would be the most costly vessels ever built.

MR. LINDSAY explained, that he had not attacked the right hon. Baronet—he had only said what the cost would be, and expressed his opinion that the science of the age should have been brought to bear upon the matter.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: And the science of the age was brought to bear to the utmost extent possible. His opinion was that there were much higher questions at stake than whether they would vote the amount asked by the noble Lord for timber, and that the real question was whether or not England was to remain the first naval power in the world? If the House wished that we should maintain this position they must not indulge in these hot and cold fits about expense; because a great and increasing cost was an indispensable condition of that supremacy. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had referred to him directly in reference to the supply of timber, and had alluded especially to the course which he took two years ago. The hon. Member stated that even during the endeavours made by the Government of which he was a member to increase the strength of the navy he only asked for £672,000 for timber, whilst the present Government asked for £1,000,000. He was bound to state that that item of the Estimates of 1859 was not limited with any reference whatever to money, but solely by the belief at that time as to the possibility of obtaining timber. The Government of that day were deeply impressed with the absolute necessity of obtaining the greatest supply of timber which they could obtain, and they were sending to all parts of the world for it. And even after they had made that Estimate and presented it to Parliament, an unforeseen opportunity of obtaining a large quantity of teak presented itself, and the Government immediately bought the wood. Nothing struck him more when he entered into office in 1858-9 than the deficient supply of timber in the dockyards. When he came to draw upon that stock in order to increase the navy, it proved to be utterly insufficient, and the consequence—the unavoidable consequence—was that unseasoned timber had to be used. The deficient stock of timber left the Admiralty no alternative. Now what was the motive which instigated the Government of 1859 in increasing our navy? There was no use in concealing the fact that it was our feebleness in comparison with France. He found not only that France was going ahead of us in the building of ships, but that every yard in France was amply supplied with a stock of timber. He thanked the present Board of Admiralty for the efforts which they were making to increase the stock of timber, and he hoped that the hon. Member (Mr. Lindsay) would reconsider his Amendment, and that he would believe that, in endeavouring to increase our stock of timber for the supply of our dockyards, the Government were doing no more than it was their bounden duty to do. He had spoken strongly upon this matter because he was convinced that the Admiralty were perfectly right.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) has expressed his regret at two circumstances—the thinness of the House and the small interest which appears to be felt in this matter. I also regret another circumstance—that two hon. Gentlemen who I know are most anxious for the prosperity, the welfare, and the honour of the country, and who are peculiarly conversant with the great importance of the maritime trade of the country to our political existence, should come down here with a Motion tending to cripple that navy, on the existence and the power of which, I will not say our prosperity, but our very national existence depends; for, after all, the question is not whether we shall spend £600,000 or £900,000 on timber; the bottom, the marrow, the tendency, and the effect of the Motion is whether we shall have a navy at all? (“Oh, oh!”) I say it is so, because, if you deprive the Admiralty of the means of constructing ships, you deprive the country of a navy. My noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty has stated that even if the supply of timber is obtained which we now ask for, we shall only have two years’ consumption in our stores; and I remember when this question was discussed last year it was maintained that we ought at least to have three years’ consumption on hand. It is now said that iron ships only ought to be built; but hon. Gentlemen appear to run away with the idea that iron ships are built entirely of iron. My two hon. Friends who moved and seconded the Amendment, must, I am sure, be perfectly aware that an iron ship has a vast quantity of wood in its construction, and it is absurd to say that, because iron ships are to be built, you will not require a stock of timber. Then it is said, you ought to take example from France, who has abandoned all idea of rivalling us in our navy; and that it is absurd for us to have the stock of timber which this Vote would enable us to obtain, seeing the total abstinence of France from anything like an attempt to rival our Navy. But do hon. Gentlemen know what is the amount of timber now in stock in the French arsenals? This Vote would give us a supply of 80,000 loads; but the French, with a smaller navy, and smaller demands for timber, have 160,000 loads in stock—just double that which we should have if this Vote be granted. The reasons given by my noble Friend, and supported by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), for making contracts when opportunity offers, are unanswerable. You cannot go into the market and order a supply of timber like a supply of coals, or any other article of which the supply is ready and general. It is well known that timber fit for certain purposes grows only in certain positions, and if when an opportunity offers for making contracts you do not take advantage of it, other people step in, and you are left without the material necessary for the maintenance of your navy. Under these circumstances I hope the House will see that no reason has been shown for diminishing this Vote, or for blaming the Admiralty for making contracts for the material necessary to the maintenance of that navy, without which the country would be utterly ruined. Only imagine for a moment the condition in which we should be placed if any foreign Power, or any combination of foreign Powers, were to obtain complete command of the sea. What would become of those imports upon which our commercial industries depend? What would become of those exports without which our industries would be employed without fruit? What would become of all those elements of our national existence for the maintenance of which it is absolutely necessary that we should have free command of the great highway of nations? Independently of all considerations of internal defence and the means which an enemy would have of attacking our shores if we had not power to resist him by sea, I am sure the two hon. Gentlemen who are so well acquainted with all our various commercial interests, cannot seriously wish that our navy should be deprived of the means which are essential for the maintenance of its efficiency. I hope, therefore, that the Amendment will be withdrawn.

MR. BRIGHT said, that he thought the

Committee, whatever they might think of the Motion of his hon. Friends, would admit that if the Vote was five times as great as it was, the speech of the noble Lord would have been equally applicable. The noble Lord had not condescended to go into any figures, and he would excuse him for saying that he did not place the slightest reliance upon his opinion. The noble Lord told them that the French had 160,000 loads of timber in their yards; he (Mr. Bright) could not contradict him, but remembering how often the noble Lord had misled the House by exaggerated statements with regard to the French navy, without something more satisfactory he would not be disposed to vote an extravagant sum of money for this item simply on account of the noble Lord's statement. Members of that House, who had recently been in the French dockyards, and who were the best authorities on this subject, had not seen there that stock of timber which the noble Lord described, and he had no doubt that, if the matter were inquired into, it would be found that just as before the noble Lord had talked before of a phantom French fleet, so now he was bringing forward phantom stocks of timber. The noble Lord had spoken of the danger to our commercial marine by refusing this Vote. But he would venture to say that his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had twenty times as much property on the water as the noble Lord—and, therefore, he did not think that his hon. Friend would not do anything to make that property less secure, nor, with regard to the country, that he would be less patriotic than the noble Lord himself. The question before the House was a simple one for any person who knew anything of figures. He did not expect the Admiralty to know anything of figures, for they admitted they did not. Turning, however, to the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, who ought to know something of the matter, he appeared with regard to this Vote to be proceeding upon a manifest error; for he asked how they could carry on the great business of the Admiralty without this Vote? Well, if he regarded the great business of the Admiralty as a permanent business at the rate at which it had been carried on for the last two years, or since the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) did so much to create a panic with regard to the state of the navy

—if the noble Lord imagined that to be a permanent condition of affairs at the Admiralty, he (Mr. Bright) had not very much to say about it, for upon that supposition they were evidently getting into a condition of expenditure which would not be pulled up by any arguments in that House, but only by some action in the country which would bring the Government and the House to their senses. It was evident from what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord that there had been an expenditure exceeding that of former years. The question was whether that expenditure was to be maintained or diminished? It had been stated, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government had not denied it—that this country had more ships of every class than all the rest of the world together, and if this were so, it could not be thought by any man outside a lunatic asylum that they were to go on during the next five or six years increasing their navy as they had done during the last two. And if not, how could they ask the House for a Vote for timber of more than £200,000 in excess of the Vote of last year, which was itself greater than that of any former year? Mr. Dundas, the Storekeeper General, who was spoken of as an authority whenever he was quoted by the Government, said, that he contemplated that in the year now going on the consumption of timber would be reduced one-half. Well, when they were reducing the consumption of timber one-half for this year, and he presumed for several succeeding years, what could be the necessity for increasing so largely the Vote for timber? Mr. Dundas said that 60,000 loads was the usual stock considered necessary for the navy, and that at the commencement of this year the stock was about 50,000 loads—which was 10,000 loads less, or in consequence of the extraordinary consumption of those years. But then Mr. Dundas proposed by this Vote—which he was careful to say he did not recommend himself—what he said was, that he knew what was desired by the Board on the subject—what would be necessary for the purchase of 70,000 loads, which with the stock on hand made 120,000 loads. Now, as only one-half the usual consumption was to be used this year, it was evident that at the end of the year the stock would be greatly above what was ordinarily required in the navy. He had not the least reason to suppose, from what the noble Lord at the head of the Government said—for he was in a very “Rule Britannia” mood to-night—that the Vote next year would be less; for all his arguments were in favour of a larger Vote next year, especially if there should be a good harvest, and if the export trade should be increased. Still, with the views of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, if he (Mr. Bright) had the drawing up of those Estimates, and if he wished to raise the stock from 50,000 to 60,000, or even 70,000 or 80,000 loads, the best course would be to propose a moderate sum this year and a moderate sum the next to make a gradual increase, and thus replenish the stock, without coming down in that particular Session with so enormous a Vote; because it was quite clear upon all the evidence, and upon all the facts stated by the hon. Members for Sunderland and Montrose, there could be no reason for the extravagant Vote submitted to the Committee. The fact was that the business of the Admiralty was perhaps the most extraordinary in the way of extravagant and reckless expenditure that any legislative Chamber had ever had to consider. It was clear from all the evidence brought before the Commission that there was not a particle of substantial control over the expenditure of the Admiralty. There were a good many men of business there—he would not put the question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had a supreme contempt for any matter like that, or he would not have addressed such observations as he had done to the Committee—but suppose they took the level of the largest class of business firms of Lancashire or Yorkshire, they would find that £100,000 a year might be set down as their average expenditure in raw material, repairs, wages, &c. A million of money would give ten of those firms, and £12,000,000 would stand for 120 of them. And how were these firms managed? There were 120, or more probably 240 managers of those firms—men who thoroughly understood their business—they had the greatest possible interest in its success; they rose at six o'clock in the morning, and continued at their task until six o'clock in the evening—and, in short they were incessantly employed in the management of their business transactions many of which had a good deal of what might be called routine in them, for there were steam-engines at work, cotton to put in and take out, but not a great deal of change; and yet all that labour was gone through that at the end of the year there might be a profitable result. But what had they here? An expenditure of £12,000,000; and managed by whom? Why, the other day the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) was the President, presiding genius, general manager, and controller of the expenditure of £12,000,000 in the Department, of which—speaking without offence—he knew literally nothing. The right hon. Baronet knew just as much as he (Mr. Bright) knew, as the average of the Members of that House knew, and no more. Well, now they had a noble Duke in the other House of Parliament who knew no more than the right hon. Baronet did—little accustomed, probably, to extensive book-keeping, and not at all to ship-building. If they were to go back many years, and take all the First Lords of the Admiralty, and put them to manage one of the business firms which he had alluded to, in all probability in the course of two or three years they would find them very anxious to get out of them. But here they had this great business of £12,000,000, which was managed, not by First Lords only, but by civil Lords and sea Lords—as they were called—who did not agree well together either as to what they should do and what they should leave undone. And then they had the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty who sat in that House, but who, it was said, had no great authority at the Board, and was often driven to the painful necessity of defending in that House things which his own judgment would not recommend, and of abstaining from doing things which his own judgment would have led him to do. If they were to go down to the dockyards they would find confusion from beginning to end, and it was nothing but the love for labour of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, which nothing could surpass, that could have induced him or any other man to plunge into these inquiries with the idea of disentangling this chaos into which the finances of the country were brought by the present extravagant and reckless expenditure. Yet if a Member of that House, representing a large constituency oppressed with taxes, rose in his place to complain of this enormous expenditure, he was told by the noble Viscount that he was not patriotic, and he did not care a farthing about the supremacy of his country at sea. The noble Viscount had even the effrontery to say that Gentlemen whose great transactions were upon the sea were not even careful about the security of their own property; and that he was the man to take care that they were not ruined by their economic fancies. He said the noble Viscount was not treating this subject as he ought to treat it in his eminent and responsible position, and probably, ere long, the noble Viscount would find that £70,000,000 a year of taxes was much more than the people of this country ought or could pay. The noble Viscount would allow him—and with no unfriendly feeling—to tell him that he had placed his Chancellor of the Exchequer last year and this year in whatever difficulties he had found himself in contesting his policy with his opponents in that House. If last year the noble Viscount had had the good sense not to go beyond the extravagant expenditure of his predecessors, and if this year he had with a firm hand cut off some of these extravagant Votes, such as that which had been objected to by his hon. Friend that night, he would have left the finances of the country in that condition that all the ingenious and intense hostility to the Chancellor of the Exchequer manifested on the other side of the House would have found itself wholly baffled in the attempt to have found any fault worth listening to with the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman either in this or last Session of Parliament. He (Mr. Bright) was quite sure that there was no more honest Friend to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, than the Member of that House, whether he sat on the benches below the gangway or the benches behind him, who told him that he did not sufficiently care for the extravagant expenditure of the country, and was not sufficiently conscious of the fact that every hundred pounds which was expended more than was absolutely necessary, whether it be brought about through a wrong policy abroad, or through a reckless management at home, came out of some man's labour, some man's sweat, and was itself the purchase money of the sufferings and misery of some portion of the people. He (Mr. Bright) had not meddled much of late in this matter, because he found that the House was not well disposed to listen to arguments in favour of economy; but he must indeed be a blind, an ignorant, and a foolish man, who did not see that the time was coming when the expenditure would have to be diminished, and when the taxes would have to be more reduced than was even now proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or there would be a contest between the people of this country and its Government, such as the noble Viscount did not wish to see, and such as he (Mr. Bright) would be as unwilling to see as the noble Viscount himself.

MR. HENLEY said, that as he had taken some part in a former debate on this subject, he trusted he should be excused if he offered a few observations at the present moment. He should not attempt to follow the hon. Member for Birmingham in his somewhat discursive speech, because it really was a speech on the general expenditure of the country rather than on this particular Vote. If there were those 120 separate heads of Admiralty management of which the hon. Gentleman spoke, each coming for a separate Vote, with 120 responsibilities, they would have to refer again to a Committee upstairs to see how they could contrive to get through the public business. Probably the hon. Member only used it for an illustration, and did not wish to throw the Admiralty into the hands of 120 people, although his speech certainly went in that direction. The immediate question before the Committee was that of timber. Now, upon this point he was of opinion that if there were any one question on which the Admiralty would have no difficulty in defending itself, it was upon this of keeping in hand a sufficient stock of timber. He did not think there was any man—he did not care who he was—but who, on looking at what the consumption of timber had been for the last ten or twelve years, at what had been the orders of the respective Boards of Admiralty, and at what work had not been executed, must see that what was called the establishment of timber was wholly insufficient. Timber, such as we required, ought to be two or three years in store, and if it was not it was unseasoned and unfit for use. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) was looking into his Report; but that Report did not begin at the beginning, and hardly touched upon the question of timber at all. It was gone into at great length by the Committee on Dockyard Economy, and these facts were distinctly brought out—that for ten or twelve years past the consumption of timber in the navy had been ranging at something like 25,000 or 30,000 loads a year; that the Admiralty had been ordering a certain number of vessels, which were not completed; that two-thirds only of the work ordered had been done; and that, consequently, two-thirds only of the timber which would otherwise have been consumed was consumed. There had been no provision during those ten or twelve years for that accruing deficiency, and, therefore, when at the end of ten years there was a sort of spasmodic effort made by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) to fill up the gap, and to get ten ships of the line and a number of frigates which they ought to have had, but had not, the store of timber broke down. It was said that it was a great feature in Sir Baldwin Walker's character that he found out there was no timber in the dockyards. Sir Baldwin Walker might have known that by asking any person who chose to look into the stock of timber and the amount of work ordered by this House. With the Report of the Dockyard Committee, showing how many loads of timber each ship would take, it became as clear as the sun at noonday that they must build with unseasoned timber. It was so apparent to him that he thought it right to call the attention of the House to it. A good deal of unseasoned timber had been put into these ships, and they would require a great deal of repair in consequence. What occurred with the gunboats? They had had to pull them to pieces and do them up again, and did they suppose that these ships of the line would not come into the same category? To put a hot boiler next to unseasoned wood was a safe receipt to produce rot. Whatever expense might be thus occasioned ought to be saved. Whether the French had 50,000 or 100,000 loads was nothing to us. It was the duty of our Government to keep our arsenals full of good timber, so that if the occasion should come there would be the timber ready for use. English oak was not fit for use until it had been three years in the dockyards, and those yards were now cleaned out. There was a very low stock of timber in the dockyards, and it was a first duty of the Government to get that stock up again. He did not want to go into general matters further than to remark, upon the observation of the hon. Member for Birmingham as to the amount of property at sea, that property at sea could be insured, but the honour of the country could not be insured except by proper ships and armaments. They might go to Lloyd's and insure property at sea, and it might be even better to get money instead of goods, but the honour of the country could not be insured except by stout ships and good men in them. He did not believe that any one who had looked into the question, and knew that unseasoned timber was used, would blame the Government for buying any quantity of good timber upon which they could lay hands. As to whether they would hereafter have iron ships, it was an uncertain matter, and the repairs of the ships which they now had during the next eight or ten years would take a large quantity of timber. In one respect he agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham. He did not think that the country would go on standing £70,000,000 a year of taxes. The hot fit had gone on for a long while. He had seen cold fits, and he thought a cold fit would come again. He believed that the Government—he did not care who they were—had been behind rather than before the country in the matter of expenditure, and that no Government could have held their hands, so determined was the feeling to be satisfied that the national defences were in a proper condition. He thought, however, that before long the pleasure of paying £70,000,000 a year for it would make people think somewhat differently, and there would be a great necessity for a reduction of expense. It was his firm conviction, however, that the Vote for timber was an absolute necessity and an economical expenditure of money, and he should, therefore, cordially support the Government in the Vote.

COLONEL SYKES denied that for the last fifty years the naval supremacy of this country had ever been in doubt. Even when the Navy Estimates were as low as £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 per annum our naval supremacy was as high as ever it was, and at present we had an armament equal to the navies of the whole world. He could not, moreover, admit that our naval supremacy depended on our having these 80,000 loads of timber in our yards. It is stated that an average of 50,000 loads are sufficient to meet all the ordinary requirements, the difference therefore, might be struck off the Vote, as the hon. Member for Sunderland proposed. In respect to other charges, it appears that in the last year's Estimates there were £15,000 for yachts and furniture of superintendents' houses, and £7,943 for boats. Were there, he asked, similar sums in the present Estimates? It seemed from the want of method in our dockyard that it was impossible to determine the exact cost of a ship. In India a system existed which insured an accurate knowledge of the outlay for any particular purpose. Stores were only issued upon indent and against each article issued in a parallel column, the price or cost was attached and the simple addition of this column, gave the total cost for whatever purpose the stores were issued. Could not that be done in the British Navy? Another question he asked of the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget) — had he turned his attention to the machinery which had recently been invented, and by which a boat 33 feet long could be made in ten hours?

MR. CONINGHAM said, that the proceedings of the Admiralty in past years showed that they did not pay due attention to the discoveries of science, or take advantage of results which had been clearly seen by others. Year after year they had demanded large Votes for timber, and then, when they had got a wooden fleet greater than the fleet of all the world, they were startled by the announcement that France was ahead of them in iron steamers of a size and power that would blow all their ships out of the water. A revolution had taken place in ship building; iron was substituted for wood, and the result was that Government now came down and demanded a larger Vote for timber than ever they had done before. Could anything be more illogical? He trusted that the hon. Member for Sunderland would test the sense of the Committee on the subject, and if he did he should certainly give him his support.

MR. CHILDERS complained of the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty telling the House they had no alternative but to agree to this Vote. He thought the French Government, however despotic, had proceeded in a much more regular way with their naval budget. He wished to know whether, when he stated that the French supply of timber amounted to 160,000 loads, he meant English or French loads? If French, he believed, the amount would be about 90,000 English loads. He hardly thought the French Government could, as a commercial operation, have procured the quantity of timber in the time.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the load of timber in France was 40 cubic feet, and those were the loads which had been referred to. The grounds upon which his noble Friend at the head of the Government had stated that there were 160,000 loads of timber in the French dockyards were that, according to the last accounts received by the Government, there were at Cherbourg 29,000 loads; at Brest, 30,000; at Toulon, 37,000; at Rochefort, 26,000; and at L'Orient, 25,000, and 7,500 ordered. Hon. Gentlemen asked what would be the result of this Vote. He trusted that if the Vote was agreed to we should probably have at the end of the year a stock of 82,000 loads. At the rate of expenditure which prevailed last year, that would give us one year's, or at the usual rate two years' stock in hand. It had frequently been said that our navy outnumbered the united navies of the world. Hon. Gentlemen were very much in error if they supposed that any such great superiority of force existed on the part of this country. He had received accounts of what was doing in the French dockyards, which showed that the Government was not only justified from time to time in keeping up the stock of timber, but that they were imperatively called upon to consider what further exertions were to be made in the preparation of iron-plated ships. His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) might very possibly be incredulous, but he could give not alone the names of every ship which had been laid down in the French dockyards, but the date of her being put upon the stocks, as well as her present condition. Since he had the honour of laying the Estimates on the Table of the House nine iron-cased frigates had been either laid down or were being laid down in France. In addition to the six iron-cased ships whose names were given in a former debate, the Provence had been laid down at Toulon in the present month; her model being an improvement on that of La Gloire. The Savoie had been laid down this month, also at Toulon. At Brest, the Rovanoche was laid down in March, the Magnanime in May, and the Gauloise and Valeureuse at the same port. The Heroine and the Surveillante had been laid down at L'Orient; and there was another iron-cased vessel, whose name was as yet unknown; completing the number which he had stated. His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland might laugh; but he did not believe he would do so if he shared the responsibility devolving on Her Majesty's Government. His noble Friend at the head of the Government had been charged with an inclination to sing

"Rule, Britannia!" but he did not believe either the hon. Member for Birmingham or the hon. Member for Sunderland would be averse to join in the chorus. As the intelligence relating to the construction of these ships in France rested on the very best authority, the Government would be neglecting their duty to the country if they neglected to make corresponding preparations.

MR. DALGLISH said, much stress had been laid on the fact that timber required to be seasoned. But of the £700,000 worth of timber bought last year, £200,000 were expended on teak timber, which it was well known did not require seasoning. English oak was one of the most expensive kinds, but as the large class of ships for which it was principally used were less in favour now than heretofore, he thought a considerable saving might be effected under this head. Unless we were to continue the "spasmodic effort" referred to by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire, he could not conceive on what grounds this Vote could be asked for.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he could not understand the strong opposition to the proposed Vote for timber, of which less would be required in future years if a large quantity were now purchased, the only question being whether the Government should have it in store or not. It might be against the mercantile interest of the timber dealers that Government should have the power of laying in a large stock at a cheap rate, but it certainly must prove beneficial to the country. A case occurred not long since when timber could be bought for 4½d. a foot; but as soon as it was known that Government was in the market, the price rose to 7d. He thought the Government would do well to provide for laying in a large stock, by entering into contracts extending over a considerable period. The Motion of the hon. Gentleman ought not to be looked at as one dealing simply with timber; it formed part of a general scheme to cut down the Navy Estimates by one-third.

MR. WHITE said, that this was the first time this Session he had taken any part in the discussion on the Estimates, because he found that a vast amount of time was consumed without any good result. He was confirmed in the opinion he had previously entertained of the hopelessness of attempting to effect a reduction in the national expenditure, by the statement contained in the admirable work of the accomplished gentleman (Mr. Erskine May), who sat by the side of the chairman, that

"With a few exceptions, so trifling as to be almost ridiculous, it will be found that the annual Estimates have been voted without deduction."

And it is stated

"That in 1858 the only instance of a successful Motion of an economical character was afforded by the notable case to which the House eliminated from the Estimates the travelling expenses of the Fine Arts Collector of the Royal Academy."

He grounded his objections to the Vote on the statement of the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget) himself, who said that contracts had already been made for timber to the full amount asked for. He should be sorry to use harsh language towards the noble Lord, or to say that this seemed like raising money on false pretences; but he put it to the candour and fairness of the noble Lord, whether he ought to submit an Estimate to a Committee for nearly a million sterling, founded upon contracts already made, without placing those contracts before the House. He thought, too, it was something like a false pretence not very creditable to Government that they should pretend to give these Estimates with the minute accuracy of odd figures. Why, Sir, instead of asking for exactly £949,371, did not the noble Lord say at once that the Government wanted a million to pay for timber which they had entered into contracts to purchase? He did not wish to obstruct public business, or he would have moved that "the Chairman do report Progress," in order that those contracts might be produced before the money was voted. Under any circumstances, he could not see that the honour and glory and supremacy of the country depended upon the House voting the whole amount now asked for timber, and he should, therefore, support the Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL said, the hon. Member who had just sat down ought, as a man of business, to have known that contracts for timber, to be of any use at all, must be entered into early in the year. It might be the fault of the Government, though the House was also to blame, that the Estimates were postponed till this time; but if the contracts were delayed till the month of June the consequence would be that no timber would be obtained this year at all. On the general question he might state, as having some knowledge of the timber trade, that the Government could not possibly have selected a better year than the present to make purchases in. The general tendency of the price of timber was to advance, because every year they had to go further into the forests to obtain it; but this tendency was corrected in the present year by the low rate of freights, and the general disorganization of trade.

MR. LINDSAY said, he was very much surprised to hear the hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Mitchell) say that this year, of all others, was the best for laying in a large stock of timber. The average price of teak was from £10 to £11 a load; this year it was from £16 to £17. This was surely no evidence of the present being a favourable season for the contract. He wished, however, to narrow the discussion. He would not go into the question of the number of French war ships or the quantity of timber in the French stores, though he suspected that there was some mistake in respect to them. But what he wished to fix the attention of the House on was the supply of timber to our own yards for the present year. The noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty said that this million of money would purchase 73,000 loads of timber, and that we should thus have 80,000 loads of timber in store. Taking the ten years from 1848 to 1858, he found that the greatest quantity stored in any one of those years was 40,000 loads, and the least 18,000 loads. If those quantities were sufficient when we were building nothing but wooden ships, what did we require with a stock of 124,000 loads—the sum of the 51,000 now in stock, and the 73,000 proposed to be purchased—at a time when the Admiralty admitted that it was not desirable to build wooden ships of a large class, and that we must go with iron vessels? He asked the Committee to take £300,000 off the £1,000,000, and if they did so they would still leave the Admiralty much beyond the amount expended in an average of ten years during which wooden ships alone were being built.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £949,371, for Timber, Mast Deals, &c. be reduced by the sum of £300,000."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 66: Majority 36.

Original Question again proposed,

MR. LINDSAY moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. An important constitutional question was involved in what the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget) had stated regarding voting on these items. He desired that a copy of the contracts which had been entered into by the Government should be laid on the table of the House. It was a sheer waste of time for him to come down night after night to discuss these questions, and for the House to consider them, if they were to be told that the Government stood pledged to these votes, and that the House must bow to them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was sure the House would be ready to hear the arguments which any Gentleman wished to urge upon this question. The particular Vote before them had been already well discussed on both sides, and he hoped that the hon. Member would not persist in the Motion which he had made.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON confessed, that he had been much struck by the very unusual language of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. He had supported the Government upon the merits of this question, but he was surprised to hear an argument put forth the tendency of which the House could not but regard with jealousy. The effect of the statement made by the noble Lord was that the House had no option but to agree to a Vote in any case in which the Government had entered into a contract. Of course it must be necessary for the Government occasionally to enter into contracts, but such contracts should be made subject to the approval of Parliament; and, at all events, the argument employed by the noble Lord was not one that ought to be used in that House.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was absolutely necessary to purchase the timber from year to year, and to give the contracts from one to three years in advance—undoubtedly, all contracts were subject to the approval of the House; but it was perfectly clear that they should never find timber contractors willing to go to the expense of sending out ships for a supply of timber if they were told that their contracts would not be binding until it received the approval of Parliament next year. If a plan could be suggested to meet that difficulty, Government would be very happy to consider it. He hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lindsay) would not press the Motion.

MR. BRIGHT asked if there would be any objection to place on the table the particular contracts to which the noble

Lord had referred? He did not know that there was any special mystery in the timber trade. Contracts for spirits and other articles were made public, and he did not understand why an exception should be made in the case of timber. Perhaps the hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Mitchell) could tell the House if there did exist any particular mystery about the timber trade, seeing that he had already stated several things which hon. Members had previously been quite ignorant of. He did not see any reason why they should not get the particulars they required in regard to timber. He did not like to say he disbelieved anything that was said on the Treasury bench, but he thought it possible that the contract might not include the whole sum named in the Vote. A million of money for timber was a very considerable sum, and the House ought to be furnished with the fullest information regarding it.

MR. BASS asked if the noble Lord would give the exact price on which the contracts for the timber were made?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET held in his hand a statement of the cost of each class and article of timber that was to be provided under the Vote. It was possible that certain portions of the timber might not arrive within the time proposed, owing to ships being lost and other causes.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that last year they were told they were bound to fulfil a contract made by the Admiralty. The House of Commons, however, on that occasion decided by a considerable majority that it was not bound by that contract. It was essential for the House to know how long these contracts had been entered into. He doubted whether the Departments ought to enter into large contracts without the sanction of the House of Commons.

MR. BAXTER wished to know in respect to what other items in the Estimates the Government had entered into contracts? If there were any more contracts, the proceedings of the Committee were almost a farce.

MR. MITCHELL said, that so far as he knew, there was no reason why every contract should not be laid on the table. It would, however, be better that the returns should have a more extended shape, and include all the contracts for transport during the last ten years. If the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) would move for such a return he should cordially second the Motion.

MR. BRIGHT said, he did not complain that the Government had made contracts for moderate and usual supplies, but that they had ordered an unusual quantity of timber under circumstances that did not justify such extensive contracts. He hoped the noble Lord would consent to the return; but, as it would be better to confine themselves ad rem, he saw no reason for gratifying the antiquarian researches of the hon. Member for Bridport.

COLONEL SYKES thought it was not necessary to enter into contracts without the consent of the House when they sat seven months in the year.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had been asked for the date of these contracts. He regretted to have to mention the date of one of them, because it was made when the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) was at the Admiralty, and anticipated the Parliamentary Vote by two years. There were two contracts for English timber—one for oak, dated January 28th, 1859, and the other for elm, dated January 16th, 1861. The contracts for Italian oak, African timber, and Spanish and Mexican woods, had been taken at various periods, from 1859, to 1861. He had no objection to lay the dates of contracts on the table; but as to the prices he was not sure, without inquiry, whether it would be advantageous that they should be published.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had found no fault with the Government for entering into these contracts; what he said was that it was very unusual that that House should be told that they had no option about passing a particular Vote because the contracts had been already entered into by the Government. He hoped he should never hear such an expression again.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £271,757, for Metals and Metal Articles, be reduced by £71,757."

MR. LINDSAY moved that the item of £271,757 for metals be reduced by £71,757. Much of this metal consisted of bolts and knees for wooden ships, and, as it was not considered advisable to go on building large wooden ships, these bolts, &c., would not be wanted. Another charge under this item was for anchors. He would not enter upon the controversy between Mr. Trotman and the Admiralty further than to say it was now ten years since he sat upon a Commission appointed to inquire into the merits of the different anchors. Six of the Members of that Commission were well known and large owners of vessels in the merchant service, comprising Mr. Duncan Dunbar, Mr. G. Marshall, and other eminent shipowners, and the other six were gentlemen connected with the Admiralty, including Admiral Stopford, Admiral Hope, and other competent judges. The Commission took three months to test the various anchors, and the conclusion to which they unanimously came was, that the Admiralty anchor was the worst of the lot. Since that time the Admiralty continued using the condemned anchor and no other, and the manufacture of anchors had never been submitted to public competition. For twenty years one firm had held the contract at the price fixed twenty years ago, though every one knew that Nasmyth's hammer and other inventions had materially reduced the cost of fabrication. For seventeen anchors the Government paid to the contractors £3,434 '17s. 6d.; whereas the market price for such anchors made by the most eminent firms was only £1,428. Such being the case in regard to the cost of anchors, there was reason to conclude that the cost of other articles was also much too great, and he hoped the Committee would not consider him unreasonable in now moving that the present item be reduced by £71,000.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY thought some explanation should be given of the reason why Mr. Trotman's anchors were not adopted. It was stated that an anchor of Trotman's, weighing 15 cwt., and costing £90, was equal in every respect to an Admiralty anchor costing £365. He understood that the Admiralty were endeavouring to transform some anchors of Porter's into Trotman's anchors. He thought it would be very much better to discard all the anchors now in use instead of attempting to convert them, and to substitute anchors on Trotman's principle.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, there were two things which the hon. Member for Sunderland had not told the House—one was, what principle guided him in the reduction of £71,757 which he had fixed upon; the other was, what was the reason why the Commission to which he had alluded considered the Admiralty anchor the worst of the five. The relative merits of these anchors was not a subject upon which a landsman could form a very good opinion. He (Sir John Pakington) had frequently asked different naval officers as to the respective merits of the anchors, and they had invariably told him that Trotman's anchors when once they took hold of the ground were the best; but that they could not rely on their biting; and that, therefore, upon the whole the Admiralty anchor was the safest, because they could always depend upon it taking the ground.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that Captain Denman spoke very highly of Trotman's anchor, and so also did the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, whose opinion he (Sir John Trelawny) had before him in a pamphlet.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that Captain Denman's opinion was formed on his experience while in command of the Royal yacht the Victoria and Albert; but, as they all knew, the Victoria and Albert was never exposed to very heavy weather.

MR. CONINGHAM wished to know why the contract for these anchors was not thrown open to public competition?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET was an advocate for opening all contracts as far as possible, but the last contract he would put up to public competition was that for anchors, because the anchor was an article on which the sailor should be able to depend. There ought not to be any risk on an article so important. There was always an annual dispute about anchors in that House, and some hon. Gentleman always described the Admiralty anchor as the dearest and worst. In point of fact, however, Trotman's was really the dearest. Trotman had never made anchors for the navy above the class of from 30 to 49 cwt. The Admiralty anchor cost £2 3s. the cwt.; Rogers' anchor, £2 4s.; Porter's, £2 8s.; and Trotman's, £2 10s. per cwt; though Mr. Trotman would probably write a letter to the newspapers to-morrow denying the statement. With regard to the question of converting the anchor now in use, Government had in the dockyards a lot of Porter's anchors, which were very similar to Trotman's, and a certain number were being converted into Trotman's anchors. He had little doubt, however, that the Report on them would be that they had certain advantages and certain defects; but that, upon the whole, the defects outweighed the advantages. If an anchor did not bite at once the ship would drive three or four cables' length, and for anchoring in line of battle they were obliged to have an anchor that would bite at once.

MR. LINDSAY said, a Commission had reported ten years ago that the Admiralty anchor was the worst, and that Trotman's stood highest. Trotman's anchors did not require to be so heavy as others, and, therefore, they were the cheapest, though they might cost more per cwt. One reason why he asked for a reduction of the Vote was because he had reason to know that anchors were manufactured at a much cheaper rate by private makers than by the Government contractors. Believing that there were many other points upon which the Vote might be reduced, he should take the sense of the Committee.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he had found Trotman's anchors both convenient and efficient, and never observed that they were slow in biting.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he was afraid the Committee were not very competent to decide this controversy. Had he correctly understood the hon. Member for Sunderland to observe that not only were there Admiralty contracts for anchors running twenty years, but that the price charged was the same as that charged twenty years ago?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was not the fact that the price of anchors remained always the same, because they depended on the market price of iron, and the price lists of Messrs. Brown and Lennox were revised from time to time. He also explained that it was owing to more ships being in commission that there was some increase in the Votes.

MR. LINDSAY wished to ask, whether it was the fact that seventeen anchors, which had cost the country £3,434, could be obtained of the trade at £1,428?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET had never heard of any such charge; and he might add, that the Admiralty were always open to tenders from the trade.

MR. BRIGHT said, the reason the noble Lord had given of the increase in this Vote was because more ships were in commission; but in a subsequent Vote he had asked £50,000 less for coal; and coal was dearer this year than last.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET explained that the Chinese expedition had greatly increased the charges for coal in the last Estimates.

Question put,

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LINDSAY moved the omission of the item of £100,000 for iron for an iron-cased ship to be built at Chatham Dockyard. He had no desire to stop the building of iron-cased ships; but he objected to the Government undertaking the work, because private firms could do it better and for less money, and the workmen in Her Majesty's yards were wholly inexperienced in the art of constructing vessels of iron; and he objected to the selection of Chatham, on account of the difficulty of the navigation of the Medway, and because there were no facilities there for the construction of iron-cased ships. It was impossible to say where the expenditure at Chatham would end if once commenced, for the dockyard would have to be extended and improved, new plant for the building of iron-cased ships would have to be provided, and the sum of £100,000 included in the present Vote could only be regarded as a third or fourth part of the cost of constructing a single ship. He also agreed with the Dockyard Commissioners in thinking that the building of iron-cased ships should not be carried on in any of Her Majesty's dockyards under the existing system of accounts.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £100,000, for Iron for an Iron-cased Ship to be built at Chatham, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. CONINGHAM seconded the Motion. The Government were the worst manufacturers in the world, and the work performed by them ought at once to be placed in the hands of private traders. He had seen plans of a proposed extension of Chatham Dockyard, the ultimate cost of which would not be much below £1,000,000. While the Government were insisting on a larger expenditure on timber, they called on the Committee to launch into this new expenditure for making a gigantic dockyard, and for iron ship building at Chatham. He protested against it. He had the strongest conviction that the whole was a most abominable job, if they could only get at the bottom of it.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH observed that the proposed extension of the dockyard at Chatham had been recommended by the late Mr. Rennie many years ago, and had nothing whatever to do with the construction of iron ships. Mr. Rennie's object was to increase the floating surface in the yard which is at present very insufficient. There was great space for effecting this means of working economically, and advantages of every kind. The work would be performed by convict labour; and he only objected to the time that would be occupied in completing it. The great value of Chatham Dockyard was in its position, for by reason of its distance from the coast, and the protection afforded by the defences of Sheerness, it was secure against the sudden attack of an enemy's fleet. He thought it most desirable to have one iron vessel built in a Government yard, if only to test of the resources of the public establishments in these matters, and to experiment on the various modes of construction. Any one who has read the correspondence with the builders of the Warrior must be convinced of the advantage that would arise from this. There was no end to the alterations which had to be made, the whole thing being an experiment. There was no reason why an iron vessel might not be as well and economically built at Chatham as in any private dockyard. The Commissioners had stated that the present system of accounts would not enable the Government to form any test of the prices charged by private builders; but they had the assurance of the noble Lord that the system of accounts would be immediately altered, and everything in that respect would be placed on a more satisfactory footing.

MR. BRIGHT said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham was scarcely an impartial counsellor in this matter. Possibly if he had been Member for some other constituency a film might have fallen from his eyes, and he might have agreed with the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay). As for the argument about this being a test of expenditure, everybody knew that the building of a first ship was no test of expenditure. The cost of a first ship, a first steam engine, or anything of the kind for which a model was required, was half as much again as any subsequent construction. The hon. and gallant Gentleman might as well set to make his own coat, and having ascertained the cost, think he could better judge whether his tailor imposed on him. This was the most flimsy argument he (Mr. Bright) had ever heard. This Vote reminded him of that which was proposed some years ago for the dock at Keyham. That Vote remained on the Estimates for nearly twenty years; and at the end of that time, after a million of money had been spent, a Committee of the House reported that the whole scheme was a mistake, and they would not recommend the House to spend another sixpence had it not been for the previous outlay. They did, however, recommend throwing more good money after bad; and what the result was he (Mr. Bright) did not know. He wished to know whose scheme this was of building an iron ship at Chatham? Who recommended it? Was it the noble Lord or the noble Duke? What were the views of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) on the subject? All that the Committee knew was who would have to pay for it. He thought the matter should be referred to a Committee, upon which he should be happy to see the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Frederic Smith) who might represent the interests of his constituents in the matter—and it would be found whether or not the Government had a good case for going on with the scheme.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET observed that the Vote had no connection with the proposed dock at Chatham. He hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion to a division. He was bound to say that part of this iron had been ordered. It had been decided by the Government as a matter of urgency that an iron vessel should be built in a Government yard, and Chatham was chosen, for various reasons, as being the most eligible dockyard in which to commence such a vessel. It was not solely with a view to make comparisons of cost that the Admiralty were building this iron vessel, but to enable them to carry out certain experiments and make any alterations which might become necessary in consequence of the extraordinary problems which were in process of solution in regard to the power of artillery, and the resistance of iron plates during its construction. Chatham was chosen because there happened to be a very large dock finished, all but the gates, and the building of such a vessel in a dock would be attended with important facilities.

MR. DALGLISH observed that the noble Lord, when out of office, found great fault with the Admiralty; but now, when he was in office, his views were quite changed. The ironworks at Chatham consisted of a mere wreck of a smithery—a perfect disgrace to a dockyard—and yet the Admiralty now declared that that yard was best fitted for such works as were proposed. He should support the Amendment, and he hoped the hon. Member would take the sense of the Committee upon it.

MR. FINLAY thought that experience had shown that the dockyards could not compete with private builders. At present we contracted for steam machinery, and he could not understand why we should not contract for iron ships. If once machinery was created in the dockyard for building iron ships there would be a continual demand for fresh outlay, lest what had been spent should remain useless.

CAPTAIN JERVIS wished to know whether it would be attempted to make wrought-iron plates in the dockyards?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the iron skins of ships would be made at Chatham, but the armour plates would be made elsewhere; he believed by the Butterley Company.

MR. HENLEY thought the Committee should have some information of what the whole expense of new machinery in the yard would be when they were asked to agree to the adoption of a new sort of manufacture. It was said that the plan should be tried for two reasons; first, that the Government should have an opportunity of making changes and experiments; and next, that they might know what the real cost was. But it was desirable that the Committee should not come to any decision until they knew what would be the whole expenditure in the dockyard. If the factory at Chatham was the wreck it was said to be, it was quite clear that other sums would be wanted to make it fit for the operations which were intended to be carried on there.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS asked whether the Achilles was only in contemplation of being built or whether the keel had actually been laid?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the keel of the Achilles was not yet laid, but a great deal of ironwork intended for that ship had been done. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, he had to say that when last year the Admiralty decided to build the Achilles at Chatham, an application was made to the Treasury for its sanction to expend £4,000 in erecting machinery, and the correspondence upon the subject was printed with the Estimates. Having spent £4,000, they now required £2,800 for further machinery.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR thought the question was whether, as our fleet was about to become an iron fleet, we should have the means of repairing the ships in the national dockyards. He regarded this commencement at Chatham as a proper experiment to ascertain whether iron ships could be built and repaired in the dockyards, instead of in private establishments.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE considered this was a very important question, involving not a few thousands only, but no less than £1,000,000. No doubt contract work was sometimes cheaper than Government work; but then in shipbuilding in private yards there was never any absolute security for the quality of the article produced. Hitherto the principle adopted had been to incur the greater expense of building in the Royal yards instead of having ships which might be cheaper, but upon which you could not depend when the pinch came; and the gunboats built at the time of the Crimean war were an unfortunate instance of the latter case. The question now was whether they ought not in common prudence to compete in the Royal yards with private builders in the construction of iron ships. He doubted the wisdom of trusting entirely to the contract system. As he understood it, these were not purely iron ships, but wooden ships covered with iron casing. Then, again, there was as much difference in the quality of the iron supplied as there was in the quality of timber. He was prepared to vote with the Government on this question, thinking that, on the whole, the course they proposed was the more prudent one.

MR. BRIGHT said, no doubt there was as great a difference in the quality of iron plates as there was in the quality of timber, and he feared they should find that the moment the Government embarked in this kind of business they would discover that it was absolutely necessary to begin the manufacture of the iron plates. By sanctioning this Vote, therefore, the Committee would be really establishing another large business. His hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) had shown from the Report that ships cost 50 per cent more in Government than in private yards; but even this calculation did not include the interest of money sunk in plant, and if this were taken into account it would probably be found that a ship cost double in Government what it did in private yards. This would, no doubt, hold good of iron as well as of wooden ships. The factories which would be necessary at Chatham would be of the most expensive character—and, in fact, the House of Commons would be doing in the future what they were continually lamenting having done in the past. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish), who had served on the Commission, and who knew all the circumstances, told the Committee that nothing could be more unadvisable than such an expenditure; and they would be embarking in it without any inquiry and without any information beyond the very hesitating and ambiguous information furnished by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty. He warned the Committee that this Vote was but an ambushade, and that year after year they would be led into enormous Votes, until they found that they had spent a million of money, as at Keyham, with unnecessary and reckless waste. No one but the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham had shown himself enthusiastic about this expenditure, and he thought the noble Lord at the head of the Government might therefore very well suspend the Vote and allow an inquiry, which, if the Government were right, would only confirm the scheme they had propounded.

MR. ROEBUCK: I hope the House will consider whether it is wise to build these iron ships at all. A constituent of mine recently called upon me and told me that he had offered the First Lord of the Admiralty to build a gun at his own expense which would throw 1,000lbs. of shot; and remarked, "What do you think he said to me?" I replied, "God forbid I should attempt to fathom the wisdom of a Lord of the Admiralty." He then said the answer he got was, "It is not in my department." My constituent made the same offer to the War Office; and he said, "Do you know what answer I got?" I replied, "If I were unable to divine the wisdom of a First Lord of the Admiralty, do not fancy I am bold enough to attempt to fathom the wisdom of a Secretary of State." He then said the answer he got was, that if he submitted his plan they would consider whether it was worthy of being accepted. I asked what would be the effect of his gun, and he said it would go through the sides of the Warrior as easily as through blotting-paper. If that statement were true, there would be little wisdom in building vessels like the Warrior.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in replying to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish), denied that the smithery at Chatham was a ruin, and said that it was quite as good a smithery as any in the other dockyards. With regard to the statement made by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck), if it were even true that a 1,000lb. shot could be easily sent through the sides of the Warrior, that would not alter the merits of iron-cased ships as compared with wooden ones. If they had only shot to deal with the superiority of the former might not be so marked, but unfortunately they had to deal with shell, and especially with a new kind of shell, filled with liquid iron, which was very murderous, and very destructive to wooden ships. The main superiority of the iron-cased ships was that they were safe against shell.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 66: Majority 35.

MR. LINDSAY said, he would make an appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He had given notice that he should move various other reductions; but he did not want to take any step which might appear factious, or uselessly to take up the time of the House. The principle of three of his Amendments had been already discussed, and therefore he did not propose that it should be discussed over again. He was ready to yield these points, provided the noble Lord would consent to postpone the Vote of £140,000 for two troop ships and £60,000 for machinery for those ships until the report of a Committee of which he was Chairman, which would be made in a fortnight, had been laid on the Table.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, at that hour of the night he could not resist the postponement of the Vote till to-morrow, but he could not consent to the postponement till a Report of a Committee was laid on the Table, as that might be postponing it for an indefinite period.

OFFENCES IN TERRITORIES NEAR SIERRA LEONE PREVENTION BILL.

SPAIN AND SAN DOMINGO—THE SLAVE TRADE.—OBSERVATIONS.

Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Offences in Territories near Sierra Leone Prevention Bill read.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he highly approved this Bill. He thought it absolutely essential that the extension proposed by this Bill should be given to the jurisdiction of Sierra Leone. He considered that this Bill improved the constitution of that colony, and tended to increase the benefits which we had given by it to the unhappy people of Africa, being, as Mr. Pitt once said, a very, very small compensation for all the evils we had been a party to inflicting upon them. Those evils had been continued to the greatest extent, and in a far greater degree than any act of ours, by the extension of that jurisdiction, how beneficial soever, could tend to remedy—he alluded to the atrocious conduct of Spain in that increase of the African slave trade, which, notwithstanding the treaties entered into, and the sums of money actually paid to that Power as compensation, had increased from 12,000 slaves imported into Cuba in 1857 to 16,000 in 1858, and to no less than 30,000 in the year 1859. Now, we found that Spain was increasing her dominions in the West Indies by the annexation of Eastern San Domingo; and he was by no means satisfied with the assurance given him when he last mentioned this subject in the House, that there was no intention on the part of the Spanish Government to introduce slavery, and thereby also, as a consequence, the slave trade, to that territory. Having had access to the decree of annexation by the Spanish Government since he last addressed their Lordships, he found it stated that “it was impossible to reject the prayers of a whole nation imploring readmission into the bosom of the mother country.” So said the Spanish Government. What said the Governor of Hayti, General Geffrard? He distinctly called that statement an absolute falsehood. He denied that there was any imploring of the people of the Eastern territory to be admitted into the bosom of the mother country; and he added that in the circumstances of the country it was utterly impossible that the free-will of the people could be known; for General Santana had established the reign of terror so entirely over them that "they," to use General Geffrard's own expression, "trembling under it, could manifest no free-will." The decree stated that the annexation of San Domingo had taken place, and the same decree went on to say—

"Already the Spanish flag is flying under that sky where the immortal Columbus had borne it, with the Gospel in his hand, to plant that civilization the most glorious of all then known."

Royal memories were proverbially short, and in this case the Royal memory of Spain was no exception to that rule; for had the Spanish Government recollected their treatment of Columbus, they would have been ashamed to name the man whose immortal services they requited by sending him home in chains, which were struck off, no doubt, in deference to the popular indignation, but which he demanded should be buried with him when a few years afterwards he died in absolute want. It was also a sample of short memory on the part of Spain that she referred to "the Gospel which he carried in his hand," and which the Spanish Government had desecrated by a series of constant ruthless persecutions. And as to the civilization which they bragged of having given to the New World, it was testified in their exterminating the natives by packs of bloodhounds. He observed that the decree said—"Slavery, the inevitable evil of the other colonies, is altogether unnecessary for the cultivation of that fertile territory." Was San Domingo more fertile than Cuba? Nothing of the kind. And it went on to add that "there is no intention of re-establishing slavery there." He did not know what the intention of the Spanish Government might be. Perhaps there was no intention of establishing the slave trade when the Spanish Government bargained for a sum of money and engaged to put it down instead of extending it. Nevertheless they had extended it. The means by which they announced their intention to carry on the Government of their new acquisition were not such as gave him any very great confidence in their want of intention to establish slavery there. For to whom did they entrust the execution of this decree? The execution of the decree of annexation was entrusted to the Captain General of Cuba, who was to take the necessary means of carrying it into execution. Now, if there was a Captain General in all the world whom he should trust less than another for not planting slavery again in San Domingo, it would be the Captain General of Cuba—that he should have absolute confidence in him for extending the establishment of slavery in that part of the Spanish dominions. He had no hesitation in saying that he regarded with the utmost possible suspicion this conduct of the Spanish Government; and, recollecting their conduct on the slave trade in the island of Cuba, he was not in the least degree moved by the disavowal of their intention to introduce slavery into San Domingo, being perfectly convinced that they would re-establish it there if they had any temptation to do so. It was well known that Cuba had now been for years and years a refuge for the distressed nobles of the highest rank at the Court of Madrid, when sunk in poverty by their own extravagance and loaded with debt, and who returned from the colony in a year or two afterwards full of plunder, which plunder consisted of the bribes paid to them for the evasion of the abolition law and the introduction of slaves in that island.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL. COMMITTEE. FIRST NIGHT.

Order for Committee read.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, in the first words I venture to address to the House, I would beg to call the attention of hon. Members to the terms of the Motion of which I have given notice. They are—

"That, whereas the embodiment of the principal financial proposals of the Government in one Bill unduly increases the power of the Government over the taxation of this country, and the interests thereby affected, limits inconveniently the action of this House, and would annul the well-ascertained function and privilege of the House of Lords, it be an instruction to the Committee to divide the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, so that each of the taxes to which it relates may be separately treated."

I gave notice of that Resolution, I trust, in no spirit of presumption. It would be ridiculous on my part to attempt to dictate on a constitutional question to the House; but I had no opportunity of giving notice of the Motion till the last day before the recess; and I felt that my position as a humble but independent Member of the House required that I should in this notice give a clear expression to the objections which moved me as an independent Member of the House to take the course I do. It is not, however, my intention to submit to the consideration and decision of the House, either of the abstract propositions which are contained in this notice; although I firmly believe that each of these propositions is true—that the form of this Supply Bill tends to confer upon those who represent the power of the Crown in this House an undue control over the taxation of the country; and an undue influence over the interests thereby affected. Although I hold also that the form of the Bill limits inconveniently the action of this House; and although I further hold that if adopted this form of Supply Bill will annul the well ascertained function and privilege of the House of Lords—a function and privilege the exercise of which was admitted to be rightful by a Committee of this House which was appointed last Session to consider this subject—I will now only submit for the decision of the House the operative part of the notice which stands in my name. I, therefore, now move—

"That it be an instruction to the Committee to divide the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, so that each of the taxes to which it relates may be separately treated."

Sir, I am told that an impression has gone abroad that I am unduly intruding on the time of the House, and that the object of my Motion is unnecessarily to obstruct the progress of the Government business. I most emphatically disclaim the truth both of the one and the other of these imputations; because the House will recollect that, although an attempt was made to discuss upon the second reading of this Bill the form in which as a Supply Bill it has been proposed by the Government; although an attempt was made to discuss the effect of that form upon the free and legitimate action of this House, and upon the privileges of the House of Lords, that attempt was found to be utterly futile. For, as we proceeded, we were crossed in debate upon the constitutional question involved in the form of the Bill by discussions on the several substantive proposals contained in the Bill; and, as each substantive proposal was different from the other, such was the confusion of the debate that no issue could be taken on the second reading of the Bill but a question of confidence in the Government who proposed it. This, then, is the first occasion on which the questions arising out of the form of the Bill can, according to the rules and orders of the House, be distinctly submitted for our decision; and I most sincerely lament that, owing to the circumstances in which the different parties in this House are placed, the subject has fallen into my hands, for I should not have undertaken so grave a task had it not appeared to me that it had fallen to my lot and to have become my duty to beg the House to consider the gravity of the questions which are involved in the form of the Bill proposed by the Government. Now, I think that what occurred on the second reading must have satisfied every hon. Member that, on that stage of a measure of this sort, including, in the present instance, as I hold unduly and improperly the imposition of the income tax, the repeal of the paper duty, and the imposition of the Customs duties upon tea and sugar, no distinct issue could have been taken on either of these matters of finance separately, but merely a vote of confidence or a vote of want of confidence in the Government, who are responsible for the form of the Bill. To raise that issue is not my object, and it ought not to be the object of the House to raise it; because the function and the privilege of the House of Commons has hitherto been to discuss and decide independently upon the different items of taxation which the representatives of the Crown may submit to it for alteration, revision or imposition; and to do this apart from any consideration of confidence in the Government, who, although they are the representatives of the power of the Crown still in matters of taxation stand, after the proposal on the part of the Crown has once been made, simply in the position of Members of this Assembly, to which in this free country is delegated the high privilege, the great power and the duty of deciding what taxes shall be levied upon the people. Sir, I know that I may be met by the allegation that, owing to the fact that no tax can be imposed except it be submitted to this House in a preliminary Committee of the whole House, and that in that Committee we have sufficient opportunity to discuss separately the items of taxation which are brought before us by the representatives of the Crown, and that the Resolutions to which we come after such discussions in that Committee ought to satisfy the people of this country that we have paid due attention to their interests. But there is one fact which utterly disproves that allegation, and that fact is this: that so little are the decisions which are taken in the preliminary Committee regarded as final, conclusive, or satisfactory by those who framed the Orders of this House, that when it is primarily decided that any duty is to be lessened or diminished by a Resolution of the House, and this decision is communicated to the heads of the department, who are entrusted with the administration of the tax, upon the Resolution being reported a bond is taken from every importing merchant or other person dealing in the article so taxed, which, in case Parliament should not adhere to its first determination, binds those who avail themselves of the remission of duty to pay the difference on the final adjustment of the law. Now, I think that that one fact is sufficient to prove, that, according to the practice of the Constitution, the House of Commons ought not to be satisfied with a single opportunity of deciding what shall be the taxation for the year. Well, Sir, how stands the matter? According to the usual practice of the House for many years up to this year, the substance of this Bill—the proposals made on the part of the Crown in this Bill—would have been divided into three bills instead of being consolidated into one. And what is the difference which that makes in the treatment of these matters by the House. Why, that according to the form of this Supply Bill we have only one first reading, one second reading, one Committee, one consideration on Report, and one third reading of one Bill, whereas we ought to have three Bills, three first readings, three second readings, three Committees on the Bill, three considerations on Report—if there were any Amendment in Committee—and further, three opportunities for discussion on three third readings. Now, if these various opportunities for discussion and decision are to be held as useless; if any Member of the House is bold enough to assert that the forms of this House, which have been declared by the highest constitutional authorities to be the means by which we are chiefly able to guard the freedom of the subject, are no longer of any value, then he may consistently declare that the form of this Bill is what it ought to be, and that the more and the sooner we get rid of those useless forms the better. But where, I ask, is the bold man who will tell me that the forms of proceeding adopted by this House and by Parliament, as the necessary safeguards of the liberties of the people of this country, as the means by which we are able to bring our deliberations to such an issue as shall best secure their welfare; where, I ask, is the bold man who will tell me that these forms are useless, or that it is either right or safe practically to abolish so many of them in the manner now proposed? Sir, I believe that no person will be bold enough to make such an assertion; and I say this fearlessly, although I am aware that, upon this subject, I am opposed to the opinion which is entertained by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge. I lament that I differ from him, but I must say that it was with astonishment I learnt that the right hon. Gentleman who represents the University of Cambridge, and who stands high amongst the constitutional authorities of this House, was the author of two recommendations, neither of which were adopted by the Committee on Tax Bills over which he presided; one of these proposals recommended a departure from the form which our taxation has assumed owing to the burthen of the debt, and the constant and enlarged requirements of the public establishments, and would have suddenly rendered a great portion of our taxation annual, and therefore precarious. And, then, how did the right hon. Gentleman propose that we should consider the questions involved in the annual repeal or continuance of this vast mass of taxation? Why, by means of a Supply Bill, to be framed upon the model of the present; which would debar us enormously from the opportunities of free discussion, by limiting the time that we should have allotted to us for deliberation. By this system the Government of the day gain all the power that the House lose by the curtailment of its opportunities not only for deliberation but for decision upon the questions involved in this consolidated financial scheme. I do not know whether the House is yet conscious of the enormous power which we are granting to the Crown by this Bill. It may seem a bold assertion, but it is the fact, and I beg the House to consider it, that you not only by this Bill abandon four stages at least upon which you might consider the propositions included in this Bill, but you render the decision that might be taken on the first reading, on the second reading, and on the third reading of the consolidated Bill, a decision not with respect to any one particular item of the taxation with which it deals, but a decision with respect to the confidence which the House may repose in the Government of the day. Clearly, Sir, that enables the Government of the day to appeal to every supporter, to appeal to the whole House for support, not merely upon the matters contained in the Bill, but upon the general issue; whether, not only in this respect, but in other respects the Government are worthy of the confidence of the House and the country. This form of Supply Bill goes far towards defeating the power of the House to deal practically and independently with the subject of taxation. That, Sir, is the fact. When the Bill has once been introduced we are limited to one single opportunity—if no Amendment is made in Committee on the Bill—the opportunity in Committee, of considering in detail subject matter which, according to the usual practice of this House up to the present year would have been divided into three Bills, instead of being included in one. Sir, I regard this as a most mischievous infringement upon the freedom and upon the power of this House. We may, indeed, be told, as we have been told already, that it will be for the convenience of trade, for the convenience of the interests affected, that the several financial proposals of the Government should be consolidated in one Bill. And how does the matter stand? Are all those interests the same? Are all to be affected alike by these different proposals, some for the imposition, some for reduction, and some for the repeal of taxes? Why, it is obvious that the interests affected, are affected, not only differently by the mode in which you propose to deal with the taxation to which they are subjected; but, being different in their circumstances, they require, some of them, for their convenience the immediate confirmation by law of the proposed changes. While with regard to others it is essential that there should be postponement until those concerned have had an opportunity of considering the matter and instructing their representatives what changes they conceive will be for their advantage; what form of imposition will be the least onerous, and what period will be the most convenient for the proposed changes to take effect. Why, only last year it was made sufficiently obvious upon the Stamp Duties Bill that, if you would consult the interests of trade by the manner in which you deal with taxation, you should treat every tax separately according to its merits and the effect which the change of it is likely to have upon the particular interests concerned; and I say that if you are to consider the interests of trade, as it has been the practice of the House of Commons to do, and as I hope it will continue to be the practice of the House, I say if you are to consult the interests of trade you will by sanctioning the proposal which I now submit to the House be enabled to consider severally, as we did last year, the various interests which are affected by the different matters of taxation included in this Bill, otherwise you can scarcely do so. Sir, I feel that as this question is not taken up by the leaders of the Opposition in this House, it is a question that ought to be raised by the independent Members on the other side of the House. I have been a Member of this House for some time, and in former years I have known no hon. Members so averse to any undue increase of the power of the Crown over taxation, no hon. Members so careful that taxation should be considered with due reference to the various interests affected thereby, as hon. Members, who hold advanced liberal opinions. But on the present occasion we know that there is one question involved in this Consolidation Bill which so entirely absorbs the attention of the leaders of that party, and that the reins of party organization on the other side of the House below the gangway have been drawn so tight, and that their new discipline is so severe, that, whatever their private opinions may be upon the merits of the grave question now at issue, we can scarcely hope for more than their silent votes, even if the subject attracts their notice sufficiently to induce them to vote at all. The authority and practice of Mr. Pitt have been adduced in support of consolidating the financial proposals of the Government in one Bill. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle has adverted to the precedents afforded by the great measure of 1787, and by the financial dispositions made under the Act of Union in the year 1800; and I admit that the financial arrangements of those years were so remarkable that they may well be cited as marking peculiar epochs in the financial history of this country. What were the circumstances of 1787? I have, Sir, by me here an account of the discussions which took place in that memorable debate given by Bishop Tomline in his Life of Pitt; and, with the permission of the House, I will read a short extract from it. It states that "Mr. Pitt further proposed that," instead of keeping separate and distinct funds as at present—(this was 1787)—

"The produce of all taxation whatever should form one general fund, to be called the Consolidated Fund, out of which the public creditors of every description were to be paid, and the surplus of which was to be applicable, under the direction of Parliament, to the service of the current year."

Why, Sir, any one who refers to history will find that previous to that year the different taxes were held separately by a vast variety of independent functionaries; were collected separately, and were charged separately, with the debt of this country, under its then various denominations; that nothing could exceed the minute division and attendant confusion of that system, and that when Mr. Pitt undertook to introduce the great measure of that year, not only did he propose to deal with the whole taxation of the country, but he proposed to deal with the whole manner of appropriating the produce of the taxation, and in the same measure he included the provisions necessary, so far as the action of this House was concerned, for the ratification of a treaty with France. That was, indeed, a financial Resolution. It was a vast operation in finance; and its vastness may be proved by this one fact, that in order to carry into effect the proposals which he then made, Mr. Pitt was obliged to submit to the consideration of, and to carry through, this House not three Resolutions such as those upon which the present Bill is founded, but 3,000 Resolutions; and I put it to the common sense of the House whether it was practicable for any Minister to carry through Parliament in one Session 3,000 Bills. To cite that precedent, then, in justification of the form of the present Bill, is perfectly absurd. The action of the House at that time was by the universal consent of Mr. Burke, of Mr. Fox, of Mr. Sheridan; of the Opposition, and of the independent Members, that the House virtually suspended the standing orders in order to effect a vast financial revolution fraught with the most happy consequences, involving changes unparalleled in the financial history of the country. I repeat, that it is ridiculous to cite such a precedent as that for the action year by year of this House in dealing annually with the taxation of the country. Sir, every Chancellor of the Exchequer is not a Mr. Pitt; and, until we are secure of an annual succession of Mr. Pitts, I protest against our attempting annually to copy the form of procedure adopted on the occasion to which I have referred in order to effect that vast financial revolution; were the House annually to follow that precedent we should be inflicting upon the country the uncertainty which is entailed by the adoption of revolutionary principles in finance. Well, Sir, what is the other precedent afforded by the practice of Mr. Pitt, which the right hon. Gentleman has cited? The operation of 1787 included a treaty with a foreign Power; and so far as that goes I would observe that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were really a disciple of Mr. Pitt, he ought last year, not this year, to have adopted the precedent of 1787. But, Sir, I was about to advert to the circumstances of the year 1800, and the Act of Union. That involved not only a financial but a political revolution. Are we annually to act upon the precedent afforded by the measures which were necessary to consolidate the Parliaments of two nations, which had, theretofore, governed independently two distinct nations combined in allegiance under one Sovereign? Are we to avoid our usual practice and adopt the system which was necessary in the year 1800 to consolidate the finances which had previously been under the control of two independent Parliaments? On the contrary, I hold that no precedent established by Mr. Pitt shows that he approved of any such invasion of the general custom of Parliament and of the Orders of the House of Commons as would be involved by our annually following as a precedent the exceptional action which he found necessary first in 1787, and again in 1800.

I shall not go further into precedents. I will now address myself, humbly address myself, to the common sense and common knowledge of the House; for I believe that, in the financial history of this House and of this country, you may find a precedent for almost anything. At times this House has been fawningly subservient to the Crown. At times this House has restricted the action of the Crown through the financial operations which were always its peculiar privilege. At times this House has been obsequious to the House of Lords. At other times, finding that the power of the Crown was unduly combined with the power of the House of Lords to inflict an oppression through taxation upon the people of the country, as in the time of the Stuarts, this House has resisted the power of the House of Lords, but in resisting the power of the House of Lords it duly limited the power of the Crown in matters of taxation which by the present Bill you are vastly extending to the prejudice, I say, not only of the privileges of this House but to the prejudice of the freedom of the people. It is common to say, and common to think, that because the power of the Crown is exercised by Ministers in this House that, therefore, the powers of the Crown and the powers of the House of Commons are identical. Sir, that is not the fact. Although the power of the Crown in matters of taxation has been separated almost entirely from the personal will of the Sovereign, the power of the Crown is still very great and totally distinct from the powers of this House. No taxation can be originated except it be suggested by the representatives of the Crown. No tax can become law but by the assent of the Crown. Therefore, at the beginning and at the end of each financial operation, the power of the Crown comes in. True, the Ministers who exercise this power now sit in this House. But are they only financial Ministers? Are they not invested with vast and increasing patronage which day by day by an increase corresponding to the increase of the public expenditure is extending its ramifications, not amongst the aristocracy, as has been held by the hon. Member for Birmingham, but into the middle classes, reaching the administration of our local affairs, controlling the free system of self-government which has been our boast, and year by year encroaching upon the liberties which our forefathers won, and which we have inherited. And,

are we, the representatives of the people of England, in these days of struggle for constitutional freedom against despotism, which is raging throughout the world, when the cause of constitutional freedom is further imperilled by the present disturbances in America—are we about to make over to the representatives of the Crown each year a share of power over the taxation of the people, which no House of Commons has ever habitually entrusted to the representatives of the Crown, whether they sat within these walls or elsewhere? That, Sir, is what we are asked to do by this Bill; and, it is my strong feeling that not only is it wrong to do this now, but that we are likely to establish a precedent which may be used hereafter to control this House, to damage and to lessen the freedom of the people, and to impair our power of resistance against aggression, to an extent which I am happy to say, has not for centuries been suffered by the free people of this country. Hon. Members opposite may hope that, on the present occasion, having what they deem to be a popular, but a very minor object to accomplish, they will be able to cloak before the face of the public the true nature of the action they are now taking. But, I warn them that it ill becomes the advanced liberal party of this country to invest the Crown, not the Ministers of the day only, but by establishing this precedent, the Ministers of the Crown, whoever they may be hereafter, with a control over the taxation of the country, which it is the especial function of this House to guard and to regulate. I confidently assert, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that there is no precedent in the annals of this House for the last century and a half, which can fairly be adduced to justify the course we are now invited to adopt. It is because I entertain this feeling strongly, and because I feel that the exceptional practice of Mr. Pitt has been cited without due warrant and without just application, that I as a very humble but independent Member of this House venture to suggest, not in a party sense, for I am afraid that party organization on this side of the House will be used against me, that this is a matter on which the House should not lightly give its decision, at all events, not without some assurance and security that the form of the Supply Bill, which we are now asked to consider, shall not be held the type of future Supply Bills, and that we shall not hereafter be asked to grant to the representatives of the Crown a power which the House of Commons has never habitually conceded. The circumstances of the present day upon the Continent of Europe are such, as I should think must direct the attention of the House to this subject. Austria has opened her Parliament, and of what does Hungary complain? She says, "You have given us a Parliament, but you have not given the representatives of our nation power over taxation;" and nothing can be abler than the mode in which that fact, and the consequences, to be apprehended from it, have been brought before the Hungarian Parliament in the statesman-like speech of M. Deák. Then, what is the history of Poland? That was formerly an elective monarchy, to the action, and to the failings, and to the dangers of which form of government you are assimilating the Constitution of this country. Vast patronage, and great power were collected in the hands of the Sovereign of Poland who was elected. What has been the history? what the real cause of the loss of freedom by Poland? Why, that organized agitation stimulated faction, stimulated a struggle between the various elements of the State, each striving to obtain the ascendancy. It was not originally foreign invasion, but these internal struggles which invited foreign intervention and thus eventually proved fatal to the freedom and independence of Poland. Again, what is the history of Venice? In the hands of the Doge, an elective Sovereign, was reposed vast power. What did that lead to? To perpetual struggles of faction for possession of the supreme power of the State until at last the liberties of Venice were virtually lost. And what do we see this very day in the United States of America? We have seen a gradual increase of power by patronage collected into the hands of the President. And what is the condition of the United States? Why it is avowed that corruption has spread widely throughout the Republic; and that the removal from office of vast bodies of officials at the sole will of the changing — the ever-changing executive power has shaken its institutions, until at last we see them unable to control the several parties, the differing elements of the State, until we see a division and a separation of the great republic. If you adopt this system, and in addition to the increased patronage which has been allotted to the Crown you impart to it increased power over taxation also; you will give a stimulus to the struggles of party, an incitement to ambitious men to grasp this power, and an inducement to subordinates to assist them in their object, that will drive to utter insanity the party struggles of this House, and centre them upon—what? Why, upon questions of finance. Are we, then, to countenance a system of annual financial revolution? Are we to enter upon a vast and an unlimited game of "Beggar my neighbour?" Are we to merge all considerations in the choice of Ministers in this one point. Who is to be trusted; who is to be feared in matters affecting the private property of individuals; what Chancellor of the Exchequer will be least dangerous in the administration of this vast power which we shall have granted to him, as the representative of the Crown, over the taxation of the country and the interests thereby affected? Sir, it appears to me that, if we have had reason to lament the exacerbation of party struggles hitherto; if we have had reason to lament the short duration of Ministries, by this system we are incurring the danger of still further exacerbation of party struggle, and are entailing upon this country the probability of still more frequent changes of Government; I do hope that the House will consider it unbecoming for the reasons I have ventured to state, thus to abandon, in favour of the representatives of the Crown, an amount of power over the taxation of this country, which has never hitherto been habitually conceded by Parliament. Sir, I am unwilling longer to detain the House. Nothing but a strong sense of duty would have induced me to bring this question under its notice. What I ask the House to do is this, not to imperil its own dignity, not to limit its own freedom, not to abandon its peculiar duties by sanctioning this form of Supply Bill for an object, which I hold to be totally inconsistent with the dignity of this House. For that object is simply this, by an unworthy stratagem, to cripple the House of Lords in the exercise of a function and a privilege—their exercise of which, their right to which, and their occasional use of which, we only last Session sanctioned by the solemn resolutions of this House. Now, I have no right, and I have no wish to become the feeble advocate of the House of Lords. They have their privileges, and I think they will show this House that they can guard them; for if this House should resort to stratagem in order to oust them of their rights, they have means by the use of which, whilst avoiding the extreme issue, that you wish to thrust upon them, they will be able effectually to guard the freedom, which is as dear to them as is the freedom of this House to ourselves. The object of this stratagem, of the measure now before us, is to compel the House of Lords, who cannot alter but may reject, to accept the Bill, knowing that it might be dangerous for them to reject the whole of the financial propositions of the year; and by this stratagem it is hoped that the free exercise of the judgment of the House of Lords upon one item of taxation, will be so crippled and so cramped that they may, not out of consideration for, or from good will towards this House, but on compulsion, slip through a financial change, of which it is possible they may disapprove. I ask whether the circumstances of the present time, whether the position of the House of Lords, whether anything in the conduct of the House of Lords can justify our attacking them, not openly by passing a Bill for the repeal of the paper duty, as a separate measure, and telling them that that is the will of the House of Commons, but by such an unworthy stratagem? Is there, I say, anything in their conduct which can justify such a proceeding? By Resolutions of this House we have, I maintain, sanctioned the action of the House of Lords last year in rejecting the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty. And we know another thing. We know that their decision was thoroughly in accordance with public opinion. And in this House we know yet another thing. We know that it was in accordance with the opinion of the majority of the independent Members, who voted on the third reading of that Bill; for the majority which carried that Bill to the House of Lords was only nine, and we know that the Government can command forty votes in this House. I contend, therefore, that it is a misrepresentation to say that the House of Lords rejected a Money Bill which was passed by the independent majority of this House. The truth is this: the House of Lords differed from the Financial Minister of the day upon the propriety of abandoning about a million of taxation when there was a deficiency. And, Sir, I believe that if the Members of this House could even now be polled by their consciences, it would be found that the vast majority of them rejoiced to see the House of Lords extend a safeguard over the credit of this country, which the independent Members of this House had been overborne in seeking to extend over it by the power of the Government on the last division of this House with respect to the paper duty. That, Sir, is my firm belief; and I, for one, would humbly beseech the House to retain its power; at all events to assert its rights, and not to suffer itself to be crippled by this form of Supply Bill; but to assert, I hope, finally, that it will not be betrayed into attacking the House of Lords by an unworthy stratagem, when we have no reason to believe, but, on the contrary, have every reason not to believe, that the House of Lords would, in defiance of our decision, summarily reject a Bill for the repeal of the paper duty, if that Bill passed through this House in accordance with our usual and long-tried practice, and were thus formally submitted for their free and independent judgment. I beg to move—

“ That it be an instruction to the Committee to divide the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, so that each of the taxes to which it relates may be separately treated.”

MR. SPOONER seconded the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think that the few moments of silence which have passed since the hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate) sat down may fairly be construed as an indication that the House conceives that this subject had already been thoroughly discussed. Not, indeed, from any disrespect to the hon. Gentleman—for the manner in which he has stated his argument is worthy of all attention—but simply from the respect which I am bound to pay to the time and convenience of the House, I do not propose to repeat in any extended statement the considerations that have been laid before the House on prior occasions, in which the importance of the subject justified our entering upon it to almost any degree. Sir, I do not think that the hon. Member has succeeded—nor did I think that any one could have succeeded—in presenting what is at once new and material, in the view of this question, from the point at which he himself regards it. However, I observe that he has treated it in a great degree with reference to the injury which he thinks the present form of proceeding is likely to inflict upon the powers of this House in the discussion of a financial measure. Well, Sir, I admit that we have not heard so much said upon that aspect of the case in former debates as upon its other aspects; but I must say that I think the reason why we have not had so much said of it is, that that department of the question is, in the sense in which the hon. Member regards it, entirely hopeless and incapable of yielding any useful result. When the Government introduces its financial measures in separate Bills, it has the power of separating them by any interval of time whatever. It may ask the House to dispose of one Bill before it gives the House the opportunity of passing any vote upon another. Surely the hon. Member will not maintain that that arrangement is favourable to the power and freedom of this House. Well, Sir, in introducing the measure now before the House, one of the points on which we relied was this—that experimentally and practically, in the course of the debates of last year, Gentlemen opposite found themselves, I may say, compelled, by considerations of practical convenience, to combine together in one Motion what were not comprised at that period in one Bill—namely, the two rival propositions, as they then were, with respect to the paper duty and the income tax. And surely there cannot be a clearer practical proof of the convenience to the House in the combination of these proposals in one Bill than the fact that when they were not combined in one Bill it was only found necessary, by a proceeding which was, perhaps, somewhat irregular in strict Parliamentary usage, though it was commended by good sense and convenience, to present them in combination to the notice and discussion of this House? The hon. Member says that the House has but one opportunity, in consequence of this mode of proceeding, of considering these several questions. Sir, I never heard a statement that appeared to me to be more erroneous. The House has in the first place an opportunity of considering—

MR. NEWDEGATE rose for the purpose apparently of explaining; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeding with his address without giving way; and Mr. NEWDEGATE nevertheless attempting to gain a hearing, and cries of “Order” arising—

MR. SPEAKER said, that it was the rule of the debate that the Member addressing the House was in possession of the House, and need not give way unless it was his pleasure to do so. Any hon. Member desiring to make an explanation would be allowed the opportunity of doing so after the Member who was speaking had resumed his seat.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If I had been stating anything that was in the slightest degree a matter of feeling or reproach to the hon. Member, I would willingly have given way; but I was pointing out how entirely erroneous his statement was, and what are the opportunities, according to the present form of debate, that are enjoyed by the House of considering the financial measures of the Government. The first effect of our proceedings is, that, whereas, in the ordinary course of things, we should have had no preliminary Committee whatever on the Paper Duties Bill—and the Motion for leave to introduce the Bill would only have given the House the limited opportunities of speaking which are accorded when the House sits as a House—we had the opportunity of discussing in Committee the Resolution for the repeal of the paper duties. The next opportunity of discussing the whole of these subjects separately and individually was upon the Report of the Resolutions, when again each of them was separately and distinctly brought before the House. The first reading of the Bill I will not mention, because that is the stage when, with the fewest exceptions, no Motion is made. We then come to the second reading; and I believe that by the practice of the House in recent years it would have been perfectly competent to any Gentleman on the second reading of the Bill—if he objected to the measure as a whole—to have opposed it as a whole, or to have opposed such a particular feature of the Bill as he might have thought open to reprehension. Then we come to the Committee on the Bill; and there is another occasion in which the fullest and largest liberty is afforded to any one of discussing every proposition separately. We then have the Report from the Committee when, likewise, a similar opportunity, as far as it can be enjoyed by the House, is enjoyed of dealing separately with each portion of the Bill. And if the hon. Member thinks that these five stages are insufficient for the discussion five times over of any point contained in the Bill, it is then open to him, consistently with the forms of the House, to move the recommitment of the Bill, for the purpose of satisfying what still remains unsatisfied of his appetite for discussion; and that Motion for the re-commitment of the Bill may, I believe, be repeated and accepted by the House as often as Members may deem fit. So then, I think, the hon. Gentleman, if I gather his argument aright, has entirely failed in showing that there is any abridgment of the real privileges and powers of the House in the form of proceeding that the Government has adopted. I affirm with confidence, on the other hand, that there is a great extension of that power and liberty of discussion; because, in fact, the repeal of the duty is presented to them in the form of preliminary Resolutions, and in immediate connection with all those other propositions to which, upon this occasion, it has a natural relation. The hon. Gentleman says, indeed, "There was the case of Mr. Pitt. Mr. Pitt combined various matters in one Bill, but then that was a different affair, for he had three thousand Resolutions instead of three." The hon. Member places himself in this predicament, that he objects to our joining together three Resolutions in a Bill; but if we brought forward three thousand Resolutions then he would have no objection. Then, he contends, we should be completely sheltered by the example of Mr. Pitt, to whom, however, he to-night accorded the very questionable praise that he proposed a measure of revolutionary finance. The hon. Gentleman has referred also to the aspect of this measure as a defence of the privileges of this House, and as a vindication of the sole and exclusive right of the House to deal with matters of Supply, and to adjust the revenue and charges of the year. I do not know on what account the hon. Gentleman calls this an "unworthy stratagem." It is a proceeding perfectly consistent with precedent, and a proceeding entirely conformable to the principles of the Constitution as they bear upon the powers of this House—it is a proceeding with regard to which there has been no suppression or concealment practised. We have desired to do that which should indicate the joint purpose with which the proposal was made, and at the same time we have desired to avoid doing that which would give an offensive aspect to the proposal. If that proposal be made to carry an offensive aspect, I must say it appears to me it is a great deal more owing to the hon. Member and to others who have treated it as a measure aimed at the privileges of the House of Lords than to anything said or done by the Government. The hon. Member has again fallen into an error which I hoped would have been avoided after the discussions we have had. He said that the House of Lords may not alter a Money Bill, but may reject it. I should like to know where it is that the hon. Member has learned that the House of Lords are possessed of a power of rejecting in any sense in which they are not possessed of a power of alteration. No doubt you may quote the dicta of important persons in the House of Lords; but the dictum of a Member of the House of Lords does not bind the House of Lords; and by no proceeding has that House ever surrendered, as far as I know, the right of altering a Bill, even though it touch a matter of finance. If I might say for my own part, though anxious to vindicate the privileges of this House against the House of Lords where need may arise, yet I think that the House of Lords is right and wise in avoiding any formal surrender of the power even of amendment in cases where it might think it justifiable even to amend a Bill relating to finance. The privileges of the two Houses of Parliament, from their nature, are best maintained by the good sense and wisdom of the two Houses in putting them into action from time to time, and I do not think that any advantage would be gained by a surrender which, at any rate, the hon. Member is entirely in error in supposing has been made. I shall not enter further into a discussion of this proposal, except to observe that nothing could be more inconsistent—indeed I might say ludicrous—than the adoption of the Motion the hon. Member has proposed, in order to prevent what he calls—in a phrase which I should like to challenge were I before the Civil Service Commission instead of in the House of Commons—"the embodiment of the principal financial proposals of the Government in one Bill." The effect of this proposal would be that we should have five Bills at least—perhaps a good many more—one for the income tax, one for tea, one for sugar, one for chicory, and one for paper. In point of fact, the hon. Member would lead us to a mode of proceeding which is as entirely without precedent in the financial proceedings of the House, as it is, I think, without foundation in reason, or in the convenience of the House, or in the principles of the Constitution and the practice of Parliament.

MR. SPOONER said, he thought his right hon. Friend—if he would permit him to call him so—was mistaken in the manner in which he accounted for the momentary silence which followed the speech of his hon. Colleague. At the conclusion of that address the House naturally remained silent, expecting that the right hon. Gentleman would get up to answer a speech which it felt peculiarly to him to answer. But no real answer had, as he believed, been given to it by the right hon. Gentleman. It was true as the right hon. Gentleman said that the House of Lords had the power of altering a money Bill. That was so no doubt; but at the same time they all knew that the House of Commons always rejected money Bills which had been so altered; and the limitation of the powers of the House of Lords in that case was as effective as if it had been laid down in express words. He would not upon that occasion enter into a consideration of the general question at issue. He only rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to one very peculiar circumstance in the course which had been adopted by the Government. Could the right hon. Gentleman cite any case in which a Supply Bill, thrown out by the House of Lords in one Session, had been brought in during the following Session, not by itself, but coupled with another most important measure, which would prevent the Lords from fully and freely exercising one of their undoubted privileges? The proposal to repeal the paper duty was at present accompanied by another most important measure; and under those circumstances, much as the House of Lords might object to that proposal, they might feel it inexpedient to insist on its rejection. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman would have acted far better if he had followed the precedent of last year, and sent up to the House of Lords the same Bill which had been sent up to them upon that occasion. That was the view which he took of the question which had been raised by the Motion of his hon. Colleague; and he earnestly hoped that the House would not be misled by the stratagem of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but would insist that the proposal for the repeal of the paper duty should be left to be decided by the House of Lords upon its own special merits. It could not be said hereafter that the measure, as it stood, had been passed "with the consent of the House of Lords," for it might fairly be supposed that it had received the sanction of that House solely in consequence of the disinclination of its Members to throw into a state of confusion the finances of the country. No doubt, the House of Commons had the sole right to originate taxes; but when a tax was once imposed its maintenance or remission affected the credit of the country, of which the House of Lords was bound to take care as much as was the House of Commons. For these reasons he should support the Motion of his hon. Colleague.

MR. HORSMAN regretted that he found himself compelled to vote against the Motion of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Newdegate), because there was much in his speech and still more in the meaning of his Motion as a condemnation of the form in which this Bill was presented to the House with which he agreed. But he must say that he concurred with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that after the discussions which had taken place upon this subject this Motion was inconvenient in form, and would affirm a principle which was most inaccurate. If the hon. Gentleman desired to take any issue upon this subject he ought to have taken it upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Macdonogh). Upon that Motion there were two nights' discussions without a division; and it was too late now to raise this technical difficulty. When he saw the Amendment upon the paper he thought that it would occasion much embarrassment to many Members who agreed with the hon. Member for Warwickshire, and that embarrassment would be increased by the change which had since been made in its terms. It was always inconvenient to raise a question by an abstract Resolution; but they were now to vote upon the last two lines of the Motion only. But they could not separate those lines from the preamble which had been withdrawn. Although they were merely to say that it should be an Instruction to the Committee to divide the Bill, they could not separate that Instruction from the reasons which had been given for its adoption. Those reasons affirmed a much larger principle than the House was at that moment ready to entertain. He himself objected to the form of this Bill, because it was an undeserved rebuke to the proceedings of the House of Lords last year; because it was a "tack" to a Bill of this year of one which had been rejected by the other House last Session, and because it combined two Bills which, although they both came under the general description of Money Bills, were, in reality, measures of totally opposite characters. The Amendment passed by all these objections, and, as originally drawn, asked the House to make a declaration which would have been applicable to all future years, even though no circumstances such as those of last year existed to render it desirable that it should be acted upon. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed to declare by the preamble of his Bill that it was desirable that in all future years all financial proposals should be included in a single Bill, many of those who would support the Bill would have objected to such a declaration; and he thought that it would be equally unwise to declare that in future years it was inexpedient that all measures of finance should be included in one Bill. They all agreed that the relations of the two Houses of Parliament with each other, and their rights and privileges, could not be defined by any strict rule of law, but must be left to the discretion of the Houses. All questions as to disputed rights and privileges had hitherto been settled by compromises. His objection to the Amendment was that it would afford a fallacious indication of the opinion of the House, as many who agreed with the view entertained by the hon. Member would be unable to vote for his Amendment. As the subject had already been so largely debated, it would not only be more convenient to the House, but would, he thought, tend more directly to attain the object which the hon. Member had in view, if he refrained from passing his Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in explanation, said, the complaint which he made was not, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there had not been sufficient opportunities of discussion, but that there had not been sufficient opportunities of dealing with the several heads of taxation included in this Bill. The object not only of his speech but of his Amendment was that this House should retain the power, not of discussing only, but of voting on the several parts of the financial scheme of the Government, which this proceeding practically abrogated. Had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) been present at the commencement of his observations, he would have known that he absolutely withdrew the abstract proposals contained in his Amendment, and that he invited the House to retain the power of dealing with the financial proposals of the Government in the same manner in which they were treated last year.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he wished to state the reasons why he could not vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire. For the reasons stated by the hon. Member for Stroud, he did not think it expedient at the present moment to bring forward any Motion. He thought that if his hon. Friend wished to raise a discussion on the particular merits of the proposal for the repeal of the paper duty he ought to allow the Bill to go into Committee, when he could have brought forward a Motion directed to that particular subject; and if his hon. Friend did not approve the form in which the Bill came out of Committee, he could have moved its recommitment. In the main principle embodied in the Motion, however, he thoroughly agreed, and the junior Member for North Warwickshire—if he might employ the term—had taken the strong ground of argument when he said that in the whole course of Parliamentary history there had been no precedent for a measure rejected by the House of Lords in one year being reintroduced in a Bill of Supply in another year. This was an important fact, and at the proper moment he should give his vote against the object contemplated by the Government, which was unquestionably to insult the House of Lords, and to coerce them to pass a measure which, if considered solely on its own merits, they would not have acceded to. The fact that the House of Lords had three courses open to them must be very gratifying to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They might reject the entire Budget; they might divide—as he presumed they would do—the Budget into three Bills; or they might pass it in its entirety. But, unfortunately, to all these courses there were grave and weighty objections. By rejecting the Budget the finances of the country would be placed in a state of hopeless and inextricable confusion; if they threw back in the face of the House of Commons what he could not help thinking a most unnecessary and uncalled-for insult to the Upper House, a misunderstanding between the branches of the Legislature would probably be occasioned; while if they admitted the principle that the House of Commons had a right to send up in a single measure any number of Money Bills, however dissimilar in character and tendency, from that moment their duty would be simply to register the Acts of the House of Commons, and their functions as an independent branch of the Legislature would cease. If this were not a case of "tacking," he confessed he was at a loss to understand the proper meaning of the word. As in the course of the debate on the second reading the fifth volume of Macaulay's History had been freely used, he would take occasion to quote one short passage having reference to the year 1698. A Bill was introduced for conferring a charter on the East India Company; there were various grave objections to the measure, and it was certain that, considered on its own merits, the House of Lords never would have sanctioned the proposal. But Montague, the leader of the House of Commons, adopted the same course which had been taken in the present Session with the precious production of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he amalgamated the Bill with a complicated financial proposal for raising a loan of £2,000,000. It was sent up in that shape to the House of Lords, and Lord Macaulay—no hostile critic of the Whig party, and no inconsiderable authority on constitutional questions—had thus stigmatized the course which was adopted—

"Some Peers declared that, in their opinion, the subject of the proposed loan, far from amounting to the two millions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected, would fall far short of one million. Others, with much reason, complained that a loan of such great importance should have been sent up to them in such a shape that they must either take the whole or throw out the whole. The privilege of the Commons with respect to Money Bills had been of late grossly abused. The Bank was created by one Money Bill; this general society was to be created by another Money Bill. The Lords could not amend; they might, indeed, reject it; but to reject it was to shake the foundations of public credit and to leave the kingdom defenceless. Thus, one branch of the Legislature was systematically put under duress by another, and seemed likely to be reduced to utter insignificance. It was better that the Government should be at once pinched for money than the House of Peers cease to be part of the constitution."

That was the language in which Lord Macaulay spoke of a policy which was substantially the same as that which Her Majesty's Government were adopting. He believed, however, that the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire was inexpedient in point of time; and he hoped his hon. Friend would not press it to a division.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to divide the Bill so that each of the Taxes to which it relates may be separately treated."

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 195: Majority 161.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Providing that the provisions of the former Act should apply),

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, it was not his intention to propose any alteration in this clause on the present occasion; but on a future stage of the Bill, if no more qualified Member should think fit to do so, he should call attention to the inconvenience caused to those charged with income tax by the Excise regulations under which it had been collected within the last twelve months. During that period it had been got in under a different system, both as regarded the mode and the times of collection, to that which had been before adopted. The new system of collection, by which the tax was collected quarterly instead of half yearly, had rendered the impost itself still more objectionable, and he hoped to be able to show the House on a future stage of the Bill that they ought not to consent to a reimposition of the tax without they received a pledge that the new plan of collection would not be persevered in.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he heard with great regret of the course that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take, which appeared to him to be one of considerable irregularity and of very great inconvenience. He could hardly suppose that the right hon. Gentleman was serious in what he said. If he understood the right hon. Gentleman rightly, he proposed to object to the system of quarterly collection, and to revert to a state of things which would only permit them to obtain, during the year, one half instead of three quarters of the 9d. income tax which they were now exacting. That would raise a question of £2,500,000 of revenue for the purposes of the present year. He did not know in what way the right hon. Gentleman would propose that they should part with a sum of money out of the surplus of £400,000 which they proposed to keep in hand. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would do much better if he would state his case now when in Committee on the Bill, for this was exactly the time to raise that question. There was at present a Select Committee of the House sitting on the subject, which met under a reference which would enable it to enter into the whole of the question with regard to the principle of quarterly collection. It was a very important question, and one extremely fit for the cognizance not only of the House itself, but still more of a Committee, which would have the power of hearing the parties, and learning from the mouths of the parties themselves whether it would be more for their convenience to pay half yearly or quarterly. The right hon. Gentleman should understand that that was the question as it at present stood. The question of the transition last year from half yearly to quarterly payments involved, in point of fact, the raising within the year of a large amount of money which would not otherwise have been raised within the year at all; so that for last year it was very nearly equivalent to a considerable addition to the tax upon the last part of the year. The first quarterly tax levied last year was  $2\frac{1}{2}d.$  in the pound. A  $10d.$  income tax, if only collected half yearly, would have given them  $5d.$ , but by taking the quarterly collection they got  $7\frac{1}{2}d.$  more. The inconvenience of that transition, the main feature of which was that it brought a great deal of taxation to be exigible within the particular current year, had now been altogether surmounted; and the question now remaining was not one of bringing any additional tax within the current year, but of surrendering a portion of the taxation which the country expected to pay. What the House now understood was, that it was granting an income tax of  $9d.$ , the payments to be quarterly. The effect of that would be, that they should have three quarters at  $9d.$  in the pound, together with the single quarter, now in the course of collection, at  $10d.$  in the pound. What now remained, therefore, was a very important practical question of administration. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Jolliffe) was entirely mistaken when he said that this was a matter of Excise regulation. On the contrary, it was the law of the land; and the Excise authorities had no power to raise money except it as was directed by the law of the land. It was the law of the land before last year, but in order that there might be no mistake about the matter, an enactment was then made by which the duty was imposed upon the collectors of accounting for their collections quarterly. If the hon. Gentleman entered into the question at the present time, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should have to point out the many advantages which attended the system of quarterly collection, and how much more effective and manageable it made the tax; and it would be the duty of those who held that the system was inconvenient to point out in what manner it was inconvenient. It had been said that the determination to collect the tax quarterly instead of half yearly was an aggravation of the impost. But he was bound to say that it was the opinion of those charged with the collection of the tax that it was more agreeable to the taxpayer to pay certain fixed amounts at four times than in two sums. He really thought this was the time when the question might be most conveniently discussed.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE did not think he was mistaken. He believed the collection of the income tax quarterly was an Excise regulation. When the time came he should be able to show that a great injustice had been done by the newly adopted method of collection.

MR. CONINGHAM begged to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the fact that by past legislation on this subject railway companies had suffered very considerable inconvenience. They had been selected from all other companies to collect the income tax from their servants who were in receipt of weekly wages. If the law was applied to the rest of the community the railway companies would not have any cause of complaint; but they were singled out to perform this obnoxious duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the hon. Gentleman was not quite correct in stating that the railway companies were singled out to collect the income tax on the salaries of their servants.

MR. CONINGHAM: On the weekly wages of their servants.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that weekly wages did not enter very largely into the case of any companies except railway companies. He might state that no complaint had been made to him on the subject by the railway companies. It was right, however, that the operation of an enactment of such a nature should be inquired into.

MR. CONINGHAM could assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the railway companies did feel the subject he had mentioned as a grievance. The secretary of the railway company with which he (Mr. Coningham) was connected had been in communication with other companies on the subject. At present if a skilled workman was in the employment of a railway company at wages over £100 a year, the company was called on to pay his income tax, while he might pass over the wall to private employ, and escape the payment of the tax so long as he remained there.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether, in respect of the income tax under this Act, the assessment would be made as last year—on the returns of 1859, and not on an average of three years as previously?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not aware that such a course had been pursued. He had not had the subject brought before him. Perhaps his hon. Friend referred to Schedule D. [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Yes!] As regarded the arrangements for the present year, there will be an assessment altogether new. It will be taken on the average of three years to April, 1861.

MR. J. L. RICARDO understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he thought the system of causing railway companies to collect income tax from their servants worthy of reconsideration. If the right hon. Gentleman agreed to do so, it would give great satisfaction to a very important interest in the country.

MR. BRISCOE said, that people whose income was only £100 a year suffered great inconvenience by having to appeal against being charged the full amount of the tax as if their income was £150 a year. He knew a case in which a railway station-master, whose income was only £100, and which was a matter about which no difficulty should have arisen, had to appeal against being charged 10*d.* in the pound. Taxpayers in such cases ought not to be put to the trouble and expense of going to Somerset House to make their appeals.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in the course of this conversation questions had been mixed up together which were entirely distinct in their character. One question was, whether it was expedient that the tax payable by servants of railway companies should be paid by the railway companies out of salaries. Another question was, whether those having an income between £100 and £150 should have the reduction made in the first instance, or whether they should be left to apply for a partial remission afterwards? A third question, raised by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Ricardo) was, whether the servants of railway companies of a certain class, receiving weekly wages to the amount of more than £100 a year, would be liable to the tax.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had misunderstood his statement. He had said it would be unfair that railway companies should be compelled to pay the tax for their servants.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government had not heard complaints on this head from the representatives of any of the railway companies; but if they had it would have been his duty to have considered the claims arising out of any exceptional case. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Briscoe), he might state that the plan adopted was to assess a person liable to income tax at the higher rate, and it then rested with him to prove that his income was less than £150. Whether in such a case the assessment ought to be made at the higher or lower rate was a matter of convenience and of administrative detail upon which he did not entertain a very confident opinion. He might, however, point out that, although it seemed the most convenient course to assess a railway clerk in the receipt of £120 at the lower rate, yet, that he might have an income from other sources that would bring his salary up to £150. All that was required by the Revenue Board was reasonable evidence of the amount of tax payable; and it was the practice of the Department, he believed, when the exemption was once proved to assume that the person ought to be assessed at the lower rate, which was very liberal, and was, no doubt, occasionally a source of loss to the Revenue.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY thought that the mode of assessment of Schedule D required alteration and reconstruction in the interest of the Revenue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it might be correct that the privilege of falling back on the assessment of the previous three years enjoyed under Schedule D operated sometimes injuriously on the Revenue. He was not prepared, however, to disturb the general basis on which this schedule was assessed.

MR. HENLEY inquired whether it was intended to have a new assessment return under Schedules A and B?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there would be a new assessment altogether.

MR. HENLEY inquired when the first payment under the new assessment would be made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that with respect to the practical question when the new tax would be collected, that would depend very much when the Bill got through that Committee and would receive the Royal Assent; but as regarded the legal liability, that did not depend in any way upon the new assessment.

MR. HENLEY said, that what he wanted to know was this. They were now late in the month of May, and if he understood the matter, under this new-fashioned mode of taxing income, a quarter of this new tax would have to be paid somewhere about midsummer. When did the right hon. Gentleman expect to get the first payment under the new assessment? The way in which the payments of this tax had chopped about within the last eighteen months had made this tax more unpopular than ever. He looked with a great deal of anxiety for some assurance from the Government that a proper time would be allowed for making the assessment, and that people would not be hurried in making their returns.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Government had no power of unduly hurrying the persons liable to the tax. They who had charge of the collection were not servants of the Government. The notices given by those officers were quite as much dictated by their own judgment and that of their superiors as by the Government. The Government had no power of giving notice to taxpayers to prepare for payment. It was the duty of Government to make all the preparations that they could before the law was passed; but they had no power after it was once passed.

MR. HENLEY said, all he wanted was that there should be no undue pressure upon persons in making the Returns. He feared that for the present quarter a great deal of undue pressure would be put on by the Inland Revenue Office.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER could not say what the right hon. Gentleman meant by undue pressure. The persons who were to judge were the Board of Inland Revenue; it was their business to levy the tax. But he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would undertake to say, on behalf of those gentlemen, that they would not require the work to be done in a shorter time than that in which it could be reasonably expected to be performed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 was also agreed to.

Clause 4 (Enacting the repeal, from the 1st of October, of the Excise Duties, Allowances, and Drawbacks on Paper),

MR. KER SEYMER said, that many hon. Members had enjoyed the opportunity during the last few days of seeing their constituents, and he held that these were occasions of which hon. Members ought to be glad to avail themselves. He was one of those who had lately had such an occasion presented to him, and not only had he found among his constituents a greater amount of opposition to this clause than he had anticipated, but he had found that feeling existing among gentlemen who professed Liberal opinions, as well as among those who were his own political supporters. Just as last year, in "another place," many noble Lords of Liberal opinions swelled the majority against the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, so many Liberal gentlemen throughout the country had a strong feeling of opposition to the adoption of this clause. He had that day presented a petition from Lyme Regis on the subject, signed, he was informed, by many of the political supporters of the Liberal Member for that borough, who, if he voted against the present clause, would meet with the approbation of a considerable portion of his constituents. The fact was that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his Budget, the people in the country, not being behind the scenes, were so much prepared to expect an increase of taxation that they were agreeably surprised to find a diminution proposed instead; and they were not disposed to look too nicely at the mode by which the surplus was arrived at, or the manner in which it was to be distributed in relief of taxation. But subsequent reflection had led to considerable misgivings as to the surplus. The sad and melancholy accounts of events in the United States, which must materially affect the interests of this country, and the remonstrances of the China merchants, who certainly took a different view of their rights with respect to the Chinese indemnity from that entertained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had caused many doubts and inspirings whether the surplus would be realized; so that with respect to the repeal of the paper duty, the feeling was almost unanimous among his constituents that the present was not the moment that ought to be chosen for its repeal. Persons down in the country were not in the habit of going deeply into constitutional questions—they generally left such subjects to be discussed in that House by learned and constitutional lawyers; but a very large number of them had come to the conclusion he had just stated on the practical question. They thought the House of Commons had been led astray last year by the eloquence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, notwithstanding the right hon. Gentleman's vehemence and the exertions of a portion of the press, a decided majority of the country now felt that last year the House of Commons had done wrong, and that the House of Lords had done right in refusing assent to a portion of their legislation. This year they had had discussions in that House on a similar subject, but no great public interest had attached to them. The country did not take a great interest in this question, as it was one the consideration of which went far beyond their habits of thought, and they were content to leave it to the decision of the House. But what, he would ask, were the objections urged against the tax on paper? Why, that it was an Excise duty, and all duties which came under that category were, no doubt, very naturally looked upon with disfavour. Entertaining that opinion, he himself had, on a former occasion, voted for the repeal of the paper duty as well as of the malt tax; but he had subsequently, a year and a half ago, in addressing a large assemblage of agricultural constituents, told them that they must not expect him to repeat those votes in the existing position of the finances of the country—a declaration which, however the matter might be mystified in that House, his constituents could well understand as being justified by the altered circumstances of the case. If, he might add, taxes ought to be repealed on the score that they were Excise duties, the hop duty stood out with irresistible claims for the consideration of Parliament. He could not understand how the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have steeled his heart against the irresistible arguments in favour of the remission of the hop duty, so ably urged by hon. Gentlemen representing the counties of Kent and Sussex in that House. Contrast the claims of those two interests. What were the special grounds for the repeal in preference of the duty on paper? Did the manufacturers of that article come before the right hon. Gentleman in forma pauperis, and ask him to take the course which he was now pursuing? No. What they complained of was the peculiar position in which they were placed by the operation of the French Treaty, and the difficulty in obtaining the raw material of their manufacture which that instrument threw in their way. So strong, indeed, was their case in that particular that the free trade Member for Manchester had deemed it to be his duty to vote against his party on the question, because he considered that in the teeth of the difficulties in the way of procuring the raw material, it was a case in which a departure from the strict principles of free trade was justifiable. It was, indeed, contended that a great increase in the consumption of paper would be the result of the repeal of the duty; but he feared it was in the consumption of foreign paper that that increase would take place, and the prospects of the English manufacturers, under the circumstances, were such that many of them thought of taking their capital abroad; so that the stimulus to trade afforded by the remission of the tax and the consequent replacement of revenue which were spoken of were likely to turn out a mere delusion. There was, he maintained, no analogy between the Excise duty on paper and that on brick, glass, and soap; because in the case of all the last-mentioned commodities no scarcity of the raw material prevailed; while the peculiarity of the paper trade was that it was almost impossible to procure the raw material for the finest paper, owing to the artificial obstacles which were thrown in the way. His main objection, however, to the repeal of the tax on paper was that by taking that course a permanent source of revenue was abandoned in the face of enormous taxation, and that which amounted in reality to a war expenditure. It appeared to him to be an extraordinary case of non sequitur on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say, "You will spend £70,000,000, and I will take off the paper duty," when he ought rather, under the circumstances, to have said, "I will retain a source of revenue which already exists, and which is increasing." A retention of revenue, not a sacrifice of it, might have been expected under such circumstances. That source of revenue he, for his own part, believed could be well maintained with the present Excise regulations, while it was one which in its incidence did not press very severely on the great body of the people. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to enforce economy by rendering taxation odious he would find his scheme turn out to be fallacious and his projects to end in increased expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman had already hinted at the adoption of such a course; but he could, notwithstanding, hardly believe that such was really his intention, for if it were so the proper seat for him would be below the gangway instead of on the Treasury bench. Could the right hon. Gentleman hope materially to reduce our present rate of expenditure? He should answer that question by saying that he had during the recent short vacation had an opportunity of seeing the enormous works which were being carried on on the coast of Dorsetshire, where we were constructing quite a Gibraltar. When those works at Portland were completed we should have to maintain there stores and cannon and a very large additional force of Artillery. Similar works were being carried on on the Medway, at Portsmouth, and at Plymouth: and it was scarcely, he thought, under those circumstances, to be expected that any material reduction of expenditure could immediately take place. The noble Lord the Member for Tiverton clearly contemplated no such reduction. He knew well that the country expected him to put our defences in a position adequate to defend our shores from hostile invasion from whatever quarter it might come; and the cause of his popularity was that the community at large believed they might safely trust to his keeping the honour and safety of the nation, and that he had on many occasions manfully stood up in opposition to the views on the subject of hon. Members below the gangway, especially the hon. Member for Birmingham. If, he might add, there was any distrust of the Chancellor of the Exchequer entertained out of doors—and that such was the case, despite the high character and splendid abilities of the right hon. Gentleman, there could be no doubt—it arose from the circumstance that he was supposed to incline too much towards the financial and economical doctrines of those who sat below the gangway. What he (Mr. Ker Seymer) and his friends contended was that if we could at the present moment afford to repeal any taxes, the duties selected ought to be those which pressed on what might be termed almost necessities of life, such as the duties on tea and sugar. There was one advantage attendant on the remission of burdens of that nature which did not exist in the case of the tax on paper—that the Government might hope to recover, by means of increased consumption, a large portion of the duty taken off; while, by the augmented importation of articles coming from a distance, a great impulse to the trade and navigation of the country would be given. He wished also incidentally to say a word in favour of the West Indies, with which he was connected, and whose claims he would not shrink from urging from any fear of the imputation of interested motives, and whose interests he thought had been most unfairly dealt with by the House and by the country. Sir Robert Peel himself thought that the principles of free trade had been applied to that interest in a manner that partook of injustice. The steps which we then took he, of course, did not mean to ask the House to retrace, but he thought it would not be unfair if, on behalf of the West India interests, he were to maintain that we ought, at all events, to take off the war duties on sugar, in order, if possible, that the estates in that quarter might be cultivated by means of an increased demand for their staple produce. He called upon the Committee, ere they proceeded to vote away a permanent revenue, to consider what they were about. In opposing the repeal of the paper duty he was not, he might add, actuated by any feeling of hostility to the penny newspapers, which he believed were well conducted and were conferring benefits on the public. He had regard simply to the present position of the country, to our increasing expenditure, and to the expediency of making, if it could be done, arrangements for the remission of the war duties on tea and sugar and the reduction of the income tax to a level more in accordance with the feelings and wishes of the community than that at which it at present stood. Having thus stated briefly the objections which he entertained to the surrender of £1,500,000 of permanent revenue, he trusted he should have the support of a majority of the House in voting against the clause under discussion.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: Sir, after the vote which I deemed it my duty to give on the Budget of last year I cannot present myself to the House as an enthusiastic admirer of the financial propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, at the same time, it seems to me that one does not require that extreme passion for the repeal of the paper duty which has been displayed by many hon. Gentlemen to support generally the Budget now before us. I have always been of opinion that the paper duty was an objectionable tax, and should be got rid of whenever we had an opportunity of so doing. Last year I thought we were not in circumstances to dispose of so large an amount of revenue, and, therefore, I gave my vote against the repeal of that duty. Of course, I am not one of those who are inclined to find fault with the action taken by the House of Lords in the matter. While I should regard anything like dissension between the two branches of the Legislature with feelings of the deepest regret, I must say that I see in the course pursued last year by the House of Lords not that aggression, that violence, that departure from constitutional usage which some hon. Gentlemen recognize in it, but a proof of the indirect manner in which the other House, to a certain extent, represents the opinions and sentiments of the country. I am certain, at all events, that the Lords would never have taken the step they did if there had not been a strong feeling in the country that it would be impolitic to repeal the paper duty. Taking that view of the case, I can bring to the consideration of the present Budget a clear and candid mind; and I do say that it would have been very difficult for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with what he tells us is a surplus, to have passed over the repeal of the paper duty consistently with his own convictions, and consistently, above all, with that permanence of opinion and that directness of purpose which we must always esteem in our leading statesmen. The question of the paper duty is not a new one; on the contrary, it has for several years been agitated in one form or another, and occasionally, I am bound to say, with some exaggeration. The paper duty was connected in the minds of many persons with what are called "taxes on knowledge," and it assumed almost a moral and intellectual character. Certain abstract Resolutions passed by this House on the subject were sufficient to place the large amount of capital invested in the paper trade in a most uncertain and precarious position. Depend upon it, you cannot go on year after year condemning a tax, and yet not repealing it, without doing an immense amount of injury to individuals; and I hold that the mischief which has been done in the case of the paper duty has not been confined to the paper trade alone, but has been extended to other relative branches of commerce. I feel, therefore, that if we have the means, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us we have, of remitting the paper duty without inflicting injury upon any class of the community, it would be impolitic to keep so large an interest any longer in a state of uncertainty, and that the Government have not done wrong in asking us to abolish the tax altogether. The repeal of any tax must give rise to considerable discussion; but I think there is always a great and manifest advantage in abolishing a tax which bears directly upon the home industry of the country. You cannot remit such a tax without stimulating industries of various kinds, as well as the trade more particularly concerned; and I really do not think it would have been possible to hit upon a tax the repeal of which would have been beneficial in so many different directions as the abolition of the paper duty. It is a mistake to suppose that the papersellers will derive all the benefit. Every milliner who uses a bandbox, every tradesman who makes up a package, will be relieved to a certain extent. The general trade of the country will feel the change, and I believe that a large portion of the revenue which is thus sacrificed will return to the Exchequer through other channels. At the same time, I was much struck with that passage in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which he seemed to indicate that he had come to the end of his tether in the matter of direct taxation. I have watched with great interest the effect of direct taxation in this country, and remembering the cheer which Sir Robert Peel gave me when I said several years ago that I thought a certain portion of direct taxation had been finally accepted by the people, I am not so sanguine as to believe that we shall ever get rid of the income tax altogether. It has always appeared to me that a moderate income tax, fairly adjusted, must form a portion of our permanent taxation; but the country is fully aware of the fatal facility with which such a tax may be increased, and whatever may be the estimation in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be held by the country for his great ability, I am sure he will be held in still higher estimation if he can succeed in carrying out the original pledge and his vote—that the income tax shall not become a permanent impost.

MR. LYGON said, the hon. Member who had just sat down admitted that the relief from the paper duty would be of a very indefinite character; and while he (Mr. Lygon) admitted that tradesmen and others would derive some benefit, he must beg to point out that as the amount of the tax would have to be supplied from some other source the actual relief would be very small, indeed. Much had been said as to the numerous uses to which paper could be applied; but he believed the benefit was very much exaggerated. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Monckton Milnes) following the example of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had spoken of the great injury to the trade that arose from the continual agitation. But if that were so it was the fault of those who raised and kept up the agitation. He should not quote the Chancellor of the Exchequer against himself on the question of repealing the duty. He preferred to wait for that explanation which the right hon. Gentleman had promised to the House, and in which he intended to reconcile all his various opinions and harmonize them into one ingenious whole. They were told that important public business had been postponed to and was impeded by the discussion of the Budget. He did not see what important business was so postponed. The Electoral Law Amendment Bill, and the Appropriation of Seats Bill were almost the only Government measures before the House; and, considering the importance of the principles involved in the Budget, the country would not complain of the discussion of the Budget having preceded them. Judging from the advantages that accrued from full discussion of the financial proposals of last year, he saw no reason to regret it. Early in last Session the proposal to repeal the paper duty was carried by a large majority; but it gradually fell—to one not even in its teens—a majority of nine. That was the result of the protracted discussion. Similar was the case of Parliamentary Reform. For three years there was a clamour for reform. In 1859 it was discussed; in 1860 it was discussed again. By that discussion the mind of the country was satisfied and calmed down. It was convinced, by the arguments on both sides of the House, that the evils complained of had very little foundation in fact, and a feeling of general contentment with the institutions of the country grew up with the discussion. As far as experience went, they had reason to congratulate themselves that they had the opportunity of fully discussing the financial proposals of the Government. The duty of the House of Commons was not merely to accept and register the proposals of the Government, but to criticise and examine them. Here was a clause totally repealing the paper duty. Now, for the last year and a half, every one had been asking—who wants it? If the opinion of the public was fairly examined they could not find any class who required it. When the people were really excited on any question there could be no mistake about it, as in the Reform agitation of 1832, and that of the Corn Law Repeal, when a civil war was almost produced. Having this experience of the way in which the feeling of the people expressed itself, no one would venture to say that any strong or real feeling existed now in favour of the repeal of the paper duty, or against the course of the House of Lords last year. If there was this apathy on the part of the people, he wished to know for whom was the repeal of the paper duty required? How had the agitation made such progress? They could suppose a tax being obnoxious to a small class of uneasy agitators, who tried to persuade the people that their particular grievance was a grievance of the country at large; if they had possession of part of the public press, they might easily give the question a factitious importance; and if parties were nicely balanced, a few votes might become of great consequence to the Government. Thus had the paper duty been made a question of importance; and being supported by the splendid eloquence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, people had been carried away from a fair consideration of the merits of the question; and though his financial plan was repugnant to sound arguments, they had been led to suppose that measures for which so much could be said must be wise and beneficial. Then, it being impossible to find any one who was anxious for the repeal, what were the main objections to it? Of course every tax was, to a certain extent, objectionable; but, as Dr. Johnson had said, of two contending theories, one must be right and one wrong, and, although much might be said on either side, the greatest weight should be given to that in favour of which the balance of argument was found to exist. Well, first, he had shown that there were no substantial reasons in favour of the repeal of the paper duty. Then it was impossible to say that its retention could be injurious to the trade. A return lately laid on the table of the House showed the enormous development of the trade since 1835, when the produce of the duty was £796,000 only, it being now £1,300,000. But it was said to be a tax on knowledge. Yet what said Mr. Bohn on the question?—

“So far from books being cheaper in consequence of that reduction, copyright books are much dearer. Nobody would have ventured in those days to publish a popular 8vo. volume without plates, at 18s., as in the case of Macaulay. Twelve shillings used formerly to be thought an extreme price. As for the benefits that the abolition of the paper duty will confer in promoting cheap Bibles and the publications of the Religious Tract Society, I can only say, with as much certainty as I could predicate anything, that none will be felt. The Bible, as officially published under authority of the Crown, does not pay any duty whatever on paper, and is printed with scarcely any profit, so that it may be bought for less than a shilling, which surely is cheap enough; and the Religious Tract Society may be said to get both their paper and duty for nothing, inasmuch as the whole establishment, though trading for profit, and often conflicting with the trade without advantage to the public, is supported by large voluntary contributions. The literature of this country, and with it its congener the paper trade, has been progressing with great rapidity for some years past, chiefly on account of the spread of education, the increase of wealth and population, the facilities of locomotion, the liberality of our postal arrangements, and the mercantile progress of America, Australia, and our own country; and if left alone it will still progress. But if its course is to be interrupted by the meddling hand of a band of reckless theorists, it is not unlikely to retrograde.”

The diffusion of sound and useful knowledge among all classes of the community was an object which Gentlemen on the Conservative benches were as anxious to promote as any other Member of this House, and he trusted that this would never become a party question, much as they might differ as to the means. Judging from experience, however, it might be said that the paper duties in their present form had interposed no material bar to the diffusion of useful knowledge. Well, then, was the tax injurious to the consumer? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the import duty on tea did not affect the consumer; and if that were so, how could the Excise duty on paper have any such influence? He believed that the benefit to the consumer from the repeal of that duty would be of a most infinitesimal description. Of course certain classes of tradesmen might derive advantage, but he could not see that they were the victims of any injustice from their present contributions to the national exchequer. All objections to the retention of the paper duty being thus disposed of, what were the advantages gained by it? There were exactly 1,300,000 advantages, that being the amount sterling it annually produced, and this he thought a sufficiently substantial reason in favour, in the absence of any objection to the retention of the paper duty. That was a sum that the country could not afford to squander away. Then it was argued that the trade would receive a stimulus from the repeal. The hon. Member for Gloucestershire had, however, shown the fallacy of this argument, and that it was the foreigner, and not the Englishman, who would be benefited by it. The £1,300,000 produced by the duty was even more than the whole of the charges, excepting those of the law department, upon the Consolidated Fund; and this was another forcible reason against the proposal of the Government. It was said that the House of Commons was precluded by its former decisions from raising this question again; but he contended that the forms of the House were devised for the very purpose of enabling Members to raise such questions on different stages of a Bill, and they were not called upon to abandon their just privileges for the mere convenience of the Government. What was it they were contending for in opposing the repeal of this duty? They were contending that the basis of taxation ought not to be changed, and against any diminution of the sources from which our revenue was drawn. It was prudent to have as many sources of taxation as possible, in order that a disaster falling upon one source of revenue might not seriously affect the finances of the year. They were told that an Excise tax was in itself odious; but not much more than 100 years ago there was a statesman who maintained that there could be no better basis for taxation than Excise; but the House of Commons rejected Sir Robert Walpole's proposals, and it was mainly from the circumstances of that time that the name of Excise became odious to the people. Writers, however, who had examined the question of taxation maintained that an Excise, if wisely administered, was the fairest source of revenue. The tendency of modern legislation had been in the opposite direction, and Sir Robert Peel had wisely relieved the industry of the country from a large amount of taxation. But there must come a time when we must stop in that course of policy, unless the country were prepared to follow the recommendation of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and raise all the revenue of the country by a direct tax of 8s. on every £100 of property. All the credit of these remissions of taxation did not properly belong to Sir Robert Peel; for while, from 1832 to 1842, the burden of taxes removed did not amount to more than £4,500,000, and in the succeeding ten years to £7,000,000, from 1822 to 1832 the remission of taxation amounted to £18,000,000. Of course, in the earlier period, the heavy war taxation and the reviving industry of the country in consequence of the cessation of the war, accounted in some part for the taxes repealed; but it must be borne in mind that the policy was not inaugurated by Sir Robert Peel, for he merely followed the path which his predecessors had so wisely struck out. Admitting that this policy had been wisely followed from 1822 up to the present time, we ought not to be deterred by the successful results of what had taken place from looking fairly at the proposal now before the House on its own merits. The objection which he had to the proposals of the Government was that they placed the finances of the country on an insecure foundation; that they were too much in the spirit of the eminent financier who had

And paid by ratiocination."

He objected to the form of the Bill on the ground that it was inspired by the motive of paying off a score which it was said had been contracted by the Commons against the Lords. If the privileges of the Commons, which had been so long the palladium of English liberty, were seriously attacked, no doubt every hon. Member in the House would rise up in their defence; but it was only because they had been wisely used to further the best interests of the people that these privileges were so dear to the country; and if they were degraded from their legitimate use to promote the interests of a noisy clique of agitators, the Commons would do much to imperil their own position as a branch of the Legislature. They were told that they had been affronted by the Lords, and that they ought to vindicate the privileges of the House, but this must have reference to the question upon which that of privilege was raised. Mr. Burke, in reference to taxing the Americans, in addressing the House, said—

"This dignity of yours is a terrible incumbrance to you, for it has of late been ever at war with your interests, your equity, and every idea of policy. Show the thing you contend for to be reason; show it to be common sense; show it to be the means of attaining some useful end, and then I am content to allow you what dignity you please. But what dignity is derived from perseverance in absurdity? Every hour you continue on this ground your difficulties thicken on you."

The right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) told the House that if the country were appealed to with the hustings' cry of "Paper v. Tea," "Commons v. Lords," he did not think that Gentlemen on the Liberal side of the House would have much to fear. On the eve of a great political struggle there could not be a better man than the right hon. Baronet to tell the country "the reason why" of it; but in this case he had placed himself greatly at variance with a close observer of political events, Lord Macaulay, who, in one of his Essays, said—

"The privileges of the House of Commons, those privileges which, in 1642, all London rose in arms to defend, which the people considered as synonymous with their own liberties, and in comparison of which they took no account of the most precious and sacred principles of English jurisprudence, have now become nearly as odious as the rigours of martial law. . . . If the Commons were to suffer the Lords to amend Money Bills, we do not believe that the people would care one straw about the matter. If they were to suffer the Lords even to originate money Bills we doubt whether such a surrender of their constitutional rights would excite half so much dissatisfaction as the exclusion of strangers from a single important discussion."

When the time came he should join heartily in negating the clause now under discussion, because he was convinced that the proposal was most objectionable as to the "matter, manner, measure, and time." As to the matter, because he conceived that they were, by the course proposed, placing the finances upon an insecure and unsatisfactory foundation; and, as to manner, because they were attempting to inflict a slight on the other branch of the Legislature in reference to that matter to which they were obliged humbly to submit last year. As to measure the scheme seemed to him to be objectionable, because the circumstances of the present year did not warrant them in supposing that the financial position of the country would be such next year as to enable them to remit this £1,300,000; and he objected to it above all because it seemed to him, from what had taken and was taking place in that and the other House and in the world generally, that this was not a time for dealing in the manner proposed with the taxation of the country. Upon these four grounds he trusted that the Committee would negative the clause now under consideration.

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART said, that after three repulses the hon. Gentlemen opposite were making a fourth attack, and he feared that between tea and paper the result would be that John Bull would find himself in the position of the ass between two bundles of hay, the end of which tantalizing predicament was said to be starvation. They heard from The Times, from the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), and from various quarters that great distress prevailed among the paper manufacturers on account of the uncertainty as to the duty, and whatever the abstract merits of the question might be, they were doing great injury by prolonging that state of uncertainty. He trusted that when they had swept it away hon. Members on the Government side of the House would be ready to assist in the reduction of the duties on tea, sugar, and hops. The abolition of the paper duty must cause a great expansion of trade and increase the Revenue from other articles of Excise by reason of their increased consumption. If there had been more paper mills in the neighbourhood of Coventry they would not have heard of so much distress among the riband makers. It was said that there was no great cry against the paper duty; but were they to wait until an association like the Anti-Corn Law League was established for the removal of restrictions on British Manufacturers? Were they, to use the words of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire in "Coningsby to yield nothing to reason and everything to agitation?" The same objections which were made to this measure were raised against the remission of the duty on bricks and on other Excise remissions; but as in those cases they had had no reason to regret the step taken, in like manner let them repeal the duty on paper, and he believed that they would never have occasion to repent it.

MR. HENNESSY said, that before entering into the discussion he wished to call the attention of the Chairman to the clause as now amended. The clause included a Resolution passed in Committee of Ways and Means, and he wished to ask whether it was not an unusual course for a Minister of the Crown to ask them to pass a clause totally repealing a duty, and which had not been brought forward in a Customs' Act? The clause, before it was amended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, referred solely to Excise; and the Bill, before it was amended, had a preamble which excluded all mention—so far as legislative power was concerned—of the House of Lords. The preamble was, that "Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom give and grant;" and he was not aware that any such preamble had ever before been applied to a Bill repealing a Customs' duty. The usual form was, "Be it enacted by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled." The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in putting in his Bill a clause, introduced, not in a Committee upon the Customs' Act, but in a Committee of Ways and Means, had been able to avoid that preamble which had been in uniform use in repealing the Customs' Acts. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on a former occasion, submitted his Bill, he adopted the usual course, and had a Committee to consider the repeal of Customs' duties. He wished to know whether the course pursued was not an unusual one?

MR. MASSEY said, that a Resolution affecting Customs was a Resolution affecting trade, and it was, therefore, necessary that it should originate in a Committee of the Whole House. The Resolution formed part of the financial arrangement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the year, and if he thought fit to move it in a Committee of Ways and Means—which was a Committee of the Whole House—he did not think there was any objection. Though it was usual that a Resolution affecting trade should be moved in a Committee specifically appointed for that purpose, yet he could not say that there was any irregularity in moving such a Resolution in a Committee of Ways and Means,

MR. HENNESSY said, that he had not heard any hon. Member except the one who commenced this discussion make any reference to his constituents. Now he himself had been favoured with communications from his constituents. He held in his hand a letter from a gentleman who was Chairman of the Town Commissioners of one of the most important towns in the county which he had then the honour to represent. This gentleman, who like himself was in favour of the repeal of the paper duty, said—"I am confident that no greater boon can be conferred on the people of Ireland than a repeal of the war duty on tea," and in so saying he was expressing the almost universal wish of the country. If this question were argued on its merits there would be an overwhelming majority in favour of the repeal of the duty on tea in preference to that upon paper; but the political considerations were dwelt upon by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and every Member who had spoken on the Government side said that those considerations must decide the question. It was said that the time was come to repeal the paper duty, because it was desirable to terminate the collision with the House of Lords as speedily as possible. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to have forgotten the argument which he used last Session, when he said that the House of Lords in dealing with a Bill such as was now before the Committee could amend it without coming into collision with the Commons. The Chancellor of the Exchequer on that occasion said, "It appears to me that the Amendment of a Money Bill is a light thing compared with the claim to prevent a repeal of taxes." He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) now said, on the contrary, there was no rule to prevent the House of Lords from amending a Money Bill, but that the Amendment of such Bills was more frequent than their rejection in the other House. If that was correct, there was no necessity whatever for introducing the clause in the manner now proposed. The hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) also supported the view taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and said the House of Lords had never given up its right to amend Money Bills. What, then, was the position of this question? Last year they were told that the Lords had a right to amend, and not to reject a Money Bill; and they were now asked to sanction this measure in globo, in order to prevent the Lords criticising it, on the ground that this being a Money Bill they would have no right to amend it.

In a discussion which took place in this matter on a former occasion he ventured to criticise some statements made by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire). He then stated that the increase in the manufacture of paper last year was little more than the average increase during the last twenty years. He made that statement on the figures furnished the House by the hon. Member for Dungarvan, which turned out not to be quite accurate, as shown by the returns on the subject recently laid on the table of the House. The hon. Member for Dungarvan stated that the increase in the manufacture of paper last year was only 6,000,000lbs., while in the previous year the increase had been 13,000,000lbs. A return had lately been presented to the House which showed the real increase in the quantity of manufactured paper, and it appeared that the increase last year was no less than 16,000,000lbs., while in the previous year the increase was only 14,000,000lbs. The increase in the year before, instead of being 25,000,000 lbs., was 14,000,000 lbs. Therefore, not only was the increase last year above the average, but 2,000,000 lbs. more than in the preceding year.

On one or two occasions allusions had been made to the advantages that had accrued to Ireland through the financial arrangements of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he thought that Irish Members might fairly inquire how far Ireland received any advantage from the last Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the repeal of the duty on foreign butter was carried, a letter from a gentleman in Ireland, who had been for more than a quarter of a century engaged in the butter trade, assured him that the Irish butter had been seriously injured by the reduction of the duty on foreign butter, and that the importation into London had diminished one-half, and that there had also been a great falling off at Liverpool. That statement was borne out by a reference to figures. In 1861, up to the 29th of April, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme was in full operation, the foreign butter imported into England was 537,000 casks, the Irish butter 156,000 firkins; in last year, when the scheme was in partial operation, the foreign butter imported up to the 29th of April was 470,000 casks, and the Irish 242,000 firkins. In the previous year, and before the Chancellor of the Exchequer interfered with this trade, the foreign butter imported was 347,000 casks, and the Irish 339,000 firkins. Ireland was an agricultural country, and, therefore, the change, however it might benefit the English consumer and foreign producer, had inflicted great injury upon the Irish farmer.

But one of the reasons assigned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for giving up the £1,300,000 of paper duties was, that all that amount, and more, would go into the pockets of the people. Facts and figures had been quoted by the hon. Members for Birmingham and Leeds, supporters of the right hon. Gentleman, which seemed to throw much doubt upon the accuracy of his statement. The hon. Members to whom he referred had told the House that the penny newspapers would benefit enormously by the remission of the tax. The hon. Member for Birmingham said that the Manchester Examiner paid £6,000 a year for the duty upon paper, and another paper paid as much as £9,000 a year; the average amount paid by the London penny papers being £6,000 a year. He (Mr. Hennessy) had ascertained the number of penny papers throughout the country, and, taking the statement of the hon. Gentleman and striking a fair average, he found that of the £1,300,000 something like £1,200,000 would go into the pockets of the proprietors of the penny newspapers, while only about £50,000 or £100,000 would be left for the public to divide among them. This must be a manifest absurdity, but even if the figures of the hon. Gentleman were correct, and if the cheap newspapers would gain so largely, he (Mr. Hennessy) did not object to the penny papers receiving that benefit, but he mentioned these facts to show that the statements made on the other side of the House required to be looked at somewhat carefully.

Another statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, that he gave this impost up because he had a surplus that fully enabled him to do so; and amongst the items making his surplus was the money he expected to get from China. About the safety of his anticipations on this head being realized during the present year there was room for considerable doubt; and he would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the House to what an equally celebrated and able Chancellor of the Exchequer once did under corresponding circumstances. Mr. Pitt had to deal with a Budget in 1795 which in many respects resembled the present one. He required £27,000,000, and he proposed Ways and Means including £500,000 owing by the East India Company—a much more reliable source than the Chinese Government. The question arose how far Mr. Pitt was justified in repealing duties in expectancy of getting this £500,000; and Mr. Pitt said he felt bound to prepare for the event of its not being paid at the proper time, and he made provision for it as part of the general deficiency. This was a similar case, but an opposite course was now pursued. For these reasons he should feel it his duty at the present moment, mainly in behalf of Irish interests which he was there to represent, but also on Imperial grounds, to oppose the adoption of the proposed course, which was not based on established precedents but on a novel scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own creating, and one which he hoped the House would not be disposed to sanction.

MR. NORRIS ventured to think that the House would be taken somewhat by surprise by the proposition of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymour). He thought during the last six weeks the House had settled the question now raised, and that after the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had been disposed of, the Bill giving effect to the Resolutions previously adopted by the House would have been allowed to pass without further hostility. But if he was surprised at the opposition now raised he was still more surprised to hear the hon. Members for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymour), for Tewkesbury (Mr. Lygon), and for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy), each in succession warning the House against this proceeding, pointing to an exhausted Exchequer, to wars and rumours of wars, to assumed deficiencies of income, and enormously increased expenditure, as grave reasons why the House should not part with Excise duty on paper, when only a few nights since those hon. Gentlemen passed into the lobby, to repeal this year, not £660,000, but £980,000; and in the coming year a sum amounting to about £1,800,000 of taxation. They then cast aside, with the utmost calmness, their nervous fears as to the state of trade, and concurred in endeavouring to get rid of a very large amount of taxation. He (Mr. Norris) could not admit that they had shown tenable ground or substantial reasons why the House should not repeal the paper duty, and he could not believe that the reasons assigned were the true reasons. He was still more astonished to hear the hon. Member for the King's County declare how opposed the people were in the part of the country from whence he came to the repeal of the paper duty, when he recollected to have seen among the list of names of gentlemen of great public usefulness in Ireland, forming an association for the repeal of the paper duties, and meeting at the Royal Exchange in Dublin, the name of the hon. Member himself. It did not seem to be recollected by the hon. Gentleman that paper was most extensively used by the manufacturers of Sheffield and Birmingham and Manchester, and similar places. The briskness of trade in those places would frequently account for the increased consumption. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hennessy) seemed to think that the proprietors of the penny newspapers would receive all the benefit of the remission of the duty within some £40,000 or £50,000. He (Mr. Norris) did not wish to use language disrespectful to the House, but he could find no other term to characterize this proposition than to say that it was perfectly ridiculous. Any one conversant with the subject knew that the largest portion of the paper duty was paid by the manufacturers in the towns he had named. They were told on a previous night by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Mellor) how oppressively the tax operated on his constituents in respect to the paper boxes in which they packed their manufactures. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Lygon) had said something about how the agitation in respect of this paper tax had been got up. He would remind that hon. Gentleman that it had always been an unpopular tax, that it had continued to increase in unpopularity, and in 1836 it was condemned by a vote of the House of Commons; and a distinguished Gentleman who then held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Spring Rice, now Lord Monteagle, said on that occasion—

"If I find a tax uncertain in its collection, unequal in its operation, occasioning doubt and difficulty in the minds of the officers by whom it is collected, and continued embarrassment on the part of those by whom it is paid, then I say at once, repeal it in preference to any other course. There is a tax which, after the most anxious and careful consideration, offers itself to my mind in such a point of view, and I hesitate not to say it answers every one of the objections I have made—that is, the paper duty."

Science had manipulated a vast number of substances into articles which, if not paper, it would be difficult to call by any other name; and the result of this was that in no less than seven of the trades using these articles was the duty remitted by the Excise. In fact, one strong reason for abolishing the paper duties was the great difficulty, approximating to an impossibility, of the officers saying what was and what was not paper. In 1858, when the right hon. the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Milner Gibson) brought forward a Motion pledging the House to a reduction of the duty, the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, then a Minister of the Crown, said the paper duty could not be defended. Last year the same high authority said he would be willing to repeal the paper duties when there was a surplus. The same authority this year indicated that there was no surplus, and that, therefore, no taxes could be repealed, and yet on another day he admitted he voted to take off £1,700,000 or £1,800,000 of tea and sugar duties, or a greater amount than would be given up by passing this clause. This showed that his mind had been directed to the subject, and that he was convinced there was a surplus, and it was too late for the right hon. Gentleman and his friends to oppose the abolition of the paper duties on the ground that the Exchequer could not spare the money. Again some Gentlemen set themselves up in that House as the defenders of the other branch of the Legislature. Now, it seemed to him, from what he had read of the other House, and from what he knew of some of its Members, that they were entirely capable of taking care of themselves, and that the gratuitous imputation that they were unable to take care of themselves was not gratifying to them, but offensive. When the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) defended so forcibly the privileges of the House of Lords, he was reminded of some verses written by the noble Lord—

"Let wealth and commerce, laws and learning die, But leave us still our old nobility."

Well, he thought the "old nobility" could take care of themselves, and, therefore, he would not venture on any refutation of what had been said in their defence on that occasion. A short time since a Return had been made to the House of Commons of the number of paper mills in existence in the United Kingdom from the year 1838 to the year 1858; from which it appeared that in 1838 there were 416 mills in England, 49 in Scotland, and 60 in Ireland. The decrease in England between 1838 and 1848 had been 63, and between '48 and '58 it had been 47, which was a decrease of 26 per cent between 1838 and 1858. In Ireland, where papermaking at one time was successfully pursued, the number decreased from 60 in 1838 to 27 in 1858 or 55 per cent. He took it that the operation and inequality of the Excise had had a little to do with that lamentable result. The papermaker wanted two capitals—one for his business the other for the Excise. But if he sold paper to a customer who deceived him and did not pay, he not only lost the cost price of the material, the expense of manufacture, and his profit, but he lost the whole of the Excise duty into the bargain. There were a thousand ways in which the Excise upon paper was oppressive and cruel, and, notwithstanding Mr. Bohn's assertion, seriously impeded the production of cheap literature. Mr. Bohn was a publisher to a large extent of valuable standard works; he exported very large quantities to America; he had a stock in hand which he did not expect to sell for fifteen years, and he knew that if the duty were remitted other publishers would bring out the same works, and he would no longer receive the £300 or £400 a year drawback which he now received. That was his answer to Mr. Bohn. There was one other remarkable instance of the prejudicial operation of the Excise upon the paper trade. Whenever they saw a printing machine at work, they must have perceived that the paper was wet when it received the impression. The manufacturer produced the paper in the exact condition in which the printer desired to use it; but the papermaker was compelled to dry it in the process of its manufacture, in order that it might not pay higher duty, and it was only at considerable cost of trouble and expense that the dampness necessary for printing was afterwards produced. If the printers were allowed to receive the paper in its damp state from the makers from £4 to £6 or £7 per ton saving would be effected. Finally, the duty had been repeatedly condemned in that House; its repeal had been assented to in 1858 by all parties, and it was only that night that any one had stood up to say that it ought not to be repealed. Last year the Bill for its remission passed upon three divisions! this Session it had been discussed for ten nights, and he trusted on that, the eleventh night, the House would affirm its repeal by a large majority.

[First Night.

SIR JOHN WALSH said that, although such a thing would hardly be guessed from the state of the benches, he believed that that evening was to be rather an important crisis in the history of the Session of 1861. During a somewhat long Parliamentary career he had been a spectator of or an actor in many crises, and although this one could not vie in the probable importance of its results, or in the magnitude of the interests involved, with many which he could recall, yet it was the most irritating, the most annoying, and the most troublesome crisis which he had had the ill-fortune to have witnessed. But it should be borne in mind that this question, which seemed by hon. Gentlemen opposite to be considered somewhat of a party contest, had really been forced upon the Opposition, who were reluctantly obliged to come forward and defend their own principles and those large interests of which the voice of the country seemed to think that they were the natural champions. He had heard it whispered that something like a spirit of faction, or a desire to displace Her Majesty's Ministers, was the primum mobile of hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House. As far as his observations and knowledge went he would venture to say that since the beginning of this Session the predominant feeling on that side of the House had been a desire not to disturb Ministers—not by any combination of parties or by any ruse to oust them from their seats. Quite the reverse—the desire on his side the House had been to support, as far as they could consistently with their principles, the noble Lord who presided over Her Majesty's Councils. He did not pretend that in entertaining this desire they were actuated by any peculiar disinterestedness. They felt a very sincere personal respect for the noble Lord at the head of the Government. They had a great admiration for his inimitable dexterity and skill, his knowledge of the House, his long and extensive experience of public affairs; and, he would add, the Conservative party gave him credit for having at the bottom of his heart a very sound attachment to the leading principles of the British Constitution. They believed that he had the head of a statesman and the heart of an Englishman. Therefore, there was no feeling of hostility—on the contrary, there was much regard, and he might say partiality—felt on that side of the House towards the noble Lord. And although they felt the deepest gratitude to Lord Derby for the chivalrous manner in which on a former occasion, in the face of an acknowledged majority in that House, and under circumstances of the greatest difficulty, he undertook—he was sure all would acquit him of any personal motives; he was sure all would admit that he entered on his duties on public grounds and for public spirited motives—for the chivalrous manner in which he undertook and successfully carried on the administration of the affairs of this country; and they acknowledged that the Conservative party derived great benefit from that short tenure of office, particularly from its revealing to the House, to the country, and to themselves that there were within their ranks many Gentlemen who were quite capable of carrying on the affairs of the State, who required no long apprenticeship to official life, but who, whether in office or in debate, in the conduct of affairs or the management of Parliamentary business, could meet hon. Gentlemen opposite upon at least equal terms—acknowledging all this they at the same time felt that the experiment of carrying on the affairs of this kingdom by a party which was in a minority in Parliament was not one which they would wish to see repeated. The position of a Ministry so situated was so painful, and so many sacrifices were involved, that they did not wish to be called upon to repeat them. They felt there was something humiliating and unconstitutional in being placed in such a position, and, except under circumstances of the greatest and most overbearing necessity, they did not wish to see such a course again entered upon. A third reason existed, and it would show that the Opposition were not purely disinterested. They believed that Conservative principles were gaining ground—that every day, every week, every year they were advancing; and, though not now in the position to which they aspired, they confidently hoped they would soon see the great leaders of their party take office with that support with which alone they could wish to see them attempt to take the reins of Government. Not wanting to pluck the pear before it was ripe, they had every desire, under present circumstances, to postpone a change of Government—nay, for himself he believed, that in the present circumstances of the country a change of Government would be undesirable for the interests of the country. But on this occasion they had no choice whatever. They were compelled to oppose Ministers, and they could not avoid doing so without loss of character and of party honour—without sacrificing those party interests which the nation had in a certain degree intrusted to them, and without throwing away the political capital which they held in the concern. He cordially concurred with the observations made by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer) at the commencement of the debate, that any Member who during the recent holidays had visited the country must have seen that not only the ordinary supporters of the Conservative party, who were supposed on all occasions to embrace their opinions, but a large proportion of those who generally ranked as their foes, looked to them as the persons who were to fight the battle on their behalf against the Ministerial scheme of taxation. Those very lukewarm friends, who were only friends perhaps on that occasion, would naturally exclaim, “What is the use of a Conservative party? What are they good for, if, with their own large minority, nearly balancing all the divisions and sections opposed to them, and backed by so strong a feeling in the country, where public sentiment is entirely with them, they have not courage enough to come forward and maintain their own principles?” Why, these persons would naturally say, “The Conservatives are such an utterly craven party that they do not deserve support; we can place no confidence in them; they are so pusillanimous that they will not fight even when they have all the advantages in their favour.” The Conservative party were not prepared to sacrifice all these real substantial motives to opposition because the mere customary taunt of a party move was thrown out. It was peculiarly irritating to feel that the question was forced on a majority of the Members of that House, and on a majority of persons in the country by the curious combination of parties by which certain hon. Gentlemen sitting below the gangway were enabled to apply a sort of screw to the Government, and that, with the opinions of every person, except those of the particular section to which he had referred, in favour of the course advocated by the Opposition, it was possible, though by no means certain, that the scale might be turned against them. A charge had been preferred, if not in that House, certainly in what were called "the organs of public opinion," that the Opposition, in the hostility which they had shown to this measure, were imitating the tactics pursued with reference to the Reform Bill of last year, and were endeavouring to defeat the scheme of taxation by opposing to it a never-ending discussion. Any such intention he begged for his own part to repudiate. Moreover, the tactics of last year, if such they could be called, were carried on with equal ability, equal vigour, equal determination, and equal perseverance from the Ministerial as from the Opposition side of the House. The question really came to this: Had the Opposition, in their conduct with reference to a measure which they conceived to be fraught with most mischievous consequences, exceeded the limits of fair Parliamentary usage? If, in their opinion, this measure was fraught with mischief, surely it could not be objected to them that they had taken steps by fair and open discussion to expose those mischiefs and to endeavour to remove them. They had only taken one division against the Bill—a very narrow division indeed. Last year there were two or three divisions on the same subject, and though the second reading of the Bill passed by a large majority, the third reading had a hair's breadth escape. Was it, then, so very factious—such utterly unjustifiable conduct—after the narrow majority by which the Resolution was passed, again to take the sense of the House in Committee? At the root of all this opposition to the repeal of the paper duties lay the state of our financial prospects and the calls which would probably arise at no very distant period. The country was not now in the same condition as when, during the later years of the Tory Administration, £17,000,000 of taxation were taken off in the course of a comparatively short period, without the imposition of any new tax; or, as in the time of Sir Robert Peel, when large remissions of taxation were made. Were the situation and the prospects of the country such as to warrant progressive reductions of taxation, though he might believe the paper duty to be one of the last which ought to be repealed, and though its claims should, in his opinion, be postponed to those of the payers of tea duty and income tax, no opposition would be offered by him to such a measure as the present. But the whole aspect of political affairs forbade rational or prudent men to believe in the probability of prospective and progressive remission of taxation. With regard to the particular merits of the tax now under discussion—the objections to the repeal of this paper duty had been so often and so ably urged that it was not necessary for him to do more than touch upon them. The common sense of the country had without difficulty arrived at the conclusion that it would benefit the community in only an infinitesimal degree. No one could mix with any class of society without observing how strong that impression was on the public mind. There was a great deal of theoretical fanaticism in respect to the supposed benefits of the measure; but there was a very important objection to the repeal of the impost. He supposed hon. Gentlemen opposite might be inclined to cheer when he stated that it was very generally admitted that this duty could not be renewed. By repealing the duty they were finally parting with £1,300,000 a year; for, whatever might be the exigencies of the State at any future period, they would find great difficulty in reimposing it. Would it not be more prudent to remit a tax which could easily be reimposed, more especially when such was the state of affairs generally that within a year or two we might want a very large increase of taxation to meet the requirements of the country? Now, let the Committee consider what was involved in the giving up of this sum. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were advocates for throwing all increase of taxation on the property of the country; but it must be remembered that direct taxation was, after all, a finite system. They could not go beyond a certain point in the imposition of direct taxation, and when they relinquished taxation which they could not re-impose, they disbanded so many soldiers, they gave up building so many iron-plated frigates, they deprived themselves of the means of erecting so many fortifications. They diminished the strength of the nation in case of emergency to an extent proportionate to the amount of the tax which they surrendered, if it was a tax they could never re-impose, whatever might be the emergency to which the State was exposed. The remission of £1,300,000 would not signify so much if it took place at a time when everything was calm, and when there were no indications of danger, but the case was widely different now, when on so many other points the nation was preparing for a storm. The noble Lord at the head of the Government came forward last year and asked for a very large Vote for fortifications, and the general arming on the part of the Volunteers showed what the sentiment of the nation was on the subject of danger from abroad. The hon. Member for Birmingham might, perhaps, say that that was owing to the aristocracy; but, if there was one thing more clear than another it was that this movement was entirely owing to the middle classes, and it was, perhaps, the most significant symptom of modern times that, without any call from the Government, without being invited by the aristocracy, the middle classes had acted in this matter from their own instinctive sense of danger. Yet the abolition of this tax, involving a loss of £1,300,000, was directly flying in the face of that instinctive apprehension; it had the appearance of a sideling and insidious mode of counteracting the public sentiment of the country, and of paralysing the resources of the country, at a moment when they most especially required to be invigorated and strengthened. Again, he really thought that one of the most vexatious matters connected with the repeal of the paper duty was the strong opinion entertained by the Conservative side of the House, and he believed by the House generally, that, in point of fact, they were in this matter all placed under the dictation of a small section of that branch of the Legislature, and of a most unpopular minority. He would not wish to say anything personally offensive to hon. Gentlemen on the other side, many of whose talents they must all admire, but the reduction of our war establishments to such a point as must place us at the mercy of our neighbours, and the substitution of direct for all indirect taxation—both of which measures appeared to be cardinal points with the hon. Gentlemen to whom he alluded—were in the highest degree distasteful to the great majority of the people of this country. He thought he might assert that the country had given proof of that fact. In his opinion the repeal of the paper duty was a sacrifice to the hon. Gentlemen the Members for Birmingham and Rochdale, in consequence of the indirect influence which those hon. Gentlemen possessed in the present confused state of parties in that House. He believed, also, that it was the bounden and paramount duty of those who sat on that (the Opposition) side of the House, to offer to this measure, fraught with so many mischievous consequences, their strenuous and determined opposition, and, therefore, he should cordially record his vote against it.

MR. AYRTON said, he had no intention to repel the imputations which had been cast on Gentlemen on his side of the House by the hon. Baronet and other Members who had spoken against the measure of the Government. The hon. Baronet, indeed, had answered himself. The hon. Baronet charged the popular party with compelling the Government to introduce this measure. ("No, no!") He said the Gentlemen who sat below the gangway were the popular party ("No, no!"), and then he said they were an unpopular party in the country. He charged them with being popular agitators out of the House, and with having impelled the Government to introduce this measure; while at the same time he said the measure itself was one of the most unpopular ever framed. [SIR JOHN WALSH: I said you were political fanatics.] The word "fanatics" was a very ambiguous one, but at any rate it might mean that those hon. Members who sat near him were sincere in the opinions they expressed in that House, while the hon. Baronet and his Friends expressed opinions that they did not quite feel. He wished to know for what purpose they had been discussing this question night after night from Easter to Whitsuntide? If he might judge from the speeches they had heard on the other side it could only be for the purpose of delay, in the hope that something would occur which might seem to justify the opposition of Gentlemen opposite. In the course of the discussion these hon. Gentlemen had carried the House all over the world in search of difficulties—to China, to India, to America, and to the Continent of Europe. But the treaty with China was working well, and our trade with that Empire was likely to flourish. India had been tranquillized, and there, too, our trade was likely to increase. They could not show that Europe was less tranquil than before; and all their expectations seemed to be doomed to disappointments, when suddenly there had come a messenger from Galway, and he had announced a difficulty which offered to serve the purpose of Gentlemen opposite. Whether trouble came from this or the other side of the Atlantic, it was the only one that had served to suggest the continuance of this dispute and the renewal of opposition to the Budget. But they had made no progress in the discussion, and he asked whether they were now to go back to the question whether there was a surplus, or accept the deliberate judgment of the party opposite, who had declared that there was not merely a surplus, but one favourable to a large remission of taxation? The question before them was whether the paper duty was or was not of all taxes a most obnoxious tax, and, therefore, the one that ought to be selected for remission? The Commissioners of Excise found themselves unable to answer the objections raised against the tax. There was this difficulty about it, that it was not an Excise upon a specific thing that could be easily identified in nature and described, but a tax on something that did not exist in nature and could not be defined—for any plastic fibrous substance could be converted into paper. Alcohol could be defined but paper could not. When the duty was first imposed there was a definite idea of what constituted a sheet of paper, and there was no difficulty in collecting the duty. But a change had ever since been going on in the manufacture, until paper had assumed an infinite variety of forms. Matters had, indeed, come to such a pitch that, if the right hon. Gentleman had not last year proposed to repeal the duty it was the intention, he believed, of certain parties to show the absurdity of the law and render it impossible to collect the duty. For instance, by law paper boxes made inside the paper mill were not chargeable with the duty, but if the paper was taken out of the mill to be made into boxes, it had to pay the duty—a monstrous absurdity. Then arose the question of vegetable and animal fibres. Paper could no longer be defined as fibrous vegetable matter, because animal matter could be manufactured into paper—yet paper made of vegetable fibre was held to be liable to the duty, and that made of animal matter was not. Another anomaly and difficulty in reference to this article was this—there was no authority in the Crown to make exemptions from an Excise duty imposed by Parliament, yet successive Governments had taken upon themselves the responsibility of declaring that certain classes of traders should be exempt from the operation of the paper

duty. The practice was most improper and unconstitutional, and ought to be put an end to. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would show any other tax subject to the same difficulties of interpretation they would be entitled to put such a tax in competition with the present for remission. The mere amount was enough to startle the House. The duty on paper amounted to £14 14s. per ton on a commodity which could be made from a raw material costing not more than £4 4s. a ton. Was not that a monstrous and repressive tax? Monstrous as this was he believed it was small compared with the difficulties arising from the interference of the Excise. The manufacture was carried on under all sorts of restrictions and penalties. The manufacturer had first to go to the Excise, to register himself, and to pay a tax. He then came under the surveillance of the Excise, and was exposed to the most vexatious regulations and penalties, the latter ranging from £50 to £200. A paper-maker was, therefore, placed in a situation of jeopardy and restriction most unfavourable to the prosecution of his industry. The result was that those who took to the paper manufacture were limited in number; and there was, in fact, no competition between the general public and the persons who had established themselves in that business. Lord Monteagle, who at one period entertained different views on the subject of the paper duty from those he had lately expressed, was, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, so impressed with the injurious effects of that tax, that, though his Budget would not allow him to remit the whole, he took off a part, and entirely removed the Excise duty on stained paper, which amounted to five farthings a yard. The yard, which was manufactured for 1½d., was sold with the duty for 4d.; but, when the duty was taken off, such an impulse was given to the development of that branch of industry, that the same stained paper sold for no more than 1d. a yard. Such was the history of a manufacture freed from the iron discipline of statutory regulations, and a similar result was now sought to be obtained in reference to the general manufacture of paper. There was positively no material existing in this country which was capable of being applied to so many useful purposes as fibre manufactured in the plastic form. It was well known that England with all its intelligence and mechanical skill could not bear comparison with Japan in reference to the manufacture of paper. In that country a waterproof coat made of paper might be purchased for a few pence, and almost every domestic article in Japan was made out of paper. These were facts which illustrated the condition of the manufacture when it was perfectly free, and proved that the paper duty was a most obnoxious duty, and should be the first selected for repeal. He needed not to repeat that all parties had assented to the abolition of the duty, and the proposal for its remission was as much due to the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire as to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman was the first to give it the stamp of a practical measure, after it had been long mooted in that House, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken it up at the point where it had been left by his predecessor—the repeal, therefore, as such could not be looked upon as a party measure. It was, however, in regard to the time and mode in which it was presented to the House that the matter became a party question; but he maintained that as the consideration of the Customs' duty on paper could not be separated from the Excise duties, it was right in dealing with those two matters also to introduce into one Bill all the proposed regulations relating to the Customs and Excise of the year. It had been represented that the Bill had been brought in not simply on its own merits, but as an insult to the House of Lords. He had just as sincere a respect for the House of Lords as the hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, but he came to a different conclusion from theirs. Last year the Lords rejected the measure for the abolition of the Excise duty on paper, because they were not satisfied with the financial condition of the country, and because on the very day when the second reading came on a telegraphic message arrived in England representing that the China war must go on. Consequently, a considerable expenditure was necessitated beyond what had been provided for, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government fairly stated that the other House had only rejected the Bill to allow the House of Commons in the altered state of circumstances an opportunity of reconsidering the question. If that were a correct statement of the case, how could it be an affront to the House of Lords that the Commons had deliberately reconsidered the question, and had inserted a clause for the repeal of the paper duty in a Bill which imposed other taxation amply sufficient for the service of the year? It was contended that if the whole of the financial scheme were comprised in one Bill, the other House of Parliament would not be in a position duly to exercise their functions with respect to the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but they had the same right to strike out the clause relating to the paper duty that they had to reject the Bill of last Session, and would, in doing so, be incurring precisely the same responsibility. In either event it was in the power of the House of Commons to take the course which it might deem proper for the vindication of its privileges; and if irreconcilable differences of opinion should, in dealing with the question, spring up between the two Houses, the Sovereign might dissolve Parliament and appeal to the country to settle the differences. To such a proceeding it was maintained on the part of the hon. Gentleman opposite that they would have no objection, inasmuch as the view which they took on the point at issue was the popular view, and one which, therefore, they would expect to find ratified at every hustings throughout the country. That being so, he could not understand why it was that they objected so strongly to a constitutional procedure which was susceptible of a constitutional solution. For his own part, he would look with no alarm to the result, for the people out of doors, he was satisfied, understood the question in dispute, notwithstanding the description which had been given of his constituents by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer); and if hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to retain for themselves that reputation with the people which they seemed anxious to acquire when they argued in favour of the repeal of the duty on tea—if they were desirous of reviving that popularity in the country which they once enjoyed under a great Conservative statesman in our time, and a still greater statesman in a former generation—he would advise them to apply themselves earnestly to a duty which they might perform, but which, he regretted to perceive, they were not disposed to discharge, and that was, to endeavour to induce the Government to cut down the expenditure of the country, and by so doing truly and properly alleviate the burdens which pressed on the shoulders of the community.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, that if he understood aright the argument which had been addressed to the Committee by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, it amounted to maintaining that the chief reason to be advanced in support of the repeal of the paper duty was, that it was a burden which nobody felt. He could, he should confess, attach no other meaning to the statement of the hon. Gentleman that the test of a perfect tax was that it should not be withdrawn from popular knowledge. But, be that as it might, there was one remark made by the hon. Gentleman—that in which he announced it to be his intention to vote on the question at issue simply on its merits—in which he entirely concurred. In that respect he should be prepared to follow the hon. Gentleman's example. He last year voted against the repeal of the paper duty for two reasons—first, because in the position in which the revenue of the country then stood, he was of opinion that the tax could not be spared; and, secondly, because if any tax was at the time to be remitted, he thought the addition to the income tax and the war duties which pressed on the comforts of the poor were burdens which ought, in preference to the paper duty, to be removed. The opinion on which he acted last year he this year retained; and he was prepared to follow the same course. But in the present case a new issue—the expediency of repealing the war duties on tea—was raised, and for the purpose of that issue the denial of the existence of a surplus, if not expressly withdrawn by the leaders of the Opposition was at all events waived; and on that new issue the House had been called upon to vote. They were now told that every one who voted for the reduction of the tea duties had admitted the existence of such a surplus as would justify the abandonment of the revenue that was derived from paper. He, however, disputed both these propositions. He maintained that, in the form in which that issue was raised, and only the choice of two alternatives forced upon them, it was quite open to any man to vote for a reduction of the tea duty, which was not a final and irrevocable abandonment of revenue; and which, according to Sir Robert Peel's principle, by increasing consumption, might increase the revenue and even turn a deficit into a surplus, and yet oppose the repeal of the excise on paper, which would be an entire and irrevocable loss to the

Exchequer. The revenue derived from tea was almost stationary, notwithstanding the increase of population—the consumption was checked by the high duty—moreover, it was a war duty, to the repeal of which that House was pledged; and the benefit of that repeal would be felt by every one of the operative class, and the advantage to them would react in a corresponding gain to the Exchequer. On the other hand, the revenue we derived from the Excise on paper was flourishing and increasing. That it was easily collected and that it was oppressive had been frequently proved by an admission made in the course of these debates, that the papermakers, who were the persons most annoyed by the Excise, were not the persons who were the most anxious for its repeal. On these grounds he justified his vote for the reduction of the tea duty. He did not think there was, or could be, the surplus estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For how, let him ask the House, was that surplus obtained? We had this year a new definition of a surplus such as he had never heard before. Heretofore a surplus had been money in hand, actually touched or seen, safe in actual receipts, in the pocket, or in the bank, or in some other form equally tangible and secure. He ventured to say that it was unprecedented in the financial history of this country for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to close the year with a deficit of more than £2,500,000, and then proceed to make arrangements to remit taxes on the faith of a surplus which was not even on paper—verified by facts or by accounts—but which was a surplus purely built on speculation, on new calculations, and hopes, and conjectures, every one of which was as liable to prove fallacious as the schemes of any speculator on the Stock Exchange. The process by which this surplus was obtained was very arbitrary, and he was afraid it might turn out to be very illusory. There were six great branches of revenue which in the last year had produced a certain sum. On each of these the Chancellor of the Exchequer calculated there would be in the coming year a certain increase. Take, for instance, the revenue derived from Customs. In the past year the Customs yielded £23,305,000; in the coming year they were estimated to produce £23,585,000, showing an estimated increase of £280,000. So with the other five items. The total amount of estimated increase on these six branches of revenue, after deducting one item of decrease under the head of Miscellaneous Receipts, amounted to more than £750,000. But on what assumption was this calculation based? It could be only on one—namely, that the coming year would be a better year for trade, and that the harvest would be more abundant than the last. Were both these events so certain—were they even now so very probable? Yet these, coupled with the very questionable receipt of the indemnity from China, constituted the surplus which the House was now asked to give away. A merchant might freight a vessel to foreign ports calculating on certain profits, but he would not spend them before they were realized; or a gentleman might buy railway stock anticipating an increased dividend at the close of the year, but he would not give it away before he had received it. Yet that was precisely what they were now doing. They assumed a speculative surplus, and then proceeded to give it away. Where did this surplus exist? In the visions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If that was what Parliament was hereafter to accept as the definition of a surplus, it was obvious that the financial condition of the country must very much depend on the temperament of the Finance Minister for the time being. If he should be of a sanguine disposition, everything would go well. They would be sure of a surplus, and might remit taxes. If, on the other hand, he should be of a desponding turn of mind, they must apprehend a deficiency, and proceed to lay on increased taxation. In the course of these debates the House had been more than once invited to observe the great change of circumstances which had taken place since the Budget was introduced—the rapid march of events on the other side of the Atlantic, and the gloom which was thickening every day over our commercial prospects. Our relations with America had become so intimate as to be those of mutual dependence, and it was absolutely impossible for American trade to be paralyzed without the most serious consequences to England. These consequences, he was afraid, were already falling heavily upon us. The prospect of a short supply of cotton was already most alarming. No one could tell what six months hence the state of our manufacturing population might be. But this at least all those who were connected with those districts already knew, and he grieved to say that too much evidence of it had reached him—that the possibility of diminished employment, and consequently of diminished consumption, was already sufficiently apparent and acknowledged to have extinguished the prospect of the small surplus on which they had counted, and to make a prudent Chancellor of the Exchequer reconsider his position. Six weeks ago, when the Budget was introduced, affairs in America were threatening; but then we all hoped for the best. Now those dangers had broken out into calamitous events, and we must prepare for the worst. A Budget that was made for fine weather must necessarily be rent in pieces by the storm; and it was no reproach to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was so. It would be no humiliation to admit that he had been a second time beaten by events he could not control. And while, if he persisted in his proposals he would be acting in the teeth of the real opinion both of that House and of the country, and exposing himself to the charge not merely of imprudence, but of rash and wilful imprudence; and, unless every probability was falsified, incurring future condemnation and reproach; he could, on the other hand, in the new circumstances which had come upon them, yet retreat with dignity and honour, and among all reasonable men at least gain both popularity and respect by so doing. But that was not the only warning which might be drawn from events passing in America. We were now witnessing the bursting of that great Republican bubble which had been so often held up to us as the model on which to recast our own English Constitution; and the first and great truth which these events ought to impress upon any English Minister or statesman was the duty of observing, of studying, and of strengthening, that which had hitherto constituted the great distinction between the safe and rational, and tempered liberties of England, and the wild and unreflecting excesses of mob-rule which had too often desecrated freedom and outraged humanity in America. The House of Commons, to which they were all proud to belong, and whose privileges it was their duty to uphold, did not derive its strength, its value, or its greatness from any inherent power of its own, but rather from its association in dignity and in functions with those other great authorities of the State with which it was so identified in character, in inter-rests, and in responsibility that nothing could impair the greatness or honour of the one—be it of the Commons—be it of the Peerage—be it of the Crown, without detriment to all the three. Each of these great Estates, therefore, was bound to regard the dignity and integrity of the others, as inseparable from its own.

Into the second question raised—the constitutional question—on which exception had been taken to the form of the present Bill, he would not then presume to enter, except to say this much, that he was quite ready to admit, for the sake of argument, that it might be a great improvement in their practice in future years to combine the whole of the financial measures for the year in one Bill. He would assume that that had been proved. He would also, for the sake of argument, assume, what of course the Government anticipated, that the repeal of the paper duty would pass the House of Commons. Then would remain the question, how they could best combine the double object of carrying the repeal of the paper duty in the Lords, and embodying in future years the whole of the financial scheme of the Commons in one Bill. In his opinion the safest, and certainly the most dignified course, for the House of Commons to pursue would be to confine itself on this occasion to precisely the same course as it adopted last year. They might say to the Lords,—“You rejected our Paper Duty Bill last year; and we cannot deny that the country approved what you did, because, financially, you proved to be right; but that occurrence has convinced us of the necessity of avoiding all danger of future collision—by combining our finance in one Bill. We might do this on the present occasion, but we refrain from making the change this year, because our motives might be misinterpreted. It might seem a discourteous attempt to coerce the Lords into what they refused last year; or it might be attributed to resentment. We would avoid all such unjust and degrading imputations. We prefer, therefore, to send up the Bill to you in its old form this year, reserving to ourselves the right to adopt the new practice next year, when the object can be achieved without our motives being misinterpreted.” That would, at any rate, be a smooth and safe course; it would avoid all unpleasant recurrence of the past, and all ungracious distrust as to the future. It could cause no heat, no jealousy, no disturbance; the differences that had divided this House on this subject would be forgotten; and the country—that was in perfect good humour with the House of Lords, and did not desire a quarrel to be stirred up—would view with satisfaction the harmonious co-operation of the two Houses in a measure that had at length met with general acquiescence. That would be, indeed, what an hon. Gentleman in an earlier debate described as an “olive branch” offered to the House of Lords. But what they were now doing might rather be interpreted as a challenge. Was that wise, was it necessary? All resolved itself into a question of time; what they might do safely next year, they were going out of their way to do ungraciously and unsafely now. Many would condemn their conduct as ill-advised, some as a petulant, some as an arrogant proceeding. Public opinion neither supplied the motive, nor acknowledged the necessity. If the Lords submitted it would impose on them humiliation; if they resisted it would provoke a conflict. And he thought that that Minister would be a friend neither to his country nor to the Constitution who went out of his way needlessly and wantonly to compel the House of Peers to choose between two such alternatives. For these reasons, he shall feel it his duty to give his best support to the Amendment—first, because this renewed attempt to repeal the paper duty on the faith of a surplus that events might prove to be as artificial and illusory as that of last year, was most unfair to the country which must soon be called on to make good the deficiency by an increase in the income tax; and, further, he supported the Amendment, because the time chosen to make this change in their form of legislation connected it so unmistakeably with the proceedings of last year as to impart to it a petty and resentful character that was alike ill-advised and unworthy of the House of Commons; that must prove embarrassing to the House of Lords; and, could not, he was certain, be agreeable to the country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, as this issue has been raised to-night, and though, as the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Walsh) said, I am not aware whether “the pear is ripe” or not; still, considering the question in a fair and honest spirit, and not having given any vote on it this year, I will, with the permission of the House, offer a few observations on it. In considering this question I wish to explain, if

I do vote, how I qualify it; or, if I do not vote, to state my reasons for not giving it. I am not at all surprised at this prolonged discussion. An hon. Gentleman who spoke from these benches said that after ten nights of discussion—perhaps more—he thought the House had had enough of it, and the Prime Minister himself said the other night he was really quite surprised that this discussion should be continued, that he understood it was not intended to dispute that part of the Budget connected with the income tax; that it was not intended to revive the subject of the tea duty; and that there was no intention of objecting to a repeal of the paper duty; he said he considered these matters as disposed of and decided, and that on the Resolutions of the House the duties had been levied as matters of course. I am really surprised to see the noble Lord so much deceived as to the state of affairs. I know, and the House knows, that the noble Lord has often availed himself of the kind assistance of the Opposition, to stem and curb the exuberant spirit of his own impolitic partizans; and I hope, under similar circumstances, he will never appeal in vain to the generous sympathies of his political opponents. But I had yet to learn that the Prime Minister had been authorized to make on the part of Her Majesty's Opposition such an unqualified statement as that, and he must have been misled as to the opinion of the House when he tries to check discussion upon this question—a more important one to the interests of all classes could not be brought forward. It is not our fault if, after Whitsuntide, and close on the month of June, we are still discussing this question. We might have had this discussion much earlier if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had desired it. I, therefore, think the noble Lord was accidentally led into an error when he said all discussion had practically closed, for we are now only on the second reading, and then have to come all the Resolutions seriatim in Committee. But I should not, perhaps, have risen to speak on the question to-night had it not been for a statement made on a former night by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who said—and his words are worthy of being mentioned—he believed this discussion was carried on merely for the purpose of injuring the political reputation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A more unfounded observation never came from the noble Lord, though we know his habit of making use of these claptraps occasionally, for the purpose of gaining "political capital." I, for one, in discussing the question now, have not the least idea of throwing any slur on the political character of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I wish to discuss the subject like any other independent Member of the House, and I believe the right hon. Gentleman is quite capable of defending himself, his political character and measures, without requiring to be beplastered with the hollow praise of the noble Lord. If I thought the discussion was carried on on the ground the noble Lord supposed; if I thought the poisoned arrow of personal malice was directed against the right hon. Gentleman, I, for one, would forego my right of criticism, and would take my stand by him to the last. Like the hon. Baronet who has just sat down, I do not intend to enter on the constitutional part of the question. Thank God! we have got rid of that, and got to the practical part of the subject—the part that affects the interests of the people and the country. The Constitutional point has been most ably treated by hon. Gentlemen competent to do it; among others by my right hon. Friend, whom I was happy to hear addressing the House with so much vigour—the veteran Conservative of Carlisle. He treated that point in such an able manner that I cannot understand how any one can entertain any doubt on the constitutional part of the subject. He said that, looking carefully and impartially at the precedents, his opinion was decided that the Lords had a constitutional right to take the course they adopted, and that in rejecting the Paper Duty Bill they exercised a right inherent in them and which cannot be denied. I thoroughly concur with that opinion. And I should say, that any one who does not admit that the Lords were perfectly right in the course they adopted last year must be very hard to satisfy by any force of argument. But we will let all that go by. Allusion has been made to the time of Henry IV. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) who agreed that this was an important constitutional question even talked about 600 years ago, for he said that with regard to the act complained of, the Commons had not used their right for thirty years, while against the House of Lords the usage of some 600 years might be alleged. I should have thought it impossible to bring forward precedents dating from that early period of history, or, at all events, I should have thought that precedents then were as much in favour of the Lords as against them. But, instead of examining into precedents of so very long ago, let us consider that point as settled, and treat this question as it bears upon the interests of the people in 1861. I know that among some hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House it is an unpopular thing to consider the interests of the middle and the lower together with those of the upper classes. The hon. Member for Birmingham has over and over again said he conceives that the interests of the lower classes are best consulted by raising them up in antagonism to the middle and upper classes. I think, on the contrary, that all classes should be considered, whether financially or politically, as one complete entirety, and that in adjusting our taxation the interests of all classes should be equally considered—that there should be nothing like class legislation in administering the affairs of the country. With the permission of the House it would be perfectly competent for me to enter into a full discussion of the Budget of my right hon. Friend. The noble Lord the Member for London talked about bricks, and soap, and glass, and it would be perfectly fair for me to enter into all those subjects. I will not, however, deal with any of these subjects now, but will merely express, as many others have expressed before me, my admiration at the facility and ability with which my right hon. Friend embellished his financial statement some months ago. We recollect how he glossed over the deficiencies, the ornamentation with which he embossed his surplus, and the hopeful expectation with which he encrusted the future. We know that he had a difficult task to perform. There was, he admits, a deficit last year of £822,000; whereas now, with only a reduction of £1,000,000 in the Army and Navy Estimates, the Chancellor of the Exchequer says there is a surplus for the present financial year of £1,900,000. I confess that I do not see how he disposes of the deficit of £822,000; because, if you deduct that old deficit from the surplus of the present year, instead of £1,900,000, you have only £1,100,000, so that in reducing the income tax and in remitting the paper duty, if you do not get the indemnity from China, you are in a deficit of more than £300,000 instead of having a surplus of £410,000. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer finished by depre-

cating unnecessary expenditure and by lauding retrenchment, admitting, at the same time, that in the course of a few years the expenses of the country have increased something like £20,000,000. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman looked hopefully to the future. His opinion on this point was so very clear that he sneered at the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) for venturing to entertain dark forebodings with regard to the state of Europe. The hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Bright) also expressed his surprise that a man should look with such dread at the aspect of foreign affairs. But I must say I agree with the hon. Baronet who has just sat down (Sir John Ramsden) in thinking that nothing can well be darker or more dangerous than the present state of Europe; and, as this has an important bearing upon the finances of the country, I think the Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have considered the subject in a different spirit from what they have done. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) said that people used very desponding language, and raised up

I do not know whether he has ever read a play of Shakspeare called Timon of Athens. This Timon, who was a very expensive man, had a Chancellor of the Exchequer, named Flavius, whom he asked to supply the ways and means for his extravagant expenditure. What was the answer of Flavius? He had not the abundant eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, but he said in plain, simple language—

“What will this come to?”

He commands us to provide, and give great gifts, And all out of an empty coffer.”

Now, I do not know whether the coffers of the State be empty, but I do say that to make the year's surplus dependent upon the receipt of money from China is a state of things of which I, for one, cannot entirely approve. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed us that there existed a surplus, I admit that, as I had entertained apprehensions of so different a character, I listened with unqualified satisfaction; but I was surprised to find that other Gentlemen who had considered this subject should have arrived at conclusions differing entirely from those of the right hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless, when he told us that there was an estimated surplus of income over expenditure, and that we might look forward to a considerable balance in hand, together with a reduction of taxes, I was satisfied until the right hon. Gentleman came to the subject of paper. Now, I must say that I was sorry to see this prospect of a renewed contest, because my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) had distinctly stated to a deputation which waited upon him a short time ago, that he could hold out no expectations whatever of the remission of the paper duty. Calling to mind, also, the Resolutions passed last year by this House, entirely approving the policy of the Lords, I say it is a slur upon my noble Friend to re-open this subject so soon after last year, and, if handled at all, it certainly requires to be handled with most extreme caution, circumspection, and conciliation. I do not think that has been done here. What are we now discussing? Not whether there is or is not a surplus of revenue over expenditure, but whether it is desirable to remit a tax affecting the interests of a limited industry at the expense of the general public—whether it is desirable to remit the Excise duty on paper and the Customs' duty also levied thereon, and for that purpose to increase the burdens pressing upon the great body of the taxpayers of this country. It is, in fact, almost a question between direct and indirect taxation. The noble Lord made the other night a remarkable statement. In eighteen years, he said, we have increased the indirect taxation of the country from £33,000,000 to £40,000,000; and, he added, "Does that look as though we were destroying all our revenue from indirect taxation?" Now, it has never been urged that you are endeavouring to destroy all your revenue from indirect taxation. What is said is that you are resorting to direct taxation as one of the principal means for raising the revenue of the country, in spite of the strong disinclination of the great bulk of the people to the payment of direct taxes, instead of having adequate recourse to taxes whose burdens fall indirectly upon the people, and the incidents of which are equal and impartial; no doubt direct taxes fall principally on the wealthier classes, but pressed to an inconsiderate increase, they react with injury to the other classes; and, therefore, in the interest of all classes this remission of taxation should be most maturely considered. It may be true that in eighteen years indirect taxation has increased by £7,000,000, but how has the expenditure of the country increased meanwhile? In 1843-4 our estimated expenditure was £49,387,000, but in 1861-2 it is £70,000,000:—so that in these eighteen years the expenditure of the country has increased £20,000,000, whereas the indirect taxation has only increased £7,000,000. It is singular enough that eighteen years ago in 1843 there was an indemnity from China for the ransom of Canton, amounting to £725,000; but the then Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "I will, it is true, accept this indemnity, but I will take care to keep in hand enough to counterbalance that sum if it should not be received." The then Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated the national expenditure at £49,387,000, whereas he made the revenue £50,150,000, so that he retained a balance of £763,000 to meet any contingencies which might arise, and he certainly did not make his surplus depend upon the receipt of the Chinese indemnity. Now, if there was one hon. Gentleman in this House whose opinion on such a subject should be entitled to respect, it was a right hon. Gentleman who, sitting on the Treasury bench, might be supposed thoroughly conversant with the actual state of affairs when he gave his opinion in favour of the measure. I allude to the President of the Board of Trade—the Milner Gibson of 1853. He is a man who has always advocated the repeal of what he calls the taxes on knowledge, and a more fallacious mode of describing this tax could not be conceived. He says that it obstructs literature, impedes commerce, injures the revenue, and harasses industry. Will the right hon. Gentleman say that the education of the country has been held back by the Excise and Customs' duties on paper? Will he dare to say that we who oppose this reduction of taxation on the article of paper went to impede the progress of the people in intelligence, in morality or self-Government, or have less at heart that he, their real wants and interests? Within a very short time the grant for education has more than doubled, and so small are the taxes paid by cheap literature, independent of newspapers, that of half a million the Government spends in aid of education not £20,000 is spent in books, and, therefore, the Committee will readily understand the small amount that goes on paper duties. I will admit that there is a hardship on the authors and publishers of books. It is well known that not half of the books published pay the cost of publication; but ask in Paternoster Row whether these

"taxes on knowledge" have at all curbed the furor scribendi, or have in any way affected the modesty or the confidence of authors? So much claptrap has been talked about these taxes on knowledge that if the Committee will spare me a few minutes I should like to point out one or two circumstances which show the fallacy of the arguments used. One great argument which has been used to-night is, that you do not know what paper is. And it is a fact that for out of six of the Government Commissioners of Inland Revenue wrote an elaborate report to proclaim their ignorance or stupidity in the matter, and added that if the paper duty is maintained an Act of Parliament must be passed to define what is paper. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets told us that in these days it is impossible to define what paper is. He talked about fibrous—I really cannot recollect exactly what he said—but he went into a series of mechanical descriptions, which, no doubt, were perfectly accurate; but I can only refer to Dr. Johnson, who gives a definition of paper which, until some new dictionary is written, must stand good. "Paper," says Johnson, "is a substance on which men write and print, made by macerating linen rags in water, and then grinding them to pulp, and spreading them in sheets." The duty on paper enters very slightly into the price of a book. It is at present, as hon. Members know, 1½d. per lb., which comes to about 3d. on an 18s. volume. On two volumes of Lord Macaulay's History, which cost 36s., it would be 6d. The paper duty seldom forms more than one twenty-fourth part of the price of the cheapest work, and not one fiftieth of the price of the dearer books. If you repeal the paper duty to-night, a 1s. book will never cost less than 11½d., nor a 20s. book less than 19s. 6d. These are facts, and I should like to hear any one get up and deny them—particularly the President of the Board of Trade, The noble Lord the Member for London talked about the "hobgoblin of the penny press." The penny press, I presume, is as respectable as the press of a higher price; but no one will make me believe that the penny press pays except as a speculation for advertisements. It is sold to the trade for ½d., and it is quite evident that it never can be made and never will be made to pay at the price, except as a speculation for the purpose of advertisements. In 1853 Milner

Sir Robert Peel

Gibson, the President of the Board of Trade—I must call him the historic Milner Gibson—brought forward Resolutions for the remission of the paper duty, and he said to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

"You are only making use of the stock arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I will tell you what it is—the man who is debarred of his penny paper is as badly off as the slave in the Southern States of America."

He was answered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day—Mr. Gladstone—who said—

"As steward of the public revenue and guardian of the public credit, upon an impartial consideration, I prefer the claims of all interests to the economy of a particular reduction;"

And he went on to say—

"I deprecate the dangerous practice of flatter- ing the passions, as the acute, but mischievous Member for Manchester is now doing, by endeavouring to induce the House to pass these Resolutions for the repeal of the paper duty."

But the right hon. Gentleman on this occasion has been supported by the Prime Minister who tells us that, upon the whole, he thinks it would be better to apply the surplus to the remission of the paper duty, but he spoke in such terms of faint praise that I was almost inclined to believe that he half mistrusted himself. Under ordinary circumstances the House would probably be very much inclined to adopt a measure supported by him and backed by the ability of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but we are now deliberating under extraordinary circumstances. Say what we will, there is a feeling of uneasiness abroad, both in military circles and in the public mind generally. I do not speak, like the hon. Member for Birmingham, of "Gorgons, or hydrae," or things I never saw, but of what we all know and can perceive. There is a feeling of uneasiness on the Continent of Europe—our national security no longer depends on the character of our councils or our diplomatic prestige. We are not only spending enormous sums on our army and navy, but we are positively impoverishing the country by a vast war-like expenditure at a moment when we are assured by the Government that we are on terms of perfect amity and friendship with all the nations of the world. More than that, we are engaged on a system of fortifications the rough estimate for which is £11,000,000, but which if completed will cost many millions more, and which if not completed thoroughly will be absolutely useless. For these reasons I am inclined to question the conclusions arrived at by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hope the House will not be led away with the idea that this is a question of free trade in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Of course, I never would give a vote which could even by implication contravene that policy which was inaugurated in 1841, carried onward in 1846, and has since been universally adopted. This is not a question of free trade in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but it is a question of whether we are prepared to remit a permanent and imposing income of £1,300,000 in favour of a limited interest without those corresponding advantages which would appear to justify such a sacrifice of revenue. I am ready to admit that if the state of Europe permitted it I should be perfectly ready to consider a remission of taxation in a fair, liberal, and popular spirit; but to put on an 8*d.* income tax and then add another 1*d.* to it, making it 9*d.*, in order to counterbalance a deficiency of income caused by the reduction of taxation in the article of paper is a thing I never could approve. The hon. Baronet who spoke last bade us consider how the different interests of the country are threatened at the present moment. The industry of Lancashire is threatened owing to the aspect of affairs in the Southern Confederacy of North America the prospect of the supply of the raw material of one of our staple industries is disturbed. You have disputes and strikes at Burslem and Wolverhampton; you have suffering in the coal trade, and suffering in the iron trade; and is this a moment to make these reductions of taxation without any corresponding advantage? Look abroad, and wherever you turn your glance the horizon is dark and forbidding, and I ask the House and the country is this a moment to indulge in these speculative arrangements of the finance? Look at France in the occupation of Syria against the wish of England, in the occupation of Rome against the wish of Italy, in the occupation of the southern slopes of the Alps, not only against the wishes of Europe but to the infringement of treaties. Look at Spain—slaveholding buccaneering persecuting Spain—which has just seized hold of a part of the Island of St. Domingo at the instigation of France. Look at Hungary and Poland. Wherever you look you find a state of affairs which should make any Minister pause before he ventures on hazardous speculations in finance. Often has the Chancellor of the Exchequer taunted this House with reckless expenditure; but if we were ever open to that charge surely this is the time when—this is the place where—we should show that we know how to husband our resources and to preserve that immense wealth which Providence has placed within our grasp, in order to be ready to meet the eventualities which may any day imperil the trade and the commercial interests of the country. It has been said that this impost is a diminishing tax, and therefore we may remit it. I maintain the contrary—that in the years 1859, 1860, and 1861 it has been rapidly increasing. In 1859 the net produce was £1,142,000, in 1860 £1,291,000, and in 1861 £1,305,000. If you repeal this productive tax you cannot reimpose it, and I believe that you are repealing a tax which presses less upon the people than almost any other tax which you can mention. It certainly is very little injurious to manufactures. It is easily collected, and it is increasing in amount. These reasons will induce me to go into the lobby with the Opposition and to vote against this measure. There is one right hon. Friend of mine who spoke last year whose opinions I adopt, and whom I expect to see rise this year to urge the same sentiments. I shall go into the same lobby with him, unless he contravenes the opinions which he then stated, I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Coventry. My right hon. Friend has not spoken on this question this year; but, taking the words which he used last year to represent his present views, he is bound to vote the same way as I do. The right hon. Member for Coventry said last year that he thought it would be better to wait for a more favourable opportunity than to repeal a tax and raise a large deficit which might render it necessary to impose other taxes to meet sudden emergencies and unforeseen expenditure. That was a wise expression of opinion on the part of my right hon. Friend, and until I hear him get up and state reasons which have induced him to change that opinion, I must believe that he will vote on this occasion with the Opposition. An hon. Gentleman opposite in a discursive speech alluded to the Volunteers. I am not going to make myself the apologist for the Volunteers; but we understand they are coming to this House for a Vote of money. What a capital opportunity to keep on the paper duty, in order to gratify them with £2 or £3 a head, for which we should have the money in hand! I regret very much that I am induced by these reasons to take the course which I am about to take, but I think it more honourable and more straightforward than not to vote at all. I am inclined to support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, the more so that I think we are unnecessarily dragging this House into a quarrel with the other House—not for the benefit of the country generally, but for the benefit of a set of persons who will reap nearly nine-tenths of the advantage which will be derived from a remission of this taxation. We have heard of all kinds of abuse heaped on the House of Lords. ["Hear!"] I know the House is impatient. At the same time I am anxious to qualify the vote which I am about to give. I say that last year, quite against my wish, the House of Lords were grossly abused for their conduct in this matter. They were told that they were unpatriotic, that they were selfish, that they had not the interest of the public at heart. We must feel, and most of the working classes do feel, that it was said by men who only endeavour to keep up delusions that they themselves may thrive upon the discontent they may scatter abroad. I, for one, would have no part or parcel in that matter. I supported the Resolution of the noble Lord last year. I thought it wise, I thought it judicious. But I think the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not what I should have desired. I have been several years in this House. I have always given to my noble Friend the Prime Minister a cordial and warm support. Such has been my confidence in his ability justly to interpret the sense of the country and the drift of public opinion that I can safely say that on every occasion, save one, I have given my noble Friend my most cordial and hearty support. Indeed I may go further, and as frequently happens in this House with subordinates towards their chief, and with them bound together by the ties of political alliance, I have entertained the warmest personal respect and affection for the noble Lord, and nothing but a stern sense of duty and a deep-rooted conviction that I was right would ever induce me to give a vote which could be considered in opposition to the sentiments which he advocated, and which he deemed necessary for the interests of the country. Again,

Sir Robert Peel

I may say with regard to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that no man entertains a higher opinion of his personal character and brilliant political abilities; and it is with extreme caution, with extreme hesitation, and with many doubts that I place my humble judgment in opposition to opinions which he has emphatically advocated. But, as an independent Member, I have no alternative. We are here to serve the public good and the interests of the country to the best of our ability. In great political discussions I place considerations of that character above any other; and, therefore, it is that I am induced, though with great pain and reluctance, nevertheless, from a conviction of the rectitude of the principles which influence me, to decline to give my vote in support of the measure of Her Majesty's Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, believing the repeal of the paper duty to be neither wise, expedient, nor politic in a financial point of view, nor just nor equitable to the great body of taxpayers in this country.

MR. MELLOR moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Loud cries for a Division arising—

MR. DISRAELI said, it appears to me that if ever there was a night this is the night when we might come to a decision. But as far as I am concerned I am unwilling to be an obstacle to free discussion. I trust, however, that if this adjournment is sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government, we shall hear no more reproaches from that quarter of placing obstacles to the progress of public business, or of encouraging discussions when there is really nothing on which discussion is necessary. We have now had the advantage of many nights' previous debate incidentally, and often directly upon this very question. The debate to-night has been conducted in a tone distinguished by its moderation, and it does appear to me that the House could with great convenience at once come to a decision. If the hon. Gentleman who has moved that you, Sir, report Progress wishes to address the House, I think I can answer for his receiving a patient hearing from a silent and admiring audience. If the only object of the adjournment is to hear his observations, we shall be most happy to consider them. It does appear to me that we might come to a decision upon this question to-night, but if the leader of the House has sanctioned or suggested the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, why then I have too much sympathy for free discussion to use any influence which I may possess to induce the House to come now to a decision. I trust, however, that from this moment we shall hear no more those frequent reproaches which have been very unjustly and very injudiciously urged by those who sit on the Treasury benches, when we have requested occasions to offer our opinions upon subjects of very great importance.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I certainly do not object to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, which I think has been very distinctly suggested by the silence of those Gentlemen who sit on the opposite benches. This, undoubtedly, is a subject of considerable importance, and one upon which there are many Members anxious to speak. The promise of the right hon. Gentleman that they shall be listened to with silent admiration, however encouraging at the moment, might not altogether be made good, if it were tested. I, therefore, cordially agree to the adjournment of the debate. I will not undertake so largely as the right hon. Gentleman wishes to abstain in future from any remarks upon future attempts to procrastinate debates; but, no doubt, the same attempts will not be displayed, and there will be no occasion to make the objection.

MR. BENTINCK asked, until what day the debate would stand adjourned?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—We shall put it for Thursday.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

House adjourned at half-after

CULTIVATION OF COTTON IN THE COLONIES.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that seeing the noble Duke the Colonial Minister in his place, he wished to call his attention to a matter which, in his opinion, was at the present moment one of the greatest possible importance; he referred to the growth of cotton in our various Colonial possessions. He would abstain from alluding to one part of the subject, because it would lead him, however unwilling, to make some observations on that very lamentable state of things existing in the United States of America, and which filled him and all friends of peace and freedom with sorrow; but he considered it had become absolutely essential, independently of those events in America, that Her Majesty's Government should promote by every means in their power the growth of this great staple; and he would urge upon his noble Friend the importance of losing no time in recommending the different Colonial Governments to encourage by all means in their power the growth of cotton in the districts under their control. He had received from Jamaica samples of cotton which had been submitted to persons of known skill in this country, who had pronounced them to be the finest sorts they had seen, and they had fixed the price so high as to show that the cultivation of cotton in that island would be highly remunerative. They said that this cotton would in the market be worth 1s. per lb.; but even if it should not be worth more than 6d. per lb. its cultivation would be profitable, if, as he was informed, they could on one acre of land in Jamaica, at an expense of £8, grow 600 lbs. of cotton, that would produce £15. He had been furnished with all the items relating both to the cultivation of cotton and to the expenses attending it, and he found that all the expenses would not exceed £8 an acre. There could be no doubt whatever that, with due encouragement, cotton might be grown to an unlimited extent in our colonial possessions—not only in Africa, but in the East Indies; and he looked forward with confidence to the time when those countries would be capable of furnishing the supply necessary to this country. He wished to ask the noble Duke whether the Government proposed to hold out any encouragement to the growth of cotton in the British possessions?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE would first remind his noble and learned Friend that he had not observed the usual custom of giving notice of his question; but as he was in a position to give an answer at once he had no objection to do so. He could assure his noble and learned Friend that the Government—not only the Colonial Department, but also the Indian Department—had not neglected the important question of the growth of cotton. But the real difficulty was not to find districts that were suited for that staple, but to find districts where there was an adequate supply of labour to allow it to be produced at a remunerative price. The noble and learned Lord, in alluding to Jamaica, said that that island was capable of producing large supplies of cotton. He (the Duke of Newcastle) was aware that in Jamaica there was land capable of producing the finest qualities of cotton; but he was by no means clear that it could produce those large supplies that his noble and learned Friend suggested. His noble and learned Friend asked whether the Government proposed to offer any encouragement for the growth of cotton. If the noble and learned Lord meant anything in the shape of a bounty, then most undoubtedly they were not prepared to adopt any plan that would be so prejudicial to the object they had in view. If the noble and learned Lord's statements were accurate—but he feared they were not—if they were accurate, and cotton could be grown for £8 and sold for £15—100 per cent profit—surely that could be encouragement enough in itself. The Government considered that the best encouragement they could give would be by facilitating the introduction of Coolie labour into such of the British colonies as had land applicable to the growth of cotton; and with this view he had sought the sanction of the Indian Government to the removal of the restrictions now existing as to Coolie labour, and under new regulations Queensland would be able to participate in these advantages. When those restrictions were removed, and ample supplies of Coolie labour was introduced the various colonies would have the opportunity of trying the experiment of growing cotton.

LORD BROUGHAM entirely agreed that no encouragement of a pecuniary nature, and no forced encouragement of any kind should be given. Lord Canning's despatch on this subject laid down the true principles most soundly and discreetly; to encourage by increasing information, but above all to remove every possible obstruction, was all that Government either could or if it could, ought to do.

NEW PROVINCES (NEW ZEALAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE, in moving the second reading of the New Provinces (New Zealand) Bill, briefly explained its object. When the constitution was conferred upon New Zealand by the Act passed in 1852, a provision was contained in it establishing certain provinces—Auckland, Canterbury, and others—and giving power to the General Assembly, the representative body of the whole colony, to divide them further into separate distinct provinces, if they should so think fit, by a reserved Bill—that is, a Bill reserved for the approval of the Crown. A subsequent Act was passed in 1857 by which many restrictions imposed on the General Assembly of New Zealand were removed; and it was intended to remove the restrictions on the character of the Bills by which a province might be divided. Permission was granted to constitute new provinces by a reserved Bill by the Act of 1852, and by that of 1857 it was intended to give power to constitute new provinces by an Act of an ordinary character. But in removing this restriction the Imperial Parliament made an unfortunate mistake in repealing the 69th Clause of the Constitution Act. This obviously not being the intention, the General Assembly of New Zealand three years ago did separate one of the provinces into two by an Act of the Colonial Legislature. No doubt was entertained at home as to the perfect validity of that Act; but some doubt arose in the colony, and on its being reported to him he took the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, who held that it was not competent to the Legislature of New Zealand to separate those two provinces, although such was the obvious intention of Parliament. Under these circumstances this Bill was introduced, with the double object of enabling the colony to divide the two provinces as originally intended and render that division valid, under the powers of the existing Act, and also to declare the validity of the Act for the future.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

EARL GREY said, the Bill which the noble Duke had just explained to the House was one to which he presumed there would be no objection; but he could not allow it to be read a second time in the present critical and distracted state of New Zealand without expressing his surprise that a Bill of so insignificant a character should be the only measure with reference to that colony which Her Majesty's Government were prepared to submit to Parliament. Their Lordships knew from the papers on the table, and from more recent accounts in the public prints, that for more than a year war had raged in New Zealand. In that unhappy war fifty officers and men of the European force had been killed, and nearly 140 wounded; a vast amount of property had been destroyed; one settlement had been laid waste, and women and children had been compelled to take refuge in another part of the province. Already an enormous expense must have been incurred in remedying this state of things, which he feared would greatly derange the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to any surplus at the end of the financial year. They were also aware that the Government had sent large reinforcements to New Zealand; but they were not as yet aware whether Government contemplated the adoption of any means but force alone to put an end to that war. He was far from objecting to the despatch of additional troops to New Zealand. On the contrary, whatever other measures might be required, no doubt could be entertained that these troops were necessary. But he was no less persuaded that this unhappy contest could not be brought to a satisfactory close by arms alone. There was no doubt that the military power of this country was more than sufficient to finish the war by the extermination of the native race; but that was an end of the contest to which he could not look forward without horror, a feeling which, he was sure, was shared by Her Majesty's Government and by every one of their Lordships. When they considered how these interesting natives of New Zealand, the Maoris, from having within a comparatively short time been plunged into the lowest superstitions of degraded barbarism, were now generally converted to Christianity, they could not look to the possible destruction of this interesting race by British arms without feeling that such a result would not only be a calamity, but a great disgrace to this country. Nor could such a result be brought about except at a fearful loss of blood to Europeans as well as to natives. The nature of the country was such that it presented great difficulties to the operations of regular troops, and great facilities to every kind of irregular warfare. Then there was the impossibility of adequately protecting the scattered dwellings and property of the settlers. When they considered all these things, they must admit that if the Maoris were driven to desperation by the manner in which the war was carried on, they might, before they perished, inflict almost as much suffering as they might have to endure. Therefore, he was of opinion that it was not enough for Her Majesty's Government to send additional troops to New Zealand; they ought to have attempted, by some conciliatory measures, to induce the natives to lay down their arms, and to support the effect of their armed interference by gaining the confidence of the people. If the assistance of Parliament was necessary to the success of such a measure, that assistance ought already to have been asked for. It was the more incumbent upon the Government to take this course, because this subject could not be carefully investigated without bringing any candid and dispassionate inquirer to the conclusion that the Maoris were not solely—perhaps not even principally—to blame for the present war. The war had been produced by errors in the past government of New Zealand—errors which, in one respect, it might not be too late to correct. It was impossible to prevent the evils which had already arisen from the war, but we ought not, at least, to persevere in a course which would make these calamities only the commencement of others of a still more serious character.

Their Lordships were aware that the war was begun by an attempt on the part of the Governor of New Zealand to take forcible possession of a piece of land, acquired from the natives by a purchase, the validity of which was disputed by one of the chiefs, supported by many of his countrymen. Much had been said and written upon the question whether, under the engagements contracted with the native races, and according to the rules hitherto observed, that purchase was valid and regular. He would not abuse the patience of their Lordships by entering into that argument, or by raising a discussion upon the usages and customs of barbarous tribes. It was sufficient for him to observe that the very weight of the authorities who were ranged on one side and on the other proved, at all events, that the question was one of much doubt and difficulty. There were very high authorities against the validity of the purchase made by the Governor. In the first place, there was the authority of the Bishop and the great majority of the missionaries in those Islands. An attempt had been made to lower their authority by saying that, while no man would presume to question the purity and sincerity of the convictions which had induced the Bishop of New Zealand and the missionaries to take so decided a part against the measures of the Government, still their habits were not such as to fit them for taking a clear and dispassionate view of the subject. If it were admitted that there was some force in this objection—which he disputed—it did not apply to others who had taken the same view of the question. The validity of the purchase was denied by Mr. Clarke, formerly Protector of the Aborigines, who, under Sir George Grey, had considerable experience in making purchases of land. It was denied by Mr. Fox, for many years the able and zealous agent of the New Zealand Company; it was denied by Mr. Swainson, formerly Attorney General in New Zealand, a gentleman of high character and extensive knowledge; and, above all, it was denied by Sir William Martin, formerly Chief Justice of New Zealand, who had acquired the highest reputation by the manner in which he filled that judicial station, and of whom the Governor himself only a short time ago, in writing on other matters, said that his knowledge and experience caused him to be recognized as an undisputed authority upon all points affecting the Maories. Such were some of the authorities who might be quoted against the validity and regularity of the purchase. It was obvious, therefore, that the question was, to say the least, one of doubt; and he had no hesitation in expressing his opinion that if even a shadow of doubt rested upon the strict regularity of the purchase under the engagements we had contracted with the Maories, and according to the rules hitherto observed in such cases, both justice and policy required that the Government of New Zealand should abstain from making that purchase, and, above all, from asserting it by force. That was the course prescribed both by justice and by policy; because justice required that, when a right was contested, one of the claimants should not take upon himself to assume and to exercise that right by force until some fair means had been adopted for bringing it to a decision; and policy required that, when the Maories were known to be in an excited state—considering the extreme jealousy and sensitiveness they had always displayed upon questions relating to land—considering, also, the fearful calamities which a collision could not fail to bring on, especially when the colony was so unprepared for a native war—it ought to have been understood that no advantage which could possibly arise from the purchase of an insignificant plot of land could for one moment be put in competition with the dangers which would be incurred by making the purchase and taking possession of the land by force.

He had said that great excitement already prevailed among the Maories when this dispute arose. That excitement was so great that, in his opinion, the dispute with respect to land ought rather to be regarded as the occasion for the war breaking out than as its real and original cause. For that cause we must look further and deeper. The war was, in his opinion, solely to be attributed to our having for the last seven or eight years adopted in New Zealand a system of government which gave great offence to the Maories, and deprived the British authorities of the confidence and attachment with which they were formerly regarded. That policy was adopted, of course, in unfortunate forgetfulness of the wise advice given by Sir George Grey a few years ago, and contained in a despatch written on the subject of the Act for the establishment of representative government in New Zealand, passed in 1846. When that Act was passed Sir George Grey took upon himself the great responsibility of not bringing it into immediate execution, at the same time addressing a despatch to the Government at home in which he explained the dangers which would have arisen at that moment from an attempt to introduce it. He pointed out that the war was scarcely over; that both the natives and the settlers were in a state of great excitement; that by the proposed constitution the entire power over the revenue would be vested in the representatives of the settlers, while the natives were large contributors; that, in fact, it would be making one section, and that the smaller section, of the whole population, arbiters of the whole; that it would be giving the complete disposal both of the revenue and of other matters to the representatives of the European minority, excluding from all power and influence the native majority in the colony. He stated that the natives could not be expected to accede to such an arrangement, and he predicted that the result of an attempt to enforce it would be armed resistance. The arguments of Sir George Grey appeared so conclusive to the Government of that day that they had no hesitation in admitting the error which they had committed in passing the Act of 1846; and the result was that they obtained the ready assent of Parliament to a Bill for suspending the constitution which had been given to New Zealand. Subsequent events had shown how sound was the advice upon which they acted. Armed with the powers conferred by the Suspension Bill, and with the full support of the Government at home, Sir George Grey adopted a policy of which the principle was the firm maintenance of the authority of the Colonial Government, the suppression of everything like violence or disturbance, but at the same time the administration of justice to both races, and the display of kindness and consideration especially towards the Maories. He adopted severe measures to restrict the sale of arms and spirits to the natives; but, on the other hand, he multiplied schools and constructed roads, by which the Maories were enabled both to obtain access to markets for their produce and to receive the advantages of good wages and of an industrial training, and which, moreover, rendered large and important districts of the colony easily accessible to troops and artillery. The beneficial effect of those measures had been increased by the pains which Sir George Grey had taken to keep up communication with the natives, and to acquire their confidence and attachment. In making that attempt his efforts had been rewarded with success; but the policy on which he acted was, after all, said to be a very poor one, inasmuch as he did not trust to laws and measures which he had proposed and passed, the influence which he had acquired over the minds of the natives being purely of a personal character, so that when he departed that influence was likely to cease to exist. The objections thus made to the policy of Sir George Grey constituted, however, in his opinion, the very highest praise which he could receive. He was a Governor who was aware that men were not to be ruled by mere laws, but rather—and the observation applied especially to the case of a barbarous people—by attaching their minds. The effect of the wisest laws and the best institutions could, he knew, only be gradual, while upon a generous and high-minded race a great impression might speedily be made by convincing them that their welfare was the object of the Government. To imbue them with that confidence was the highest triumph of the policy of an able and energetic ruler. Nor was that triumph in the case of Sir George Grey purchased by any dangerous or improper concession. On the contrary, if there were one law which was to be regarded as more unpopular than another in New Zealand, it was that passed and strictly enforced by Sir George Grey throwing obstacles in the way of the purchase of arms. The result of his policy was, at all events, most satisfactory. The disturbances which had taken place were in a short time put down; peace was completely restored; and when he left the country he might have entertained a reasonable expectation that it was on the high road to become at no distant period a flourishing community, in which men of Maori and European descent would be found blended in one united people. These were fair prospects, and they would in all probability have been realized, had it not been for the mistakes which had been afterwards committed. Before the five years, during which the Constitution of 1846 stood suspended, had expired Sir George Grey had expressed it to be his opinion that the state of affairs in the colony had so much improved that, with proper precautions, that constitution might be brought into force, reserving to the Crown the usual power of purchasing land from the natives and the right of maintaining their laws and customs in certain districts. In 1852, accordingly, during the brief Administration of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), a Bill, in the main in accordance with the recommendations of Sir George Grey, had been passed. But the measure, unfortunately, contained one provision which had led to great evils—he alluded to the clause making the superintendents of the provinces into which New Zealand was divided elective, instead of being appointed by the Crown. The proposal was one, it was true, which was in conformity with Sir George Grey's advice, who, although he was a most able man, and one on whose judgment the utmost reliance might in general be placed, yet could no more than the most distinguished of human beings claim to be infallible. In the present instance, at all events, experience proved that he was wrong. For his own part, he was of that opinion at the time of the passing of the Bill, because he thought that to make provincial superintendents elective was in reality to deprive the Governor of the greater part of the executive authority he ought to possess. How he would ask, was it possible for the Governor to carry into effect the policy which he desired, when he was obliged, in the provinces where he was not himself President, to act through officers not appointed by the Crown, not removeable by it, but chosen by popular elections, and absolutely independent of any superior authority during the time for which they were elected? For that reason it had appeared to him that the clause to which he was alluding was one which ought not to have been passed, and when it had been proposed by a succeeding Government he gave it all the opposition in his power. He did not, however, succeed in persuading either the Government of the day or their Lordships to adopt his views upon the question; but the result had more than justified the anticipations which he had formed with respect to the working of the provision. Nor was that all. One of the first measures of the newly-created Legislature was to insist on establishing that which was very improperly called a responsible Government, and which was really a party Government—a character of Government which was the most irresponsible that could exist in a community such as that of which he was speaking. Such a Government, however, was demanded by the House of Assembly, and the demand was, he thought, most unfortunately acquiesced in by the Government at home during the Administration of Lord Aberdeen in 1854. For himself, he might say that he had always been of opinion that party government was but very little suited to a colony in the early stages of its existence, and, indeed, until it had made some very considerable progress; and that the real advantages of representative institutions could in such a case be enjoyed far more fully under the old system in accordance with which the Governor was responsible for the due exercise of the executive authority, not to the Assembly, but to the Crown, while, of course, the power was reserved to the Assembly to complain to the Crown of any maladministration on his part, and, if necessary, to appeal to the Imperial Parliament. The blessings of freedom could, he believed, be more perfectly enjoyed under that old system than under a party Government; and in that view he was confirmed by the experience of that description of Government furnished by our Australian Colonies, where the burlesque of our own institutions which was exhibited was of a nature of which those who had watched their proceedings must feel ashamed. The evils, however, arising from the vices of the system to which he was referring in Australia—where there were but few natives, and those few capable of causing no serious disturbances with the settlers—where the European inhabitants were already numerous and wealthy, and where the first difficulties of a new settlement had been almost completely surmounted—were altogether insignificant compared with those which must be expected to arise in a colony such as that of New Zealand, where all the circumstances which he had just mentioned were exactly reversed. It was impossible, he should contend, that a few thousand British settlers could be placed in contact with a much larger number of natives only just emerging from barbarism, every man of whom was used to war, and at the same time extremely sensitive as to the maintenance of his rights, and capable of understanding when he was wronged—it was impossible that all that should occur and that the entire power should be placed in the hands of the European minority without creating in the minds of the natives, who were the majority, a sense of injustice and deep discontent. That such had, at all events, been the result in this case was clear from the papers which had been laid on the table. He found that so long as the Governor possessed authority sufficient to enforce his impartial administration towards both races, the natives looked up to him as the representative of the Crown, who had real power to protect and befriend them. They were, with few exceptions, loyal, and attached to the Crown. That was the representation of the state of things some time ago, as given, not only by Sir George Grey, who might be disposed to be a partial witness as to the results of his own policy, but by those who succeeded him in the administration of the Government. He (Earl Grey) found that in February and April, 1854, the then acting Governor reported the continued prosperity of the colony, and the success of the measures for the purchase of land from the natives. In May, 1854, the acting Governor, on opening the new Legislature, congratulated that body on the peace and prosperity of the colony, and the friendly relations between the native and European races; and the House of Assembly, in their address in reply, expressed their concurrence in the language used by the Governor. The Legislative Council, in their address, spoke still more emphatically of the peaceful and friendly relations existing between the Queen's subjects of both races, and of the increasing intelligence and civilization of the natives. In July, 1854, the acting Governor reported that the purchase of land still continued to be easily made. At the beginning of the following year the reports were still better; but during its course symptoms of a change for the worse began to appear. In September Governor Browne, the present Governor, reported that he had seen the chiefs of most importance in the north; that they all seemed well disposed to the local Government; but that they did not view the Assembly very favourably, partly because they did not understand its power, but chiefly because they considered it less scrupulous in its desire to obtain land than the Governor, whom they looked on as a protector. In July, 1856, there proceeded still more unfavourable reports from the Governor of the disposition of the natives, for he said it was evident that they disliked popular government over which they had no check. And it seemed impossible that the case should be otherwise, because the authority of the Governor was reduced to a shadow. In the general affairs of Government he was obliged to act on the advice of his Executive Council, who, in fact, were the mere delegates of the Assembly; and, although there was a nominal reservation of matters affecting the natives as to which it was said he might act upon his own judgment, yet it was perfectly clear from reading the papers presented to Parliament that even with regard to native affairs the Governor had no real power, and that he did, in point of fact, implicitly follow the advice of the Executive Council. But what was worse than all was the administration of affairs in the provinces. Almost the whole patronage of the Government, and a great part of the control of the expenditure, had been transferred by a series of measures to the provincial Assemblies, and the Governor reported that superintendents would obey no instructions from the Governor except those which were in accordance with their own views; that they had the disposal of the funds for the time being in their hands; and that, in the political contests, they felt bound to favour the party to which they owed their appointment to office. Was it possible to be surprised that, under a government of this sort, the Maories should be discontented? They not only comprehended the injustice of being excluded from all practical share in the government, while constituting a large proportion of the population and of the contributors to the revenue, but they were made practically to feel the effect of this exclusion in various ways. They felt it by the miserable and inadequate grants grudgingly made by the Assembly for purposes in which the Maories were interested, and by the misuse of patronage for party purposes. He had no doubt, from information which had reached him, that nothing so much contributed to irritate the Maories against the existing Government as the manner in which patronage was misused. They saw men holding office, in the right discharge of the duties of which they were deeply interested, and in whom they had great confidence, replaced by other men whose appointment was due to party interests, and they said that the Crown was deprived of any effectual power of instituting an impartial administration in their behalf. It must not be supposed that these were the only grievances of the natives. It was impossible at this distance to judge of the details of the administration of a colony, but their Lordships would concede that in the daily administration of affairs there were many opportunities for acting oppressively; and he regretted to say that if the disposition of the European population was to be judged of from the tone of the public press, and from the language used at public meetings and in the committees of the Provincial Councils, there could be no doubt that there had grown up of late years a lamentable want of consideration for the feelings and interests of the Maories, and even of their lives. It appeared from the papers on the table that the Provincial Council of New Plymouth presented, in 1856, an address to the Governor, in which a want of consideration for the natives was most painfully manifest. It was also to be learnt from the able pamphlet published by Mr. Fox on this question that in 1858 this same Council called on the Governor to compel the natives to sever their tribal tenancies with a view to the acquisition of land, stating that the natives were incapable of offering any resistance. This fact was significant, especially when coupled with this other circumstance, that one of the representatives of New Plymouth was Mr.

Richmond, who held the situation of one of the responsible advisers of the Governor, and was what was called his Native Minister. What was still more significant was that it was the virtual adoption not very long afterwards of this advice of the memorial to compel the recusants to submit to the proceedings of the Governor in reference to the purchase of land that was the cause of the war. Could it be believed that Mr. Richmond would be a trustworthy adviser of the Governor in matters as they at present existed? There could be little doubt that the Maori race had just ground for discontent. That was not his opinion alone, but the recorded opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers also. It was implied very distinctly in many of the despatches, and still more in the measure introduced to Parliament last year, when the Government then brought in a Bill to establish a Council independent of the Assembly for the purpose of advising the Governor on native affairs. The only justification for such a measure was that the Government, as it now existed, could not safely be trusted in matters affecting the natives. That measure passed their Lordships' House, but failed to obtain the assent of the House of Commons. He rejoiced at that failure, because, although the evil was apparent, he did not believe the Bill provided a remedy for it. That measure would, indeed, only have led to a conflict of authority, and would have increased the evil. The Government had admitted in the course of the present Session, in the other House of Parliament, that affairs were not in a satisfactory condition in New Zealand.

There being, then, just ground of dissatisfaction on the part of the natives, and the local Government being so bad, he would ask, what did the Government propose to do? Did they propose to compel the natives to submit to a Government which they acknowledged to be unjust and bad, and, if they resisted, to reduce them to obedience? He trusted not. He implored them not to let this state of things continue, but to prepare measures of redress. It seemed to him that Her Majesty's Government ought without delay to take measures for the redress of the grievances of the native inhabitants, to endeavour to conciliate them by equitable arrangements, and to put an end to this war. Why should not Her Majesty's Government make an appeal to the well-known public spirit of Sir George Grey, and ask him to return to the colony with special powers to deal with so great an emergency? He was persuaded that Sir George Grey was a man of too much public spirit; and, moreover, he must naturally take too deep an interest in the welfare of the colony for which he had already done so much to refuse to make such a sacrifice, great as it would be, if he were asked to do so. But, if he accepted such a mission, he ought to be armed with large powers. In the present state of irritation of the Maories and the Europeans, perhaps nothing less would answer than the suspension for three years of the representative system of the colony, and the concentration of the whole legislative and executive authority in the hands of Sir George Grey and a Council deriving its powers from the Crown. Armed with these powers, the influence which Sir George Grey possessed over the minds of the natives would enable him to restore peace in the colony at no distant period. There was already a strong military force in the colony, but the presence of Sir George Grey would, as far as the restoration of peace was concerned, be worth more than 10,000 additional troops. Of course, after such a period of suspension, the representative Government of the colony could not be again brought into operation without correcting the defects that had been shown to exist in it. The calamities that had occurred would then have this good result—that Parliament would be enabled to decide what changes were required in the constitution of the colony. He believed that these changes were not numerous, and could easily be effected. If the arrangement for establishing a representative Government were assented to, and if the Governor were assisted, not by advisers whose advice he was bound to follow, and who held their office by the fleeting tenure of the ascendancy of parties, but by men of experience, selected for their knowledge, and holding office practically during good behaviour—so long as the Crown was satisfied with the mode in which they discharged their duties—if these things were done, and if a fair and fixed appropriation were made for the expenses of the Government and for those objects in which the Maories were concerned, he was not aware that anything else was required to enable representative institutions in a short period to be once more established with safety in New Zealand. If Her Majesty's Government declined to take the more decided course which, in his opinion, they ought to take, and to suspend during the war the action of the present Government of New Zealand, he trusted they would make modifications in the government such as he had pointed out. He knew it might be said that Parliament, having once conferred representative institutions on New Zealand, could now neither withdraw nor modify them. If the colonists were ready to undertake the defence of the colony against all but a foreign enemy, if they did not appeal to us in such cases, then they might have reasonable ground of complaint if we interfered with their institutions. But he found that it was urged in New Zealand that no less than 4,000 or 5,000 British soldiers, to be maintained at a large expense by the mother country, and two or three steamers, were absolutely necessary to enable them to defend themselves against their native enemies. Nay, he saw that they meant to push their claims still farther, and ask that the pay of their own militia and the expense of their own forces in the field should be defrayed, not from the colonial, but from the Imperial Treasury. He did not deny that in the present state of the colony it was necessary to assist the British settlers. He was persuaded that it was impossible for them to bring this war to a satisfactory close unaided; and he, therefore, did not object to the employment of a sufficient number of British soldiers for that purpose without charge to the colony. But, if the Government and Parliament of this country were to undertake the defence of the colony against the natives, they must also undertake the regulation of the policy by which it was in future to be governed. They must take care that the generosity of this country was not abused, and that power was not placed in the hands of the settlers in such a way as might lead to its improper exercise. Could it for a moment be pretended that it was just and reasonable that the colonists should on the one hand claim the undisputed right of managing their own affairs, and on the other have the liberty to call on the mother country to bear the burden of any war occasioned by their own mismanagement? If by injustice and oppression they drove the natives to resistance, were they to call on us to extinguish that resistance in blood without allowing us to exercise our judgment upon the measures resorted to? That was a doctrine which he was sure would receive no countenance from any of their Lordships. He believed that if the colonists were told that they must defend themselves as well as manage their own affairs, that would be a sufficient inducement to keep them on terms of friendship with their semi-barbarous neighbours. He was not ignorant that the colonists had much to bear. No doubt they were exposed to many wrongs and grievances, but those wrongs and grievances ought to be borne, not only with justice, but with forbearance. If the impartial authority of the Crown was to intervene for the government of both parties, that justice and forbearance could be enforced, for the Crown would not be influenced by those passions and feelings that naturally arose in the contact between civilized and half-civilized races; but if the government of both parties were left to the colonists themselves, with an unlimited power to draw upon the Treasury of this country, there would be taken away the only effective check for that selfishness which he feared human nature was never exempted from. He, therefore, felt himself bound to object to the measure before the House, as one entirely inadequate to the circumstances of the case; and he thought the second reading of the Bill afforded a legitimate opportunity of expressing to their Lordships his conviction that they could not safely leave matters as they were. He implored the Government not to think they could go on from year to year with things as they were, but to set themselves earnestly to the adoption of some wise and comprehensive measure that would meet the circumstances of the case. If they did not, they might be assured that before this war was brought to a close thousands of British soldiers would be sacrificed and millions of money would be spent, while in the end, in all probability, they would only be able to restore peace by reducing New Zealand to a desert, by exterminating the natives, after a struggle which would reduce the colonists to beggary, and drive them to seek homes in more peaceful and prosperous colonies.

LORD LYTTETON said, he was satisfied with the steps which had been taken by the Government, and with the despatches they had sent to New Zealand since the commencement of the war. He did not complain of the Bill now before their Lordships; but he must express the hope that the power given by it to the General Assembly of New Zealand would be exercised more carefully than it had been. He could not agree with the noble Earl (Earl Grey) in the opinion that the constitution of New Zealand was erroneous in principle. He should express his sympathy with the Governor of New Zealand on one point, and that was the spirit of hostility with which had been opposed by the leading ecclesiastical authorities. This he regarded as a very unfortunate circumstance. There seemed to be some mistake existing as to the object for which the colonization of New Zealand was undertaken. That colonization was the work of the New Zealand Company, backed by the Government, and had no other motive than the ordinary one. The work of colonization by a country like that of England, and that of evangelization were not naturally promotive of each other. Indeed, they were to a certain extent mutually obstructive; so that the best field for the one was not necessarily the best for the other. The best field for colonization was where there were few or native inhabitants — as Upper Canada, South Australia, and Port Natal, while the reverse was true to evangelization. We had certainly not done enough for the natives of New Zealand. What savage nations required was a great deal of Government; and he was afraid that in New Zealand we had, in a great measure, destroyed the Government that had formerly existed, and substituted very little, indeed, in its stead. He found among the papers a complaint from a native that when they adhered to their own customs they had "light," but that under the new order of things they were in "darkness." This was followed by an observation that we Europeans had effected this change, and that it was for us to lay down laws to meet the case. The colonization of New Zealand might be dated from the time when the Marquess of Normanby was Colonial Secretary. In a despatch dated August, 1839, the noble Marquess assumed that cannibalism, human sacrifices, and warfare among the natives were among the things which should be put down by force in New Zealand. Whether cannibalism and human sacrifices had ever been put down by force was a matter into which he should not now enter, but he found that the first Governor held that it was out of his power to put down warfare among the natives by that means. There were pages in the blue books to show that the Governor held as axiomatic that it was foreign to his business to interfere in the case of such an occurrence. The restless state of the natives had been known to the colonists for many years. It was now some years since a feeling had sprung up among them for a king. In former times they had no king, but were governed by chiefs. When the authority of those chiefs was destroyed, as had been the case, the natives cast about for some authority to rule them, and it seemed to them that the only substitute was to set up a king. With this view a feeble and imbecile old man named Potatau was elected king. He was now dead, but a successor had been elected king. This must be taken as an expression of the desire of the Maories for a native Government. With regard to the particular question of the origin of the present war, he (Lord Lyttelton) must confess, having read all the papers on their Lordships' table and many others which had reached him from New Zealand, that he quite agreed in the conclusion of the noble Earl (Earl Grey), that the question of the tribal right was one which was open to very considerable doubt. He must also say since the Bishop had expressed his opinion in favour of the tribal right, and particularly of the exercise of that right on the part of Wirimu Kingi, that a perusal of those papers had very much shaken his (Lord Lyttelton's) opinion on this point, and he should recommend no one to form a definite opinion on the matter without having read the last despatches on the subject, especially that one from the Governor, dated in December 4, 1860, which occupied a space of some thirty pages in the volume before them. He thought that the Governor had produced weighty evidence to the effect that there was reason to doubt whether any ancient signorial rights had existed at all among the native chiefs, and in favour of the justice and wisdom of the course he had pursued.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that his noble Friend the noble Earl, in introducing this interesting discussion on a very important question upon the somewhat slender basis of a Bill which he (the Duke of Newcastle) had asked their Lordships to read a second time, expressed the regret which he felt that this was the only Bill which Her Majesty's Government were prepared to lay on the table with respect to the colony of New Zealand. Until the close of the noble Earl's speech he (the Duke of Newcastle) felt surprised at this expression of regret, not only because he knew the noble Earl disapproved of the measure which he (the Duke of Newcastle) introduced last year, but also because he could not gather what remedial measure the noble Earl wished should be adopted. He (the Duke of Newcastle) would not say anything with regard to the recommendations he had received from time to time as to the measures he might have introduced; but his noble Friend had certainly misunderstood or had misquoted the observations which he made in introducing the measure of last year. He certainly did not advocate that Bill on the ground that he disapproved of the constitution or Government of New Zealand, or of the course that had been taken with respect to the management of native affairs. He understood his noble Friend to say that that was the sole ground upon which that Bill was supported. What he (the Duke of Newcastle) did say was this — that the Constitution Act of 1852 having imposed upon the Governor certain duties with regard to the management of native affairs, and it being found not only difficult, but almost impossible to carry those functions into effect, in order to enable him to do so he introduced that Bill giving him the assistance of a native Council. His noble Friend said he rejoiced that that Bill failed, because he thought the establishment of an independent native Council would have caused more confusion than already existed there. That, however, was not the opinion of the colonists. They objected to the Imperial Parliament legislating upon the subject, and he had expressly admitted that it was a purely exceptional case; but, so far were the colonists from thinking that a native Council would be productive of evil, that they had themselves introduced a Bill into the local Legislature constituting such a Council, thus adopting the principle, although varying the details, of the Bill of last year. His noble Friend had not dwelt at any length upon the origin of the war, and was right in abstaining from so doing, considering that they were now discussing the question a year after the commencement of the war; but, as the noble Earl had entered upon that question so far as to express his opinion, founded on the opinion of certain authorities in the colony, that the Governor was wrong, and that Wirimu Kingi's claim was a substantial one, he (the Duke of Newcastle) was bound to say that he did not concur in that opinion. He believed the Governor to be right, and in this respect he must say his mind had taken the same course as that of the noble Baron (Lord Lyttelton). Immediately after his return from America he wrote a despatch, in which he stated that he had doubts of the justice of the course that had been pursued; but the despatches since received, and particularly the one referred to by the noble Baron, had convinced him that the Governor was right, and that the balance of opinions inclined in his favour. He did not dispute the authority of Sir William Martin; but against that he believed he might set the opinion of the present Chief Justice Arney, and of many others who had studied the question thoroughly. He could not understand upon what principle the claim of Wirimu Kingi was based. It had been said that it was not right the Governor should raise this question on an insignificant piece of land. No doubt in quantity it was an insignificant piece of land; but the principle involved was not insignificant. He had reason to suppose that other claims of a similar character would be brought, and it might fairly be put to their Lordships whether the Governor would have performed his duty to the Government he represented, or to the colony, if he had withdrawn his claim because a powerful chief resisted, and whether he must not then have closed all purchases of land had he submitted to the dictation of Kingi whose claim was totally unsubstantiated. So far from the Governor acting hastily, nine months were spent in the adjudication of the case. Every claim was maturely considered. It had been said that the hostile claims ought to have been referred to a tribunal. This was very plausible at first sight; but what tribunal? Was there any tribunal in New Zealand to which such affairs could be referred? The Governor and settlers would have been only too glad to have had such a tribunal; but the opponents of such a tribunal had always been the natives. No Governor was ever in circumstances to constitute such a tribunal without raising the apprehensions or opposition of the Maories. The Treaty of Waitangi did not refer to such a tribunal, but it said that transactions for the purchase of land should be carried on between the native proprietors of the land and the Governor, and that was the course which was taken in this case. And there was no doubt that the adjudication of the Governor was more favourable to the natives than such a tribunal could be, proceeding as such a tribunal always must on legal principles rigidly applied between seller and purchaser; whereas, on the contrary, it had been the constant and most judicious procedure of the Government agents established by the Treaty of Waitangi to yield every doubtful point in favour of the natives; and no doubt they consulted the interests of the colony by doing so. This question of a tribunal had been strongly urged, among others by the Bishop of New Zealand, in the document which he called his "solemn protest;" and here he must say he was greatly obliged to the noble Baron who had just sat down for the course he had taken, and the language he held with reference to the conduct of the Bishop and the missionaries. If the words used had fallen from himself as colonial Minister no doubt they would have had but little effect; but coming from the noble Baron, occupying as he did an independent position, but one of warmest friendship to the Church in New Zealand, it could not fail to have an important influence. He trusted that excellent man the Bishop of New Zealand and the Missionaries of the Church of England would take in good part the lesson which had been read to them, and that they would in future abstain from that interference with the Civil Government which he had no hesitation in saying, on this occasion had been most unfortunate and mischievous. The protest, no doubt, was a most able document; but he must take the liberty of saying that if that protest had been on a political subject, or a question between the governor and the governed in any country nearer home, and had emanated from any bishop in a country of Europe, there would have been an universal cry against the impropriety of bishops and priests interfering in such matters, and above all of adopting such a tone as the Bishop of New Zealand had assumed. He made these allusions with very great pain to one holding the high position of the Bishop of New Zealand, and whom he so sincerely respected, both for his admirable character and as a minister of the Gospel; but he had certainly allowed himself, both on this and on former occasions to be diverted from his high calling into the partial advocacy of native rights which had led to consequences of a very serious kind. If he said so much with respect to that great man—for so he must call the Bishop of New Zealand—he said so still more emphatically with reference to smaller men in the Church, who, without the talent and ability, and, in some respects, the judgment he possessed, had certainly played a very mischievous part in these transactions. He would not say another word on this part of the subject with regard to the Bishop.

His noble Friend, as he had observed, had not entered at any great length into the origin of the war, and it was not necessary that he (the Duke of Newcastle) should do so. It would have been just as wise during the period of the great mutiny in India to have been discussing constantly in the press and the Houses of the Legislature the questions of the greased cartridges and other matters which were supposed to be the origin, but in reality were, no doubt, only the pretext of the rebellion. So he maintained that the question of the land was a mere pretext. He believed, however, that it had been providential both for the Maories and the settlers that the event had been hastened. However much anything was to be deprecated that led to war and bloodshed, if this occasion had been obviated, eventually we should have had a war of a more serious nature, when we were, perhaps, less prepared for it, and when the preparations of the natives were more complete. There could be no doubt, in his opinion, that the struggle was one for nationality. There was a feeling among the Maories that their nationality was becoming gradually extinguished, and they were, therefore, anxious to prevent the extension of the English over the country of which they felt they had themselves been the paramount possessors. In this feeling alone the Land League originated, of which Wirimu Kingi was the chief. He had heard it stated in favour of this chief that, although he was at the head of the Land League, his object was totally different from another movement—namely, the Maori King movement—because he did not join that chief who had been already referred to bearing the humble name of Potatau. Now, he attached no value to this fact at all. William King did not join that movement because it was not his interest to do so. Of course, William King would not join in a movement which was in fact a rival movement to his own. The Maori King was his rival; Kingi wanted to be a great paramount chief himself; but when he was obliged to enter into hostile operations against the British Government his scruples vanished, and he not only joined the Maori King but made the Land League subservient to his purposes. The King movement had been going on for the last seven years; but for some time it made little progress, and there was no doubt the Government policy of leaving it alone to die out of itself would have been successful if none had been concerned but the natives. The natives, however, in their hostility to the English Government, had not only been used but instigated by disaffected Europeans. There was no doubt upon this point. An agitation had long been carried on; emissaries had been sent abroad; in one part of the country subscriptions had been raised for setting up a printing-press with the view of disseminating among the natives everything which could excite them against the British Government; a flag had been designed and hoisted at the residence of this so-called Maori King—nay, more, an attempt was made to levy customs; all with the view of persuading the natives that the Governor of New Zealand had conceived a secret plan to exterminate them by degrees, and seize their whole lands for the common use of the British settlers. He did not say this without reason; and, if proof were wanted, he could point to the conduct of one of the native friendly tribes, who had shown every disposition to continue so in spite of the existence of what was going on around them. The question, in fact, had become one of sovereignty—a question between a Maori King on one side and the British Queen on the other. The natives were determined, if they could, to drive the British into the sea, and to establish an independent sovereignty under a Maori King. The Governor, in his last despatch, stated expressly that they showed no disposition to accept any terms of peace except such as should surrender the sovereignty of England. It was, of course, hardly necessary to say that no intention existed to extinguish the Maori race. He concurred with the noble Earl that the extinction of the native race would be most disgraceful to the character of this country. If there was one set of aborigines more than another which the English people respected and admired it was the Maori tribes. The Maories had shown many great qualities. They were almost, if not quite, as brave as Englishmen; and even in the present foolish and disastrous war they had performed individual acts of courage which did them the highest honour. He was sure, therefore, their Lordships would agree with him when he said that every life which could be spared would be a gain, and that the sooner we could bring the rebellion to a close the better it would be for all concerned. There could be no doubt that the causes of the war were of older date than the disputed purchase of land. He could not admit, however, that the chief blame lay, not with the representative institutions which had been introduced into New Zealand, but with what had been called responsible government. Party government might have aggravated to a certain extent the evils caused by representative institutions; but throughout the whole of the blue book he thought the noble Earl would find no more than the two passages he had quoted to indicate that responsible government had really alarmed the natives. [Earl GREY: Twenty others.] Well, he was quite unable to find them. On the other hand, there could be no doubt that the change in the constitution which took place in 1852 had deprived the Governor of powers which he then possessed, and had indirectly deprived him of what was of still more importance—namely, the funds which were formerly at his disposal. Up to 1852 the Imperial Parliament voted a considerable sum annually for native purposes, and no equivalent substitute had been supplied under the system of government established in that year. He could not agree with the noble Earl in what he had said in condemnation of the General Assembly of New Zealand. The debates of that Assembly had been conducted with singular forbearance towards the natives, and with every disposition to promote their interests, as well as with very remarkable ability and moderation. The tone of the press was a different thing; but it was not right to quote the opinions of the press as conclusive; at all events, the press might be quoted on both sides—for as well as against the natives. He agreed with much that the noble Earl stated with respect to the provincial Legislatures and to the elective character of the superintendents. It was a great misfortune that the superintendents were not only independent of the supreme Government, but that the persons elected were frequently antagonistic to it. The system was a bad imitation of that prevailing in the United States, without any of the reasons which might be found in support of it in that great republic. He could not help thinking that if the provincial Legislatures had been confined more to municipal duties, and if their presidents had been nominated by the Governor-in-Chief, that would have been a great improvement upon the system adopted in 1852. Although the revenue of New Zealand was considerable, nevertheless, it was of little general application, inasmuch as any surplus was divided amongst the provincial Governments, which generally contrived to absorb it altogether. Another cause of much of the mischief which had occurred was to be found in a merely nominal and fictitious extension of English laws to the natives. We had pretended to extend English laws to the natives, but in reality we had done no such thing, and under the present system the natives were neither separated from nor were they incorporated with English settlers. Scarcely any Maori was an elector. By the decisions of the Courts in New Zealand no title to land was recognized except such as was admitted by English law. If, therefore, a native wished to have a vote he must become a freeholder; but few natives could have any interest in acquiring a freehold. Nothing, he thought, could be more likely to conduce to the benefit of that colony, and to put an end to the state of things which had led to the present war than the adoption of that system which Sir George Grey had so usefully introduced at the Cape in the instance of British Caffraria—a system which he had previously carried to a certain extent in New Zealand itself, and which consisted in the acquisition of the friendship of the native chiefs by conferring upon them appointments in connection with the English Government, at the same time that they maintained their own position with the natives, and by establishing among them paid magistrates and a police. If, in addition, those schools to which his noble Friend near him had alluded were established, and the English language were taught in them, still greater advantages would in all probability result. The missionaries who went to the colony generally endeavoured to make themselves masters of the Maori language in order to communicate with the natives in their own tongue; forgetting the advantage to be acquired by the natives becoming acquainted with our language. He should next, notwithstanding that the House was becoming rapidly reduced to that number which usually sat out the discussion of colonial subjects, say a few words with reference to the disposition of the colonial Government to bear a due proportion of the expenses connected with its military administration. It had been observed in the course of the discussion that not only did the colonists expect that the British Government should pay the expenses of the whole of the Imperial troops which were sent out there, but that they had attempted to force upon us the payment of a purely colonial expenditure for the purposes of their own militia and volunteers. Now, he, for one, was entirely opposed to any attempt on the part of the colonial Government to throw on the Parliament of this country expenses which they themselves ought to bear; but he was at the same time of opinion that it was desirable the Legislature of Great Britain should be just in dealing with the subject. There was, in connection with the point to which he was adverting, considerable difference between the privileges of some colonial Governments and others, but he certainly could not help admitting that the demand which had been put forward on the occasion which had been referred to by his noble Friend was both improper and untenable. He was happy, however, to be able to state—and he had heard of the circumstance with great satisfaction—that an agent from New Zealand was engaged in negotiating a loan of £150,000 on behalf of the colony for the express purpose of defraying expenditure consequent on the war. He might add that he hoped it would turn out to be a fact that there was upon the part of the Colonial Government an intention to provide a fund with the view of carrying out those improvements which he believed to be necessary to the better administration of native affairs when the present war was concluded. One of the great difficulties which existed in dealing with a colony at so great a distance from us as New Zealand was that the Government at home was obliged to fix upon a particular course in entire ignorance of the state of things which might exist in the colony when their instructions had arrived at their destination. Two months had elapsed, for example, since the date of the despatches from New Zealand which had just been received, and it was quite possible that orders sent out from the Colonial Department might be found to be calculated to be disadvantageous, if acted upon in the position of affairs which might, between the present moment and the period at which they would reach the colony, arise. As to which was the most probable, peace or a continuance of the war in New Zealand, he could make no positive statement. There were many symptoms which would lead one to the conclusion that the natives were desirous to sue for peace, and he trusted that before long their better instincts might prevail upon them to surrender those points with respect to the abandonment of the Sovereignty of the Queen for which they were contending. Such being the prospects on the side of peace, there were, he must admit, on the other hand, serious appearances of a further extension of the war; and if those appearances should be realized the contest would, no doubt, in many respects, be one of the most disastrous character. Under all the circumstances of the case it was impossible to take at home steps of a very definite nature; but the Government, nevertheless, felt that there was one course which ought to be adopted—namely, to provide that the person to whom should be committed the management of the affairs of New Zealand should be a person likely to continue there a sufficient time to carry out any line of policy which it might be deemed expedient to pursue. The present Governor of the Colony, Colonel Gore Browne, would, in two or three months, have completed his period of office, inasmuch as at the expiration of that time he would have been there six years. It would, of course, be his duty if he were then Secretary for the Colonies to recall Colonel Browne, and to appoint a successor. He had, he might add, felt that it would not, under existing circumstances, be desirable to wait for the expiration of the time which he had just mentioned to take the necessary steps in the matter; for if the war should, by the end of two or three months, have terminated, the new policy to be adopted should be entered upon immediately afterwards. He had, consequently, felt it to be his duty to recommend to Her Majesty to appoint a successor to Colonel Gore Browne; and, he was happy to say that the Queen, acting upon that recommendation, had been graciously pleased to appoint Sir George Grey as Governor of New Zealand—a choice than which he quite concurred with the noble Earl near him in thinking no better could be made. He had, of course, felt that in asking Sir George Grey to return to the Government of a colony the affairs of which he had before administered, and that from an appointment which was looked upon as somewhat superior, he was making a tax on his patriotism, and calling upon him to perform a public duty at a personal sacrifice. He had, however, so much confidence in Sir George Grey's public spirit that he felt no doubt that when he received the intimation which he had sent out to him on the subject by the mail of last month—it being probable that by the next mail—namely, that which left England yesterday, he would receive official instructions to proceed to New Zealand—he would not lose a moment in making the necessary preparations and would set sail for his destination by the first opportunity. He had sent intimation to Colonel Gore Browne of the step which he had taken by the mail which had left for Australia yesterday; nor should he wish to close his remarks upon this particular point without marking his recognition in express terms of Colonel Browne's services. In recommending Her Majesty to send out Sir George Grey to New Zealand not the smallest reflection on Colonel Gore Browne's conduct was implied, and nobody, he thought, could read the despatches of that gallant officer during the period in which he held the position of Governor of the colony without feeling that they were written by a man of great ability, and were distinguished by consideration for all the interests with which he had to deal; while they clearly proved that no man had ever steered a clearer course than their author between the interests of the settlers on the one hand and those of the native population on the other. The only charge, indeed, he had heard made against him was, that he was too favourable to the latter; but he must, for his own part, say that he did not think that Colonel Browne had erred in that direction. He did not think that Governor Browne, though placed in circumstances of almost unparalleled difficulty, had acted wrongly in regard to the immediate pretext—for so he must call it—for this war, while he had shown a temper and discretion in all his transactions which did him the highest honour. Being a military man, and placed in a position which might tempt him to interfere more than a Governor should in military affairs, Governor Browne had, nevertheless, steered a clear and proper course, and the native population as well as the settlers in New Zealand would, no doubt, feel, when the war was closed, that, however distinguished had been the conduct of Sir George Grey, they also owed a debt of gratitude to the Governor whose period of office was now about to expire. He should be most unwilling to allow the slightest doubt to arise in the mind of any one in New Zealand as to the feeling in respect to Governor Browne which had induced this step to be taken, and he should have greatly regretted if he had not had this opportunity of explaining these circumstances, and of bearing this testimony. He might, further, state that he had recommended Colonel Gore Browne to Her Majesty for another governorship, thereby showing that his conduct was not disapproved. He would conclude by expressing his hope that the appointment of Sir George Grey would tend to bring about the entire suppression of these unhappy disturbances.

EARL GREY expressed his satisfaction at the statement made by the noble Duke. He wished to be understood as not meaning any censure on Governor Browne. Great mistakes had, doubtless, been made; but Governor Browne was not responsible for them, for he was in a false position, being deprived of the power to carry out his own policy. He thought the remembrance of the past services of Sir George Grey would render his appointment peculiarly acceptable to the people whom he was going to govern. At the same time he implored the Government not to place Sir George Grey in a false position. When he went to the colony he ought to go armed with those powers without which it would be impossible for him to bring his task to a successful close. Let Sir George Grey find, on his arrival in New Zealand, a British Act of Parliament suspending the existing constitution of that colony, and concentrating, as was absolutely necessary in a time of rebellion, all the power in the hands of the Governor.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he could not comply with this last suggestion of the noble Earl. He believed that it would be most unwise and most unjust to suspend the constitution on the ground of an insurrection of the native races. To adopt that course would be to punish the innocent for the sins of the guilty, and would create dissatisfaction among both races. He should think that the suspension of the constitution would be under any circumstances, and certainly under the present, one of the most impolitic acts which a British Minister could commit.

DUBLIN CORPORATION WATER BILL. CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration."

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he rose to move as an Amendment that the Bill be recommitted, for the purpose of hearing a petition from ratepayers of the city of Dublin, complaining of new matter that had arisen before the Committee during the progress of the Bill. Certain new clauses had been inserted in the Bill, after the opposition had been withdrawn, when the preamble had been proved. Injustice had thus been done to the interests of the ratepayers. His object was not to defeat but amend the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'Bill' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'be re-committed, for the purpose of hearing the Petition of Ratepayers and others of Dublin, deposited in the Private Bill Office, and complaining of matter which has arisen during the progress of the Bill before the Committee on the Bill,'—instead thereof.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he should oppose the Motion for a recommitment, the practical result of which would be to destroy the Bill for the Session. He hoped the House would not reverse the decision of a most able and painstaking Committee by assenting to the Motion.

MR. MASSEY said, the Motion was in the nature of an application for a new trial, and if the hon. Baronet could show that there had been any miscarriage of justice or any fraud practised it would be right for the House to agree to it. But this was not what the hon. Baronet alleged. According to him the fault lay with the counsel for the petitioners themselves. His case was that the ratepayers were damnified by the insertion of certain clauses in the Bill after their counsel had retired. But that was the fault of the counsel for the ratepayers, not of the Committee. There would be no end of litigation if such a course were to be allowed. If, indeed, the Members of the Committee were to express a wish to re-hear the case it would be a different matter; but he did not understand that to be the case.

MR. VANCE said, there was no wish to destroy or delay the Bill, and the investigation asked for would only occupy a few hours. The fact was that the clauses now objected to had not been argued or considered. They were not in the original Bill; they took most persons by surprise; and in some respects they were most oppressive and unfair. No good reason could be shown why Trinity College should be exempted and not the Dublin University. Then the Admiralty clause bound them for ever to maintain the same depth of water as existed at present in the channel and harbour of Wicklow, and this would operate as a great hardship. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Massey) said that the ratepayers ought to have stated their objections by counsel before the Committee, but the fact was that large bodies of other ratepayers now petitioned to have the matter reheard.

MR. C. R. M. TALBOT said, that as a Member of the Committee, he thought it most unreasonable to refer the Bill back to them. He contradicted the statement that the Committee did not consider the clauses complained of. It was true that those clauses were unopposed, but the Committee considered them, and thought on the whole that the Trinity College clause was a fair one, while they did not consider themselves warranted in altering the clause which was sent down by the Admiralty.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that Trinity College was exempted, as the students did not want the water, for they had always had as much as they chose to drink; but he could not understand how the river, which was first to be drunk by the citizens, was afterwards to cleanse Wicklow Harbour.

MR. GEORGE said, that if the Bill had been fully heard before the Committee, not only on the preamble but on the clauses, there would be no locus standi for those who sought to have the Bill reconsidered; but that was not the case.

MR. LEFROY said, that the insertion of the clauses relating to the University could be no reason for the recommitment of the Bill. It was so well known that these clauses were to be inserted that a petition was got up by certain parties in Dublin against them, and the University took over witnesses to support them, who, however, were never called upon. The Committee had conducted the inquiry in a perfectly fair and straightforward manner, and no ground whatever had been shown for recommitting the Bill.

MR. WALTER said, that as a Member of the Committee, he wished to reassure the mind of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, who seemed to think that the ratepayers of the city would be put to great cost in consequence of some threatened damage to the harbour of Wicklow. He had paid particular attention to the effect which the abstraction of the water of the Vartry would have upon the harbour of Wicklow, and he had examined Mr. Hawksley on the point; and from all the descriptions of the harbour given to the Committee, and the photographic views laid before them, he was perfectly satisfied that the abstraction of the water would have no practical effect on the harbour. The harbour consisted of a channel and a large shallow lagoon extending several miles, and the manner in which the engineers proposed to deal with it seemed likely to be most serviceable. They proposed to construct floodgates at a certain point, which would retain the water at high tide, and flush the harbour so as to clean it out at low tide. He was satisfied that there was no risk of the ratepayers being called on for compensation by reason of any damage resulting from the abstraction of the water of the Vartry, and he hoped the House, therefore, would support the decision of the Committee.

MR. DAWSON said, he sincerely hoped the Bill would never pass into law in its present shape, as no adequate advantage would be derived from the startling amount of taxation which it was proposed to place on the citizens of Dublin.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, it was useless to contend against the opinion of the Chairman of Committees and the Chairman of the Select Committee, and he would, therefore, withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. COWPER said, he felt bound to call the attention of the House to this Bill. It was generally agreed that an embankment along the Thames was desirable which should be open to all passengers; but the Bill before the House was a proposal of a railway company, to take possession of that embankment and make a railway upon it and levy tolls upon passengers. They proposed to get their capital partly by shares, partly by taking £400,000 out of the funds of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and partly from a Vote of Parliament. The clause on which this proposition was embodied was a curiosity in its way, and was worth reading. It ran thus—

“It shall be lawful for Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests to contribute, out of any money which Parliament may vote for the purpose, and to apply such sum of money as shall be sufficient to defray the expenses of compensation.”

The Government was to buy the land, and give the company as much as they wanted for their railway—a most convenient mode of proceeding for the company; but one which ought not to be adopted without the assent of the Executive Government. He was unwilling to take a hostile part on the subject of a private Bill, but he thought that in allowing such a clause to be passed they would be admitting a precedent which might have a very injurious effect. He, therefore, thought that it would be the duty of the House not to allow it to be read a second time. Another reason was, that a Commission had been appointed to examine into the subject and had not yet made its report, and if the Bill should pass there could be no action upon the Report of that Commission. He, therefore, moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”

MR. AYRTON said, he was informed that the right hon. Gentleman himself was mainly responsible for these objectionable clauses being in the Bill, and that the right hon. Gentleman had encouraged the promoters to insert them. [Mr. COWPER: No, no!] He believed that the principle upon which the Bill was founded was the only principle upon which there was the least chance of getting an embankment of the Thames without jobbing, without intriguing, and at a definite expense. If perfect irresponsible Royal Commissions were to go in search of schemes, and prepare for themselves permanent occupation, there would be no end to the cost and no end to the work. Westminster bridge had been in course of building for years, and the outlay had been enormous, while Victoria bridge had been completed by a railway company in about a year for £95,000, or just the expenditure which had been made on Blackfriars bridge to repair it, as it was called, but really to prepare it for demolition. The principle of the Bill was recommended by the Committee of 1856, and he hoped the House would allow it to be read a second time, although he quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be most inconvenient to adopt the clauses in the Bill to which their attention had been directed.

LORD FERMOY said, the embankment of the Thames was a most important—indeed almost a national—question, and they ought to deal with it in a proper manner. By the Bill, however, a private company proposed to deal with public money. He feared that such a proposal would result in jobbing. Again, a Commission was sitting, and about to report. Surely the House had better wait and see the report before deciding whether they would proceed by means of a private or a public Bill. It would be injudicious to allow these parties to occupy the ground, because, even if they decided in favour of a private Bill, it did not follow that the London, Chatham, and Dover was the company who ought to carry out the work.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the Select Committee which sat last year upon the subject carefully abstained from expressing any opinion either in favour or against a railway being carried on the top of the embankment. The Bill before them was a Railway Bill, and if the railway was struck out it would be entirely destroyed. He should be extremely sorry if the House, by giving the Bill a second reading, pledged itself to the principle that the embankment should not be carried out except through the agency of a railway company, and he should, therefore, vote for the Amendment.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, the company did not bind themselves to carry out the details as embodied in the Bill, but were quite willing to leave them to the decision of the Government. As he had charge of the Bill he should put the House to the trouble of dividing in order to show upon whom rested the responsibility of withholding from the Metropolis a work of great public utility.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there was danger in the House going to a division without understanding the real facts of the case. He must deny that the Government had been at all remiss in the matter. The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the subject recommended that the embankment should be executed under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and that the expense should come out of the London coal dues, so that no additional charge should be placed on the Exchequer. The Government lost no time in acting on that recommendation, and there was no remissness or supineness on their part. They issued a Royal Commission to inquire into the best plan for the embankment, and he himself brought in a Bill, the object of which was to appropriate the coal dues to that object. That question was now pending for the decision of the House. If the House decided in favour of the present proposal they would create a nominal company, which would not mainly be supported by the subscriptions of the shareholders, but by a large subsidy, to be provided by prospective Votes of the House, and by large contributions in the shape of rates upon the Metropolis, to be raised by the compulsory powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Such a decision would not only amount to the virtual rejection of the Government measure, but be totally unprecedented.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill if he had any objection to postpone the second reading until the Commission had presented their Report.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would agree to that suggestion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill was so objectionable in principle, placing, as it did, a large sum of public money at the disposal of a private company, that he could not assent to the course proposed.

STATE OF SIEGE IN VENETIA.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Forein Affairs, Whether, when Count Richberg, in his Despatch of the 27th day of April, denied that a state of siege existed in Venetia, it is not the case that the ordinary Government in Venetia is at least as severe as any state of siege, and that four men were executed by sentence of Court Martial at Venice or its neighbourhood on the very day on which Count Richberg dated that Despatch?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I stated in a despatch the general view which Her Majesty's Government entertain with respect to the Kingdom of Italy; and Count Cavour addressed a despatch to the Marquis d'Azeglio, the Minister at the Court of Her Majesty, and these papers I laid before the House. When they came to be published, Count Richberg addressed a despatch to Count Apponyi in London, which he read to me. I did not think it proper to lay that paper on the table of the House, and I did not think there was anything regarding the Government of Venetia which I ought to lay on the table. With regard to the matter referred to by the hon. Member, no intimation of the kind has been received at the Foreign Office; and of course I cannot give any information respecting a speech made by a Deputy in the Parliament of Turin, on the report of which the hon. Gentleman's question is founded.

CIVIL AND MILITARY OFFICERS IN INDIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Civil Servants who have covenanted with the East India Company under penalty to serve them in India, the Company having on their part entered into a contract that they should succeed to appointments usually filled by covenanted servants, will lose their title to those advantages in any plan for throwing open the Civil Service? Also, whether those officers who have purchased Commissions in the Company's service under the sanction and authority of the Government, will be permitted, in their turn, to sell the Commissions that they have purchased, under similar authority, after the amalgamation of the two services?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that of course to whatever extent any uncovenanted servant might be placed in a position hitherto exclusively reserved to the covenanted service he would be deprived of the advantage of that exclusive right; and he (Sir Charles Wood) proposed to introduce a Bill upon the subject. With regard to the second question of the hon. and gallant Member, he had to observe that it was not quite correct to say that any Indian officer purchased his Commission, or that there could be a case in which he was entitled to sell his Commission. The matter to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred was no doubt the fact that Indian Officers after serving a definite time were entitled to a certain amount of pay or pension, and that, by an arrangement made with the junior Officers of their corps or regiments, a bonus was given to them by those officers as an inducement to them to retire. That arrangement was known to the Government, and to a certain extent might be said to be sanctioned by the Government, who had announced their intention of not exacting from an Officer so retiring a declaration that he had received no money to induce him to retire. The arrangement, however, had been declared by a Court of law to be illegal, and he could not say that permission would be given by the Government to Officers to sell their Commissions after the amalgamation of the two services.

INDIAN PRIZE MONEY.

QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the Prize Money due to the Military Forces engaged in the suppression of the Mutiny in India will be paid; whether it has been employed by the Government or lent out for any other purpose; and whether those who have claims to it will receive interest upon the sums due to them? He also desired to know whether it is proposed to give the booty taken at Kirwee to the Army, and, if so, when and where; and whether it is proposed that Sir Hugh Rose's and General Whitelock's Forces shall both participate in it?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could do little more than repeat the answer which he had given upon former occasions to similar questions. It was impossible for him to say when the prize money due for the taking of Delhi and Lucknow would be paid to the army, because that event could not take place until the prize rolls had been made out and transmitted from this country to India. The money had not been employed by the Government or lent out. It was in the treasury of India, and no interest would be paid on all prize property to those to whom prize money was due. The booty taken at Kirwee was to be given to the army; but it was for the Treasury, and not for him to decide whether the forces of Sir Hugh Rose and General Whitelock should participate in the division of that booty.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE: Sir, I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out the views of the Postmaster General, expressed in a recent Letter, and annul the Galway Contract?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the communication made to the Galway Company by the Postmaster General was not the announcement of a decision of the Post Office, but was the communication of a decision of the Government. It is of course competent to the parties concerned to make to the Government any recommendation which they may think fit in regard to the communication so conveyed to them; and it will be for the Government to decide as they shall think fit upon any such representation as may be made to them. I would, however, remind the hon. Gentleman that a Motion proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Galway has been agreed to, for the production of all the correspondence upon this subject, and when that correspondence is before us the House will be in a better position than they can now be to form a judgment upon this matter.

THE UNITED STATES—CIVIL WAR—CORRESPONDENCE.

Copy presented, of Correspondence with the United States Government respecting Blockade [by Command].

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, in moving that this Correspondence should lie upon the table it may, perhaps, be convenient to the House, and especially so to the commercial interests in this country, that I should state the substance of the correspondence which has lately taken place with the Government of the United States of America with regard to the blockade of ports in that country. On the 19th of April the President of the United States issued a notification in which he intimated that it was intended to institute a blockade of the ports of the seven States which had seceded from the Union, and on the 27th of April another notification was issued, announcing that it was intended to blockade the ports of North Carolina and Virginia. When Lord Lyons applied for an official notification of the establishment and commencement of the blockade, he was told by the Secretary of State that it was not usual to make such a notification, but that it would be made by the different naval commanders at the several ports when the blockade was instituted. It results from the correspondence that the blockade is to be notified in that manner, and that one blockade has already been so notified; namely, that of the ports of Virginia and North Carolina by flag officer Prendergast, who has declared that he is in a situation to make an efficient blockade of those ports. There has been no notification of a similar kind with regard to the ports of the other States which it was declared were also to be blockaded. The rules, so far as Lord Lyons has been able to ascertain them, and of which he has given an account to Admiral Milne, commanding the squadron in those waters, are, first, that the notification is in each place to be made by the naval officer commanding the squadron or the ships which institute the blockade; and, in the next place, that fifteen days are to be allowed, after the establishment of the blockade, for vessels to come out of the ports. It appears that whether they were loaded or not at the time the blockade was established, provided they come out within fifteen days, their passage is to be allowed. On the other hand it is not permitted by the United States' Government that vessels should be sent to ports which are blockaded for the purpose of bringing away the property of British subjects, or the vessels or property of other nations. An application for such permission was made, to which the Secretary of State replied that if such a facility were granted it would be used by American citizens wishing to bring away property. Lord Lyons ends his communication to Admiral Milne very properly. He says that if the blockade is carried into effect according to the rules established by the law of nations we must of course conform to it; and that we can only see that the blockade is sufficient and regular.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: Sir, I think that the noble Lord ought to inform the House what means he has taken to give protection to British subjects and British property in the Slave States of America. I understand that the greatest outrages are being committed upon British subjects in those States. The noble Lord may have no information upon the subject, but I have this morning received letters from persons upon whom I can depend, and who have requested me to ask what the Government are doing or intended to do in this matter. There is not the least complaint made against the Government of the Free States. But in the Confederate States neither life nor property is safe, and it has been stated to me that British subjects who went there with wholly different objects and under very different circumstances are compelled to take up arms and fight in the pro-slavery ranks. The noble Lord took great credit to himself for having issued a proclamation and for declaring that the Foreign Enlistment Act will be put in force. But, if that be so, all persons compelled to engage in this war under such circumstances will be treated as pirates. The mercantile marine of America, particularly of the Southern States, is chiefly manned by Irishmen and Englishmen, and others from our own colonies, who will now be compelled to remain and to enter the ranks of the belligerents, and if taken, though they may be loyal subjects of the Queen who wanted to get away, but had not the means of doing so, under the noble Lord's proclamation they will be treated as pirates. We talk of our neutrality; we boast of it. A letter which I have received from a gentleman asks:—"Is it nothing that a British officer," the captain of a merchant vessel, "has been tarred and feathered?" [Laughter.] It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen to laugh, but I foresee that these are questions which will involve us in difficulty before long. "Is it nothing," this gentleman asks, "that a British subject has been tarred and feathered; nothing that free men of colour, British subjects, are imprisoned; nothing that men of colonial birth are forced to sea in an open boat; others held as prisoners, and that Englishmen should be compelled to fight in pro-slavery ranks?" What is to be done, and what means have been taken by the noble Lord to give those persons an opportunity of avoiding being treated as pirates. I can state on reliable information that at this moment there is an advertisement in the newspapers of the Slave States offering on the part of the Confederated States 20 dollars for every person killed aboard an American vessel. What a set of savages they must be! Who would care for going to war with such a people? Do you suppose the people of Canada will submit to have their fellow-subjects dragged away and compelled to fight for slavery? They will stand no nonsense, and after a time your very neutrality will lead you into war. The question which I have been requested to ask is whether it is not intended immediately to increase the British squadron on the Southern coast, and to have every vessel examined, so that Englishmen, Irishmen, and subjects of our colonial empire, who may be serving compulsorily on board American vessels shall have an opportunity of getting away in case they wish to do so? I have received letters from men on whom I can depend, and they all state that occurrences such as I have adverted to have already taken place, and more will undoubtedly follow unless England adopts a more decided tone. We have no right to sit down and occupy ourselves exclusively in quarrelling about the paper duties while our fellow subjects are suffering by hundreds and thousands in the hands of these savages.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Sir, I must, at this early stage, protest against the language made use of and the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), who has altogether prejudged this question. He talks of reliable information which he has received from certain friends of his; but I am also in possession of reliable information which gives the direct lie to the statements made by the hon. Gentleman. I am not only in a position to deny that any of those outrages have been committed in the Southern States; but, if this were the proper time, I could point to outrages committed by the militia of New York in one of the Southern States occupied by them, where the General commanding, on the pretext that one of his men had been poisoned by strychnine, issued an order of the day, threatening to put a slave into every man's house to incite the slaves to murder their masters. Such was the general order issued by General Bulter. Therefore, do not let us be led away by old wives' tales into appeals to that very powerful and very dangerous element in this House—I mean the Exeter Hall feeling. I do hope the feeling of the House will be strongly expressed against anything like a debate upon this subject at the present moment; and that hon. Gentlemen will not be tempted to follow my hon. Friend, but will rather imitate the judicious silence which the noble Lord has always maintained on this point.

MR. BRIGHT: I think nothing could be more injudicious or more unfortunate than to have submitted to us accounts from private letters of particular outrages said to be committed in America. We know, before war is terminated, there or anywhere else, there will be outrages enough; but of this I think we may be quite assured that in the North as well as in the South, and in the South quite as much as in the North, there will be the greatest possible disposition to avoid everything which can bring about a quarrel with this country. Nothing could be more unfortunate for the South, nothing could be more unfortunate for the North, whatever quarrels there may be between the two sections of the American Republic, than that the quarrel should extend to this country. I feel confident that we are not more anxious to remain at peace with both the sections than they are to continue on good terms with us. In the policy which the noble Lord has announced—that of strict neutrality—I agree as cordially as any other Member of this House; and I think it would be well if that policy were not confined merely to the Government, but if individual Members of the House were as far as possible to adopt the same line of action. It is an unhappy thing that these dissensions should have arisen; but let us hope, and I hope still, that among a population more extensively educated, probably, than the population of any other country in the world, it may yet be found possible to surmount the vast difficulties which have arisen in that country without those extensive cruelties which almost always accompany a civil war. With that expression of opinion I wish to make a request—and the House, I am sure, will feel that I am only asking what is reasonable and prudent—that we should avoid, as much as possible, discussions on matters which, I believe, we cannot influence for good, but with regard to which we may create a state of feeling, either in the North or South, that will add to the difficulties of the Government in preserving the wire line of action which they have laid down.

MR. GREGORY: Sir, I really must warn the House not to be led away by stories and by letters which one gentleman has received from another gentleman, on whom he places the most implicit reliance, but who very probably knows nothing more of the matter than the Gentleman who reads the communication with such perfect faith in the accuracy of its contents. As to the nonsensical trash of twenty dollars being offered by the Confederate States for every man put to death on board an American ship, the House knows perfectly well that neither letters, newspapers, nor accredited information of any kind can at present be received from the South, but all are stopped on the borders. Anything which does see the light is cut into slips and published in the New York papers. Very few communications of the kind have reached this country, and they are principally the State documents which have been put forward by the South. I cannot better evidence the spirit by which they are animated than by referring to the late address of President Davis; and I will ask the House whether it breathes a single one of those blood-thirsty, wicked, terrible opinions which my hon. Friend is anxious to impress on the House as being the doctrine of the Southern States? I beg to take this opportunity of saying that I shall certainly bring forward my Motion on the subject of the recognition of the Southern Confederacy on the 7th of June, when I trust the matter will be fairly discussed, and in the meantime that we shall not throw imputations on one party or the other.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: Sir, in the question of notification of blockade to which reference has been made a matter which is very important for the commercial interests of the country is involved. The rule, I believe, is this—Public notification must be given to the State of which a neutral who seeks to violate a blockade is a member, before he can be held to have subjected himself to forfeiture of his vessel and goods; or actual notice must have been given to the neutral himself. The House will see that this is a most important question, because the intent to sail to a blockaded port, as to which a neutral merchant has received a notice of blockade, is considered as a violation of neutrality, and the ship will be accordingly condemned in the prize court of the capturing Power. I wish the noble Lord to state distinctly whether or not the mercantile interests of this country are to understand that a public notification of blockade of the ports to which he has referred will be given; or that merely an intimation of the blockade to neutral ships arriving off those ports will be given to them when they get there?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that he could not give any further information to his right hon. Friend with regard to the blockade; but the papers on the subject would shortly be laid on the table, and when they were submitted the House would be in possession of the exact state of the case. But his right hon. Friend would understand that when Mr. Seward was asked whether he would give a notification of the blockade he refused to do so, saying that he found no precedent for such a proceeding. He (Lord John Russell) referred him to a precedent, but Mr. Seward said that he would not give a general notification of a blockade, but would leave it to the naval commanding officer on each station to declare that the blockade had been instituted, and when that was generally communicated it was to be considered that the blockade was of course, established. He would not regularly enter into questions which might afterwards have to be argued and decided in a prize court with regard to the regularity of the blockade. He had no doubt that the United States Government, always very cautious on the subject of blockades, had consulted precedents and taken the best legal advice before they had adopted the course which had been pursued. With regard to the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, he must say that it was founded on rather on a vague statement, and he had not brought forward any particular facts upon which the Foreign Office could take any steps. His hon. Friend had alluded to the case of the master of a merchant vessel who had been tarred and feathered, but the case occurred several weeks before anything like the outbreak of civil war—at a time, in fact, when the whole country was at peace. There might have been some intention of secession, but no secession had actually taken place. There were rumours of a very disparaging character with regard to that master of a merchant vessel, and he was attacked and ill-treated by the mob; but the authorities endeavoured to arrest the rioters, and the English Consul stated that they had done everything that it was possible to do to afford him protection. That affair, therefore, had really nothing to do with the question of secession or civil war. With regard to such cases generally, he might refer to the steps which had been taken by the Government, and they were chiefly these:—They had desired that Admiral Milne should be present with a sufficient squadron, and orders have also been given by the Admiralty that other vessels should be sent out to strengthen the squadron in those seas. Lord Lyons had taken care to inform himself in regard to the law of the United States and of the seceded States in regard to persons serving in the militia. Those laws varied in different States in Europe, and they varied even in the different States of America. Lord Lyons had taken the opinion of counsel, and, no doubt, if any question arose Lord Lyons would entertain the matter with due discretion, having reference both to international law and the law of the particular State in respect to which the question arose. In the next place, without entering on the question of neutrals, which he should be ready to discuss at the proper time, he might state that Her Majesty's Government had been in communication with the French Government, and had made a proposition on that subject to the Government of the United States. He agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) that in respect to that unhappy quarrel, which had given the greatest pain throughout the whole of the country, no words should be used which would either tend to bring the country into the conflict or that might create exasperation or bitterness on the one side or the other. That a great and free nation like America should be exposed to all the evils of civil war was an event which every lover of liberty must deplore, and he hoped that the conflict, if it could not be averted, might, at all events, be a short one, and not interfere with the ultimate prosperity of the country.

Petition to lie upon the Table.

THE DERBY DAY.

ADJOURNMENT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I have to move, Sir, that the House at its rising do adjourn until Thursday. I think it will be for the very general convenience of the House that it should adjourn over Wednesday; and it is quite unnecessary to go into any details of the reasons which induce me to make this Motion, because I think that the reasons must be patent to every hon. Member.

MR. BENTINCK said, he did not rise for the purpose of offering any opposition to the very popular proposal of the noble Lord; but when a Motion was made which would have the effect of taking away one of those days which were considered at the disposal of private Members, it appeared to him a very proper opportunity to call the attention of the House to the position of private Members in respect to the business of the House, and which had resulted from the recent alteration which had been made in the mode of conducting business. When that alteration was proposed by the noble Lord he ventured to offer some opposition to it, on the ground that its effect would be to take away a portion of the time which had hitherto been placed at the disposal of private Members. The noble Lord assured them that such would not be the case; and that so far from it, in his opinion, it would rather add to the time at their disposal, because from the arrangement that Supply was to be taken on Fridays after the private Members' business was disposed of, a House would be kept, so that private Members would be always able to ensure that day for the introduction of the various topics which they might wish to bring before the House. What had really been the effect of the change? On Tuesday, the 14th, the House was counted out at a quarter before seven. They might be told that that was in consequence of the very uninteresting nature of the business which private Members brought before the House. But what happened on the two following Fridays? On Friday the 17th, a day on which the noble Lord assured them that they would have more time at their disposal in consequence of the Government being interested in keeping a House to go on with Supply, the House was counted out at a quarter past eight. That was bad enough; but last Friday it was still worse, for when the Speaker came down to take the chair there were not forty Members present to make a House, and, consequently, an immediate adjournment took place to Monday. Was it possible to imagine a more complete refutation of the statement of the noble Lord, or a more forcible justification of the opposition which he (Mr. Bentinck) made to the Motion? The inconvenience which had resulted to private Members had been still greater on account of the frequent and urgent appeals which had been made to them by Members on the Treasury bench to give way on the ground of public convenience. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had on a recent occasion entreated the House to go on with the business on the ground that great inconvenience would result to the public if the Budget Resolutions were not proceeded with. Now he (Mr. Bentinck) had always been under the impression that private Members gave way on the implied, if not expressed understanding that the Government should give its assistance in getting a House when private Members had Motions, so that the public time might be economised. To their surprise, however, so far from pressing on the public business, the Government appeared to have so much time at its disposal, or the public business was of such little importance, that it was of no consequence whether it was terminated a week sooner or later, and on the very subject with respect to which they were called upon to come to a decision some weeks ago, on the ground that it was of the utmost importance to have it settled, the Government had recently proposed a further adjournment of the debate. That rendered the position of private Members still more hopeless than it was before. They had been deprived of the privileges they had possessed up to the period of the alteration, and it was quite clear that they could not expect any assistance from the Government in getting that time which it was proposed to reserve to them by the arrangement then made. After hearing so much of the "independence" of the House, he was surprised that they should have so tamely submitted to the deprivation of one of their greatest privileges by an arrangement between the two front benches—namely, the Ministerial and the front Opposition bench. He did not blame those benches. It was natural enough that the leaders on both sides—those who were in office and those who expected to be in office—should do all they could to put a stop to the operations of private Members altogether, and he would do them the justice of saying they had always done their best to carry out that principle. But he did blame that want of independence on the part of the House in general which allowed it to be deprived of its rights and privileges. He had cited pretty good proof of how the new arrangement was likely to work, and if no more influential Member took up the subject he should attempt to induce the House to reverse the injudicious decision to which it had lately come.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I feel it my duty to say, having been one of those who were responsible for the change in the course of public business on Fridays, that I certainly did so on the clear understanding that the Government would feel it his duty to secure a House on that day. On some occasions, no doubt, a "No House" may be beyond the control of the Government, but this does not seem to have been the case on Friday, for I am informed that when the adjournment was declared only two Members of the Administration were present. Now, there ought to be a clear understanding on this subject, and the noble Lord should, I think, give us an assurance that the Government will consider it their duty always to make a House on a Friday. When, indeed, I recall the language of the Standing Order on the subject, I very much doubt whether, strictly speaking, the House ought not to have met last Saturday. The Standing Order, if I recollect it, says that the House after its meeting on Friday shall, without the Motion formerly made, adjourn at its rising until the Monday; but the Standing Order, I think, cannot have applied to the case of last Friday, because the House did not really meet them at all. If that be so our proceedings were altogether irregular, and the Speaker ought to have resumed his seat, and, if possible, to have formed a House on Saturday. All this shows that our proceedings in reference to the recent change in the mode of conducting our business, are of a very crude character, and it will be very desirable, therefore, to arrive before long at some general conclusion which will be more satisfactory to the House. At all events, I trust the noble Lord will assure us that he will consider it one of the duties of the Government always to make a House on a Friday, and to give us those advantages which certainly on the part of the Government were undertaken to be secured to us.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I can assure hon. Members that the Government themselves regret that no House was made on Friday last, because we ourselves had business which we should have liked to bring forward. That "No House" was the result of accidental circumstances, but, undoubtedly, it would be the desire of the Government to secure, if possible, the making of a House on Friday. As to the other instances mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, I can only say that, if private Members bring forward questions of interest, other private Members will probably attend and listen to them, but if they do not think it worth while to do so, it is not in the power of the Government to make them. While it may be the duty of the Government to make the House on Fridays, keeping the House must depend on private Members rather than upon the Government.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would remind the noble Lord, that by an old Parliamentary tradition there were certain Members whose duty it was both to make a House and to keep a House.

Motion agreed to.

EDUCATION OF NEGLECTED AND DESTITUTE CHILDREN.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in rising to move for a Select Committee on the subject of the Education of Neglected and Destitute Children, said, that a conference had been held at Birmingham in the autumn, at which it was determined to bring the matter under the consideration of Parliament, and he was requested to submit it to the House. Parliament was in the habit of granting every year a large and increasing sum, amounting in the present year to upwards of £800,000, for the promotion of national education among the children of the poor. That sum was applied in educating children ranging from the lower ranks of the middle classes down to a certain level among the lower classes. It was, of course, distributed subject to certain conditions, with a view to prevent abuse, and those conditions were such that the fund did not reach the children of the poorer classes below a certain level. Now, how were these children provided for? Provision was made for the education of some of them in workhouses, and certain funds, amounting to £80,000, were voted annually for the education of others in reformatories, and in certified industrial schools; but these votes were on a totally different footing from those made for the promotion of national education. The last-mentioned sums were granted in aid of the eleemosynary efforts of charitable persons and of certain fees paid by the poor. The State did not profess to educate anybody gratuitously in these schools. But in the workhouses the State stood towards the children in loco parentis, and both maintained and educated them, while it assisted private efforts in establishing reformatories with a view to prevent and decrease crime. Certified industrial schools, again, were intended for certain vagrant classes of children who might become criminals, and for whom it was thought desirable to provide in this way; and these schools stood in the same relation to reformatories as reformatories did to prisons. But in distributing the funds voted for these schools it was also necessary to attach conditions in order to prevent abuse, and it thus happened that there was a class of children who were not comprised in the reformatories, in the industrial, or in the national schools. With regard to reformatories and industrial schools, it was necessary to say that children should only be admitted there by a sentence or an order from a magistrate, and should have brought themselves within the cognizance of the law in some specified manner. But there was a large and important class of children who were below the standard practically fixed by the education grants, but who were also above the grants in aid of reformatories and industrial schools, and the question he wished to submit was, whether the State proposed to do anything for these children, and what it proposed to do? That question was one of great difficulty, and it was for that reason, and not to carry out any preconceived idea of his own, that he asked for an impartial Committee to examine into the subject. The range of its inquiry need not be very wide, and it would be easy during the remainder of the Session to condense the information which it would be necessary to obtain and to arrive at a practical conclusion. But it would probably be said, "The whole subject has already been inquired into by a Royal Commission, which, after sitting for a period of three years, has produced very recently an elaborate Report. This Report is still sub judice; the evidence on which it is founded has not yet been presented; and it is improper as yet that any one should ask for further inquiry into the subject." It might even be said that he was showing disrespect to the Commissioners by taking that course, and was casting a slur upon their labours; but to such an indictment he did not plead guilty. He had the highest respect for the Royal Commission, for amongst them were some of his most intimate friends: Sir James Coleridge for instance. It was quite certain they had conducted the inquiry with a desire to arrive at a right conclusion, and they had also produced a Report which he did not hesitate to say was of the highest value. It was not quite clear, however, from what had occurred in "another place," that the Government were prepared to accept the conclusions of the Commission in their entirety. At present the Government had the Report under their consideration, and next year, probably, Parliament would be called upon to take some steps to give effect to the Report, or, at least, to so much of it as the Government might ultimately see reason to adopt. He was anxious, however, before those steps were taken, that that part of the inquiry should be completed which the Commissioners had left incomplete, and that the House should have before it full information as to that class of children which fell between the two classes now receiving the grant. The first point which he should have to establish before the Committee would be the existence of that class, because he had heard it said that there was no such class. The fact was that that unfortunate class were sunk into such a low state of ignorance that they were not only ignorant themselves, but the cause of ignorance in others, and there could be no more conclusive ground for the necessity of a Committee than the fact that there were persons who denied their existence. What he desired was to bring such persons as Dr. Guthrie, Miss Carpenter, and others who had gone into the large towns and brought back tales of what they had discovered there which one could scarcely believe, face to face with a Select Committee which might criticise their statements, and might say how far that class of children was a proper object for a share of the educational grant. The next point, after establishing the existence of the class—and that was admitted by the Royal Commissioners—would be to inquire what means there were for providing education for them. In the first place there were the ordinary pay schools, and it would be a question deserving consideration whether these schools were suitable to them, and whether they were able to comply with the conditions of those schools. No doubt a certain number of them might be admitted into these schools, either at once or after a certain ordeal. Some people seemed disposed to say, "Why don't they make themselves nice and tidy, and go to school like other children?" but that was very like the old story of the French Marchioness, who, when she was told that the people were starving for want of bread, said they were very silly, then, not to eat buns. Then, it was said that it was no part of the duty of the State to supply the neglect of the parents, and that if children were so unfortunate as to have parents who would not send them to school, it was not for the State to interfere with them. He, for one, was prepared to controvert such a position. The whole principle of the education grant was an eleemosynary one. The parent paid something, but the State paid a great deal more in order that the child might have an education worth having; not for the sake of the parent but of the child, and because it was thought important for considerations of State that the children of the State should be well educated. For that purpose the State stepped in and gave double or treble the amount paid by the parent; for out of the annual cost for educating each child the parent was only called upon for 6s. 6d., while the State paid about 10s, and private persons about 11s. per annum. Surely, therefore, if that eleemosynary principle were adopted in one case, it ought to be applied to that unfortunate class of children out of which our criminal population was recruited. If the parents of these children were unable or unwilling to give anything, that did not discharge the State of its duty. But then it might be said that these children might be sent to certified industrial schools and other schools conducted on that principle. If the country were ready to make education compulsory, then that course might be adopted; but it would be some time before that principle could be adopted here, and until it was so, the schools in question would not meet the wants of the class, since they were open only to children who were in some sense offenders against the law. To return to the question whether the pay schools were fit for that class of children or the children fit for them. On that subject he trusted hon. Members had read the Report of the Commissioners. These children did not want a high-class education in matters of literature; but they wanted the rudiments of education—reading, writing, and arithmetic, and sound, moral, and religious training. No doubt the pay schools were exceedingly well managed, but they did not supply the particular kind of education which these children particularly wanted, and the whole tone of the Report of the Commissioners showed that such was the case. The Commissioners reported that the children did not remain at such schools sufficiently long in some cases even to be able to read and write; and that the religious instruction in them was non-intelligent, and the lessons imparted to them not calculated to form a religious character. These schools did not supply that sort of moral and religious training which, in the case of the lower classes of children, was the one thing they wanted. The teachers were generally very young men who had received an education of a refined character, and they naturally shrank from contact with ragged and dirty children. They had not the knowledge of, and sympathy with, human nature, which alone enabled the masters of ragged Schools to deal with outcast vagrant children, and to reclaim them. The pay schools were not the proper schools for these children even if they could get in there, and, if they did get in, they would disarrange and do a great deal of mischief to those schools. He made those statements partly on what he found in the blue-book, partly on what he heard out of doors, and partly on what had fallen under his own observation. He did not want them to take his statements for granted. He was asking for a Committee to examine into the whole subject, and he indicated what his views were, because he thought no one ought to move for a Committee who was not prepared with some views to lay before it, but he was ready to enter into a fair and impartial investigation of the whole matter. In answer to the objection that these children were so ragged and dirty as to be unfit for the better class of schools, it was suggested that benevolent persons might give them good shoes and clothes, and the necessary pence, in order to attend; but it was perfectly well known that in too many instances the good shoes and clothes would be turned into gin, and drunk by the parents. The Commissioners pointed out that a considerable number of these children might be provided for in pauper schools. The claim of the children to consideration was not denied, but each department in turn said it was not its business to provide for them. The Poor Law Board might admit a certain number who were the children of out-door paupers, but a great many were not the children of paupers, and it would be said that it was contrary to the principle upon which the Poor Law was administered to assist them. Some proposals of the Commissioners with regard to those children who fairly came within the pauper class would, if adopted, lead to a great improvement in the mode of providing education for them. But those proposals would necessarily give rise to considerable discussion, and very possibly the House would not adopt them; but, even if they did adopt those proposals, the whole class would not be provided for, and the Committee might inquire how they could be provided for if that plan were not adopted. A great deal had been said with regard to the certified industrial schools. No man looked upon those schools with more interest than he did, as, in conjunction with a right hon. Friend near him, he introduced a Bill to extend to England the system which prevailed in Scotland. He believed that the certified Industrial Schools were immensely valuable, but at the same time those schools had their limits, and it was impossible to extend them so as to take in all these children without serious inconvenience. As to expense, he was not bringing forward the question with the view of throwing any additional expense upon the funds of the country. He was anxious to see how they could most economically deal with these children, for deal with them in some way they must, and he believed that the certified industrial schools would be very much more expensive than other schools which would be found more efficient. A very excellent Bill was before the House, which he hoped would pass, but it must be remembered that that Bill authorized the Treasury to pay 3s. per week in respect of all these children. He did not say that it was an unnecessarily heavy charge, but he wished the Committee to inquire whether the education of these children could not be provided at a much less expensive rate? On the ground of expense, therefore, the certified industrial school was not the proper mode of dealing with these children; and, besides that, it was necessary, in order to prevent abuse, to have some safeguards which partook of a penal character, which introduced the interference of a magistrate, and which, to a certain extent, infringed on the liberty of the subject. They might say that any child who did any of certain acts should be sent to those schools, but unless they said that every child whose parents did not give it education should be sent there they would not reach the whole class. He had now spoken of the pay schools, the workhouse schools, and the certified industrial schools, and had endeavoured to show that none of them would meet the wants he had described.

Sir Stafford Northcote

There remained yet another class of schools—the ragged schools. He had avoided any mention of ragged schools in his Motion, and did not wish to bring that part of the question particularly before the House. He was bound, however, to express his opinion that much more use might be made of these schools than was done at present. It was said that they were disorganized and ill-managed, that they were draining the paid schools, and receiving children whose parents were able to supply them with education, and, in short, doing a great deal of mischief. Now, without questioning the conclusions of the Commissioners, he held that their own evidence showed that there was a strong case for inquiry into these schools, and for an effort to turn them to better account. For instance, in the Report of the Commission a broad distinction was drawn between the ragged schools in Bristol and Plymouth. Those in the former city were described as generally well conducted, and doing a great deal of good, and those in the latter town as ill-conducted and productive of evil. That was a conclusive reason for an inquiry into these schools, to ascertain why there were such differences among them, and whether those which were doing badly could not be assimilated with those which were doing well. The Report of the Privy Council, which had been just presented to the House, contained a passage from the pen of Mr. Ruddock, the Inspector of Schools in Gloucester, in which he spoke of the great care which was taken by the different committees of ragged and industrial schools in that city to confine them to the class of scholars for whom they were intended; and expressed his conviction that, as far as the schools which he had visited were concerned, few of the children in them would obtain any education whatever but for their existence. That was the evidence of an official and impartial authority, that some of these schools were doing good. The children were there, and something must be done for them. Did any one believe that, because there was no place for them in the official system, the class would therefore cease to exist, or that benevolent persons would not endeavour to deal with them? It was not right that a stain which they did not deserve should be thrown upon the character of the ragged schools, and that the education of the unfortunate children should be left to private charity, because it happened to be a difficult question how to treat them. If it could be shown that the ragged schools were doing only harm, then let the Government come boldly forward and suppress them. On the other hand, if the truth was that, although some of them might be bad, all were not so, then an earnest effort ought to be made to convert the worst of them into what the best were now. He trusted he had not said anything to give offence. Nothing was further from his wish than to cast any reflection on the Commissioners, but he felt strongly on the subject, and entreated the House not to say “Because there are difficulties in the way we will throw the thing overboard.” All he sought was an inquiry; and if the House would agree to his Motion he would endeavour to procure as fair and impartial a Committee as possible. He felt that he might look with confidence for support from many Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. He might appeal to the noble Lord the Member for the City, who had always taken a deep interest in the education of the lower classes. He entreated the House seriously to face the question boldly, and at least to respect the feelings of those who, like Dr. Guthrie and Miss Carpenter, had been labouring in the cause for many years, and who thought that justice had not been done to their efforts.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire, how the funds voted by Parliament for the promotion of National Education may be most efficiently and most economically applied, in the case of neglected and destitute children.”

MR. LOWE: Sir, I have no doubt there is a strong desire on the part of many hon. Gentlemen that an inquiry of the nature proposed by the hon. Baronet should be granted, and if it can lead to any good I shall be very glad to see it instituted. It is no part of the business of the Education Department to stand in the way of any investigation of the kind which the House may desire. The subject is an exceedingly interesting one, and has been treated with great ability and candour by the hon. Baronet. I may say in limine, that as far as the Government is concerned, there is no objection to an inquiry on the subject. I must, however, take the liberty of objecting to the terms of the hon. Baronet's Motion. That Motion is to inquire—

“How the funds voted by Parliament for the promotion of National Education may be most efficiently and most economically applied, in the case of neglected and destitute children.”

My first objection is that it assumes that the Commissioners were wrong in their recommendations. The Resolution is not merely a notice of inquiry by a Select Committee, but implies the proposition that the funds voted by Parliament for national education ought to be applied to the purposes of educating neglected and destitute children. I am not going to deny the truth of that proposition. I only ask the House not to assume it prior to the inquiry. I entirely deny that we ought to assume that the funds applicable for national education are the only funds applicable for the purposes mentioned in the Resolution. I deny it, because I find that the assumption is altogether opposed to the Report of the Commissioners. That Commission has certainly been one of the most laborious on record. It sat for three years, and the amount of attention and labour it has bestowed on the subject has been enormous. The arrangement of the Report is most admirable, and it is drawn up in so masterly a manner that, I believe, no one ever read a Parliamentary document which was less wearisome. It has thrown a flood of light on a difficult and complicated subject. No one except those who have the labour of conducting the department can do justice to the insight which it affords into many confused and perplexing matters which are obscured under the forms of routine. I entertain, therefore, the greatest respect for the Report and its framers, and I feel sure it will not be the wish of the House to throw any slight either on it or them. The recommendation of the Commissioners on the subject may be stated briefly as follows:—They think, whether rightly or wrongly, that to keep poor children for three or four hours a-day in a ragged school, and then to leave them for the rest of the day in the hands of vicious parents, is not an efficient way of educating those children. They hold that the better plan would be to remove the children during twenty hours of the day from the contaminating influences from which they are at present preserved for four hours in the ragged school; and they propose, with that view, an extension of the district schools, by which the children may be kept apart from their parents. It is not my business to assume that the recommendation is right. Indeed, I have not had time to study the subject sufficiently to pronounce an opinion on it. All I say is that it would be premature for the House on the present occasion to assume that the Commissioners are wrong. In consequence of the attack which has been made upon the Commission in "another place," I think it right to read the passage with which they conclude the part of their Report which refers to this subject. At page 404 they say—

"In order to avoid the appearance of ingratitude for services of the most valuable, disinterested, and self-denying character, we conclude our observations on this head by recording our strong opinion that no class of persons interested in popular education have conferred greater services upon the public, or services involving greater sacrifices of personal convenience and inclination, than the managers of ragged and industrial schools and similar establishments. We think that the time may come when these generous and charitable efforts may advantageously be replaced by a general system; but the fact that they first directed public attention to the subject, and that their labours showed the extent and urgency of the evil to be met, and the proper means of meeting it ought never to be forgotten."

Language was used in "another place" which seemed to imply that the Commissioners made a dead set against ragged schools, and that they were incapable of doing justice to the admirable motives of those who had called them into existence. I think that the passage which I have read shows that such an accusation is entirely unfounded.

The second objection which I have to the wording of the Motion of the hon. Baronet arises from the structure of my own department. I apprehend that what the hon. Baronet desires is, that if the Committee should be convinced that these schools ought to receive public aid such aid should be extended to them in the manner least injurious to the public service. I do not ask the House to prejudge this point; but I must state that it is my strong conviction, confirmed by the opinion of every gentleman in my office, that if aid is to be given to these schools there are probably no hands in which you could place the duty of affording that aid so unfit to discharge it as those of my department. The main objects of the Educational Departments have hitherto been to raise the standard of education, to create a class of schoolmasters who are adequate to the task of popular instruction, to encourage parents to take an interest in the education of their children, and to contribute something towards it, and to treat the school not merely as a place where children receive intellectual instruction, but also as a place where they may learn order, cleanliness, respect, and the manner proper to beings who have to live in society. The plan upon which we have acted has been that, in exchange for the grants which we have made out of the public purse, we have bargained that those who received them should satisfy our inspectors upon these points—namely, that the masters were equal to the work of instruction, that the schools were well-built and ventilated, and the children cleanly and orderly. Now, it may be necessary, for I pre-judge nothing, to have side by side with this system one of a totally different character. It may be necessary that the school should be brought down to the child, because the child cannot be raised to the school; that we should have schools in which much shall be tolerated which would be most disadvantageous to a school conducted according to the Government pattern, in which the children shall be dirty and offensive in their habits, and rude and uncultivated in their manners, for ragged schools exclude none of these. At present we deal with such schools to this extent—that we make them capitation grants, allow them to have masters of a lower class than are required in other schools, and exempt the parents of the children from the payment of school pence; the result being that these schools receive a smaller portion of the public money than do the ordinary educational schools. What is anticipated from the recommendations of this Committee is that the grants to these schools should be made rather in proportion to the necessity of the case than to the degree of progress, cleanliness, and good instruction which is secured in them. It may be right to make the grants upon such a principle, but it will never do for the Privy Council to make them. It will never do for the same department to have two systems, and for the Privy Council to say to the public, “If you have a school of a good class, which secures cleanliness, order, and right instruction, we will pay you so much; but if you open a school of an inferior class for poverty, misery, dirt, and destitution, with inferior instruction, little order, and rooms not half so well adapted to the purpose, we will pay you more.” It will never do for us to go into opposition against ourselves in that manner. If we take such a course we shall break down our own system, and undo in a few years all that we have done by twenty years’ successful operation upon the public, by means of which we have gradually screwed the system up to its present very creditable pitch. It may be necessary that this should be done, but ours is not the hand that ought to do it. When, in the year 1856, large grants were made to these schools, symptoms existed which showed that the new system was sapping the vitals of the old one. We had nothing but complaints from the inspectors and from the Committees of the Pay Schools that children were enticed away from them to these inferior schools, and it was on account of the deep sense which was entertained of the evil which this was doing to the system of elementary schools that the minute of 1857 was passed which altered the system. I do not ask the House to take the same view of that matter. Let this also be inquired into by the Committee. But if the words of the Motion are retained as they now stand, requiring that ragged schools should be supported out of the funds voted for national education, the Committee will have no alternative but to impose the duty of forming and managing the new system upon the Committee of Council. If the hon. Baronet will alter the terms of his Motion so as, while embracing the system of the Privy Council, not to confine the Committee to it, I see no objection to this inquiry. The words which I should suggest would be “to inquire how the education of destitute and neglected children may be most efficiently and economically assisted by any public funds.”

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that he was quite willing to accept these words.

MR. HANBURY said, I rise to support the Motion made by my hon. Friend, and I wish that the duty I have to perform had fallen into abler hands, though I will yield to no one in the deep interest I have for many years past taken in the cause of destitute children. Whatever may be the result of the Motion just made I am sure the House and the country will feel grateful to the hon. Baronet for the ability and moderation with which he has dealt with the important subject before us. I will briefly state my reasons for the course I am taking on the present occasion. At the beginning of this year I was present at the Conference which was held at Birmingham for the purpose of discussing the subject of the present Motion, and I was much struck with the want of information manifested by many persons who attended that Conference. No two seemed to agree as to what was really wanted, or to have a clear idea of the nature of the institutions which ought to be assisted by public money.

"Ragged Schools" was the subject under discussion. In Scotland they are known as "Ragged Industrial Feeding Schools." In London such institutions are termed Refuges, Homes, or Industrial Schools. Ragged Schools in London are simply Educational Schools. In Scotland, and in some of the provinces, they are industrial likewise. I merely mention this to show how little the subject is understood even by those who are supposed to be fully conversant with its details. Surely a Committee of Inquiry would be most useful in order to ascertain the character of the institutions which are established for the benefit of the vagrant and destitute, and also fully to ascertain the nature of the class who are received into them. Various objections will, doubtless, be raised on the part of Her Majesty's Government; amongst others, it will be said that the Estimates will be increased to an unlimited extent if we begin to subsidize such institutions. This is far from our intention. I believe a considerable amount of money might be saved by a more judicious distribution of the educational grants. Many schools might be found at the present time receiving far more assistance than they ought, and the children who attend such schools are in many instances of parents fully able to pay for the education they obtain. On economical grounds it would be worth while to assist ragged schools, for it is quite evident their influence has contributed very materially to the decrease of crime. Is it not cheaper for the country to pay £10 to prevent a boy from becoming a criminal than £50 or £100 to punish him when he is become one? It will next be urged that the character of the schools would be entirely changed if they are assisted by grants. I cannot see how this will be. Our object always has been and is still to keep down as low as possible—and not in any way to raise the standard of the schools or the object we have in view would be entirely defeated. The inspectors (and I think these schools would be benefited by full and ample inspection) would be able to prevent this from being the case. The Government will, perhaps, say it is unwise and unfair to grant this Committee before the Commissioners have issued their last and final Report. Now, with regard to that Report, I do not wish to make a hostile attack upon it. It contains most valuable information, though I am not prepared to endorse all the recommendations I find there. Still, I venture to say it does not appear to me that the cause of ragged schools have received so full and impartial a treatment as they deserve—I do not think that evidence was taken from those most qualified by experience to give it. I think the House will be in a far better condition to legislate if it possesses the evidence which I believe would be brought before the Committee we seek. One word as to the good ragged schools have effected: Upwards of 300,000 children have passed through their purifying influence, and if it is not too much to suppose that 10 per cent have derived benefit, the result is far from insignificant. In page 382 of the Report I find it stated that 100,000 children receive no education. From this class juvenile criminals spring. How is it then to be accounted for that during the last five years there has been such a reduction in crime? In Mr. Sydney Turner's Report for 1859 he states there were 5,000 less commitments than in 1856. May we not infer that ragged schools have been partly instrumental in this great change? I firmly believe that ragged schools have been the indirect means of originating almost every institution in the United Kingdom during the last fifteen years for the prevention of crime and the reformation of the criminal. I am borne out in this assertion by reference to the document I have in my hand—a classified list published by the authority of the Reformatory and Refuge Union. I find there 175 such institutions accommodating upwards of 15,000 inmates—only fifteen of these were in existence previous to the ragged-school movement. In all large towns we find the ragged schools to be the pioneers of refuges, homes, penitentiaries, and reformatories; in fact, of all institutions for the mutual aid of the destitute and degraded. I feel we owe a deep debt of gratitude to the promoters of ragged schools for their noble self-denying efforts. Who can estimate the good they have done? It cannot be ascertained in this world. Although there is a great decrease in crime the number of destitute and vagrant children is not so great as formerly; yet my experience leads me to believe there are still thousands of children who can alone be reached through the agency of ragged schools. I wish to state that the voluntary refuges in the kingdom, institutions receiving this very class, the destitute and the vagrant, have been sadly crippled by the withdrawal of the 50s. a year Capitation granted by the Privy Council in 1856, and withdrawn in 1858. Many of these Institutions, from my own personal knowledge must be closed, or else will have to admit children of another class, unless something is done to assist them more fully than at present. These Institutions are doing a great work, saving hundreds of children from being a burden to the country by training them to habits of morality and industry. It would, I know, be said, that if these Institutions were certified under the "Industrial Schools Act," they would be entitled to receive considerable assistance from the Home Office. In theory this is true; but unfortunately that Act has hitherto been almost inoperative, and either owing to a defect in the drawing up of the Act, or to public feeling being opposed to its principles, it has been found almost impossible to get children committed under it; the result has been that Institutions have had all the trouble of obtaining a certificate without receiving any advantages to which it entitled them. I heartily trust that the amended measure now before the House may remove some of these difficulties, but I feel however perfect the Act may be, there will always remain the necessity of our voluntary refuges. The Prince Consort stated some time since that there were "no less than two million children in England and Wales who were not at school at all, and whose absence cannot be traced to any legitimate cause. Can it, then, be said or thought there is little to do, or that there is any shortness of material? for surely it is but fair to infer that by far the larger proportion of these two millions of children belong to a class for whose benefit ragged schools are specially designed." If these cannot be found in ordinary schools, or in private schools, where are they receiving education? If not in ragged schools they must be in the streets. Believing, as I do, that ragged schools have done a great work, and are the only agency by which the destitute and vagrant can be properly reached, assured that they well deserve every possible encouragement and support, from public money as well as private benevolence, I have much pleasure in supporting the Motion, and earnestly hope that Her Majesty's Government will grant the Committee.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had heard with great pleasure the unexpected answer given by the right hon. Gentleman, for he had understood from what he thought good authority that it was the intention of the Government to resist the Motion. Indeed, he was not sure that it might not be inferred from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that on his part at least there was not some disposition to oppose the Motion. But he hardly thought it possible that the Government would have refused so fair and moderate a proposal, and he did not believe they would have been supported by the House had they adopted such a course. In admitting the necessity of some further action with regard to ragged schools it was not, however, to be supposed for a moment that he intended to throw the slightest disrespect on the valuable Report of the Education Commissioners. The House might recollect that the Commission was appointed in consequence of a Motion which he felt it his duty to submit; and on that occasion he received most valuable and efficient support from the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, who at some time—at no very distant period, he trusted—would find leisure to look into the book, and would, doubtless, derive much satisfaction from having been concerned in its production. In every word of praise which had fallen from the lips of the right hon. Vice-President of the Council he fully concurred; he believed the Commissioners were deserving of every gratitude for issuing a most valuable and interesting compendium of the great subject of national education, and he hoped it would not be suffered to remain long without leading to practical results. But, as one part of that Report was directly at variance with the minutes of the Council, and went to prove that a class did not exist which was not only recognized but defined by minutes of Council, it was evident that inquiry must take place.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he hoped it would be distinctly understood that the Committee were to finish their labours this year, so that the House might again have the opportunity of considering the subject. The report revealed a new and unexpected fact—that there was hardly a child throughout the whole island who did not receive an imperfect education. The system had been brought so far that nearly every child received some education; the next step should be to improve the quality of that education, and he fervently hoped no obstacle would be thrown in the way of taking it. It was most essential that a year should not be lost, and before the end of the Session he hoped the Government would be able to state whether, and how far, it was prepared to carry out the views of the Commissioners. Nothing had been more misrepresented than the views of the Commissioners with regard to ragged schools. He thought their views could hardly be controverted. If aid was required let it be given; but if a new principle was to be introduced it should not be done on the authority of the Council of Education alone, even if the proposed Committee reported favourably on the subject, the proposal should be first submitted to the House.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he regretted that he was obliged to differ from the rest of the House on the question before them, but he wished to enter his solemn protest against the appointment of the Committee, that would overlay an investigation just completed by a fresh inquiry. The Report of the Royal Commission had just been presented, and before they had read that Report or even received the evidence on which it was founded, they were going to embark in a new inquiry. He protested against that course. It was a question of common sense. A Royal Commission had been instituted on a large scale and at great expense. They should, at least, read its Report before re-instituting an inquiry upon any part of the same subject. The Report contained 600 or 700 pages, it had only been published about ten days, few Members could have read it, and the evidence, filling five volumes, had not yet been distributed. The Commission must have cost altogether £40,000, and they were now going to institute another inquiry into the same subject again. He did not support the constitution of the Commission when it was proposed; he never thought it likely to effect much good, or to do more than make an historical digest of the subject, very interesting to read, but not likely to lead to any practical result. And the recommendations of the Report bore obvious marks of several contradictory opinions on the subject, and very little actual recommendation that would be practicable or possible to adopt. The evidence he would leave to the future consideration of the House. But he would ask the Government when that system of inquiry was to cease? He had observed that men generally came out of Parliamentary inquiries with exactly the same opinions as they had when they went into them; and under a cloud of inquiry the existing system would continue for a series of years. Continual inquiries were, however, very objectionable, and he hoped the House would insist on something like an end of them. What was to be the nature of the proposed inquiry about schools for destitute children as distinguished from the one just completed? The Royal Commissioners had taken Bristol and Plymouth as sample towns, and had reported that in the one case the ragged schools had worked well, and in the other badly. What could a Select Committee do more? They might, indeed, take twenty towns instead of two, and examine Miss Carpenter, Dr. Guthrie, and Lord Shaftesbury, but the only result would be that the evidence would be ten times as much as was produced before the Commissioners, though in kind it would, no doubt, be identical. For his own part, his views were more favourable to the conclusions of the Commissioners than to those of the hon. Baronet. The Commissioners said of ragged schools that they were to be considered an exceptional sort of institution, and that they were only useful in the nature of feeders to the national schools. The hon. Baronet allowed that there must be conditions attached to grants of public money in every national system, and the children attending the ragged schools were exactly outside the line of conditions which could be laid down in any organized system of schools whatever. He begged the House to bear in mind what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), that it was impossible for any department of State to be worked upon two diametrically opposing systems; and if in this case there was a higher and a lower standard the latter would become the ruling standard, and the exception would shortly become the rule. The present system of education was not an eleemosynary but a voluntary system, supplemented by State funds, and if the Government once allowed it to be understood that upon the failure of voluntary efforts the State would supply what was needed they would soon destroy the whole voluntary system throughout the kingdom. The inquiry contemplated could not, he feared, do anything but harm; at all events, the House sought to discuss the Report of the Royal Commissioners before authorizing a further investigation even upon a single branch of the subject. But it was a mistake to suppose that ragged schools were not at present aided by the State. They came within the terms of the public grants;

they had the same claims as other schools, and practically they also had received the public money. Miss Carpenter's ragged school had a total income of £200 a year and received £50 a year from these Parliamentary grants. With regard to certificated industrial schools, the whole of them were dealt with by existing Acts of Parliament, and if it were wished to alter the terms of the grants to those schools, the proper way to do so would be to raise the question by means of amending Bills instead of by a vague, roving, interminable inquiry into the whole subject. The Government themselves had an amending Bill on the subject now before the House. He regretted that they had consented to a fresh inquiry.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I am unwilling to trouble the House; but after what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, I wish to make an observation on one point. It is not my business to defend the course taken by the hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) but the proposal he has made seems by no means an unreasonable one. A Royal Commission was issued to inquire into the whole system of education in this country, and there was no exception, as far as I know, to the scope of its inquiry. A Report has been presented, written in a most lucid and comprehensive manner, containing an exposition of all the different branches of our popular and elementary teaching, and deserving all the commendation bestowed on it. The ragged schools and the other schools for neglected and destitute children, however, form but a very small part of the subjects discussed in this Report. The hon. Baronet differs from the recommendations of the Commissioners, and he disputes the correctness of the elements by which they are supported, and he asks the House to grant an inquiry. I cannot see that there is anything very unreasonable in that. My object in rising, however, is to observe that, as the hon. Baronet proposes only to institute an inquiry into the schools for neglected and destitute children, and does not wish to include those schools of which the character is mainly criminal, I trust that when the Bill which I have introduced for the amendment of the law relating to the Industrial Schools is brought forward, no objection will be made to that Bill on the ground that the subject is under investigation before a Committee. In giving my vote in favour of this Motion I wish it to be understood that I do not feel myself precluded from proceeding with that Bill.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was glad that the right hon. Secretary of State had agreed to the Committee. It had been said that Parliament gave £800,000 a year to raise the standard of education. He thought it ought to be given only to promote the education of the poorer classes, and that those who could afford to provide a better education for their children should do so at their own expense. He hoped this point would not be lost sight of by the Committee.

MR. CAVE said, that in reply to an observation for the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Danby Seymour) he would refer him to the last Report of Mr. Morrill, one of the Inspectors of Schools, who showed that a large number of the poorest class of children still eluded the efforts made for popular education. That would form a very fitting subject of inquiry before the Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he thanked the hon. Baronet for having brought forward his motion. He agreed in the commendation which had been bestowed on the Report of the Royal Commissioners, but there was so much contradictory matter in the way of opinion brought into it, that until the evidence was published it would be difficult to understand what it was that brought them to the conclusion at which they had arrived. They complimented the authors of these industrial schools highly, but then, in return, they gave them a slap in the face by wishing them to be snuffed out altogether. That was a specimen of the way in which most of the matters contained in the Report were handled. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Educational Committee, said his department was much too high up in the clouds to have anything to do with these schools, though they received the most necessitous of poor children, the very class who wanted most looking after. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had rather begged the question when he wanted to alter the terms of the Motion. The ragged schools, if he understood aright, already received some assistance from the State. The right hon. Gentleman, however, urged that the Commissioners in their Report declared that the ragged schools ought to have nothing, and, by his Amendment, called upon his hon. Friend to stand in the same position as if these schools were now receiving nothing, and as if the Committee were to go into a fresh case. That seemed to him to be rather hard upon his hon. Friend. He could not help remarking that nowhere in the recommendations of the Commissioners was there the least shadow of reference to the necessity of religious teaching in schools. He could not help regarding that as a capital defect in what was, doubtless, a very able Report.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I will not discuss the Report of the Commissioners, for I must confess I have not had time to read it. The question, however, now before us is not the merits of their Report, but the appointment of this Committee, and it is, therefore, important to understand what it is to inquire into. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) appears to think that the duty of the Committee is to inquire in what manner the funds voted by the State are to be distributed. That, however, is not the object of the Committee. If that were the proposal before us, I should say let us by all means first study the Report of the Commissioners. What, however, the hon. Member (Sir Stafford Northcote) wishes to do is to inquire into the operation of the present system as it affects the education of neglected and destitute children. It is urged on one side—and that view is supported by the Commissioners—that the children who are sent to ragged schools are, in fact, the children of parents who can very well pay for sending them to other schools, but who are tempted to send them to ragged schools by the absence of the necessity for sending them clean and in decent clothing. On the other side it is said that a certain number of the children taught in these schools are the children of destitute parents who would not receive any education at all if it were not for the voluntary and charitable efforts of the promoters of the ragged schools. For my own part, I am inclined very much to agree with the hon. Baronet. I believe that where these ragged schools are conducted by persons who are careful in what they are about, and who take precautions in regard to the means of the parents, they afford an education to children who would not otherwise attend any school at all. That will be an important point in the inquiry, and connected with it is the ability of parents to supply their children with proper education, but who prefer rather to spend the surplus of their wages in gin. If the result of the Committee is to show that these schools are worthy of encouragement and support, another question will be in what way that encouragement and support ought to be given. I concur with my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) in thinking that in such an event it would not be expedient to place under the same body two different systems—one a superior and another an inferior system of education. If these ragged schools are to be encouraged, it will, perhaps, appear that they ought to be conducted by some other machinery, and connected with another kind of management. When the Committee of Council of Education was established, I may say, as I took a considerable part in the arrangements then made, that one primary object was to improve the quality of education rather than to increase the numbers educated. That object has been answered. The standard of education has been greatly improved, and I should consider it most disastrous if the effect of any inquiry which we may now enter upon should be to lower that standard. Concurring, therefore, in the appointment of the Committee I think we should watch with jealousy any changes which would have the effect of deteriorating the quality of the education now given in the schools under the Committee of Privy Council.

MR. LOWE said, it was quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) had pointed out, that the Report of the Commissioners contained no reference to the subject of religious education in schools. The reason was that the Report was founded on the present basis laid down by the Committee of Privy Council, and it assumed that all the regulations of that system had been and would be observed.

MR. HENLEY: That is not stated in any part of the Report.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he felt bound to thank the Government for the kind reception they had given to his Motion. He cheerfully assented to the alteration suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, believing that the wider the scope of the inquiry, and the less the Committee were bound down as to the particular mode in which, or through which, aid should be given, the better. He had refused to bring the subject before the House until both the Report of the Commissioners and the Industrial Schools Bill were before the House. He found that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in his excellent Bill on Industrial Schools, did not touch the class of ragged schools, and as the Report of the Commission also left these schools on one side, he thought the time had come for bringing the matter before the House. He could only say he should go into Committee entirely unprejudiced. As to the object to be attained he had a distinct impression, but in regard to the best mode of attaining it he had not yet made up his mind.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire how the Education of destitute and neglected Children may be most efficiently and economically assisted by any public funds."

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE. BILL REPORTED.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was instructed by the Select Committee on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill to lay that Bill on the table, with the Amendments which had been made upon it. In order not to occasion premature discussion he would remain silent at present in regard to the Amendments which had been made by the Committee. Indeed, he thought some of them might be better called alterations than Amendments, and they were such important alterations as would require the serious consideration of their Lordships. He would move that the Bill, with the alterations, should be reprinted, so that their Lordships would be able to see in what respect it differed from the original; and he would move that the Bill thus reprinted should be taken into consideration on Monday week—so that ample time might be given to their Lordships to study the alterations made in the Bill. Of course it would be necessary for the Bill to pass through a Committee of the whole House, and he hoped that in the end it would be made generally acceptable.

Report from Select Committee made, and to be printed (No. 110). Bill reported, with Amendments, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 10th of June next; and to be printed as amended (No. 111).

MARRIAGE LAW AMENDMENT BILL. COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the re-commitment of this Bill, said, that as regarded marriages between Protestants and Roman Catholics no Bill had been introduced for many years which had met with so favourable a reception as the one now on their Lordships' table. The Bill had been referred to a Select Committee, when several alterations had been made. The most laudable and salutary objects of this Bill were to avoid clandestine marriages and to ensure proper evidence of marriage after it had been celebrated. He believed that all or most of their Lordships were agreed upon the provisions of the Bill, except the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, who had, without notice, introduced a number of Amendments, some of which, although unnecessary, he would not oppose. This Bill was declared to be read along with Lord Lyndhurst's Act of 1854. One of the Amendments of his noble Friend proposed that there should be a registration of marriages under this Act; but he thought it better to reserve that for the Bill now before the House of Commons respecting the registration of all marriages in Ireland, whether Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or Quaker. But his noble Friend proposed two other Amendments to which he could not agree, as calculated to give offence to our Roman Catholic fellow subjects. One of these was that there should be a return of all places of religious worship in the Roman Catholic persuasion, and that this return should be made from time to time by the police. He thought this wholly unnecessary and objectionable. The other Amendment declared that any Roman Catholic who celebrated a marriage under this Act, but neglected compliance with any of its provisions, should be guilty of felony. This was wholly unnecessary, as this Bill was declared to be read with Lord Lyndhurst's Act, which already contained that provision. He trusted after these explanations his noble Friend would not think it necessary to insist on those two latter Amendments.

LORD REDESDALE apologized for not having given notice of the Amendments introduced. He was very much occupied at the time with the business of the House, and his attention was not drawn to the Bill till a very late period. The Amendments were actually written while he was in the House; and the moment his noble and learned Friend raised an objection he assented that the Bill should be re-committed and the Amendments printed, allowing ample time for their consideration. His noble and learned Friend having assented to the larger portion of the Amendments proposed, he would only say with regard to those objected to that he had no wish to do anything offensive or unnecessary, and, therefore, he would not insist on that Amendment with respect to priests neglecting to comply with certain of the provisions of the Act, as the noble Lord assured him that they would be guilty of felony without any such enactment; at the same time he did not see what offence could be given by declaring that to be felony under this Act which, according to the noble and learned Lord, was and ought to be felony. With regard to the registration of places of worship he thought it very desirable that there should be no doubt, and no room for any question being raised after the event, as to whether the place used for the celebration of a marriage under this Act was a lawful place for the celebration of such marriages; and although he understood that there was an objection to register on the part of the priests themselves he did not see why the police should not be required to make a return of the places of public worship for Roman Catholics in Ireland. His belief was, that unless the places were registered where marriages under this Bill took place in Ireland, one of the best securities against clandestine marriages would be lost. He would not, however, press that Amendment now, but unless it could be shown that the return by the police would be justly objectionable to Roman Catholics, he would ask their Lordships to give their assent to the clause on the Report.

After a few remarks from the Bishop of Down and CONNOR, who was understood to support the registration clause,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would not offer any further opposition.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, he wished in the first place to state—because some misunderstanding had arisen from the circumstance that the officers of reserve were intended to have a special command for a special time over seamen of the Reserve—that the Bill had nothing to do with the Naval Reserve of Seamen. Its object might be briefly stated. Their Lordships were aware that the number of officers in the different ranks of the navy had been limited by Orders in Council. Captains were limited to 350, commanders to 450, and lieutenants to 1,200. It was clear that if the rank of lieutenant were filled up even to the number of 1,200 promotion to the higher grades would be very slow. The consequence would be, either injustice to the officers serving their country as lieutenants, or injury to the public service. Hence it was desirable, if it could be done, to avoid any large increase in the number of lieutenants. In France the number of captains was 110, and the number of lieutenants 680, and, consequently, promotion was much slower in the French navy than in ours, and the slow rate of advancement in that rank of officers was found to act very disadvantageously. When the second expedition to China was resolved upon in France so great was the discouragement in the naval profession that the Minister of Marine received in the course of a few weeks fifty-nine resignations, or applications to be allowed to retire from active service. The chances of promotion were greater in our Navy; but, at the same time, any one who looked at the Navy List would see that in case of war we had not a sufficient number of lieutenants for the service. How, in such an emergency, were lieutenants to be obtained? As regarded any immediate necessity our only resource would be to go to the merchant service. He was, under those circumstances, of opinion that it was expedient we should be prepared for any emergency which might arise, and with that view he proposed, by means of the present Bill, to empower the Admiralty to enrol a certain number of the officers of the merchant service with the rank of lieutenants and sublieutenants in the navy.

He further proposed, inasmuch as it would be impossible to include the necessary regulations for carrying out that project in an Act of Parliament, to lay them down in an Order in Council, while he should, of course, be prepared to submit to Parliament the details of the scheme. Their Lordships in dealing with the proposal would not fail to observe that the merchant seamen of the present day were a class totally different from those who occupied a similar position in former times. There were now many men in the service who, having obtained certificates under the Merchant Marine Acts of 1850 and 1854, were eminently qualified for the discharge of the duties which he contemplated affording them an opportunity to perform. The great Steam Companies, for example, had men in their employment who, from their station in society, their character, and their professional acquirements their Lordships would at once perceive could not fail, if allowed to serve in the Navy as he proposed, to contribute to the maritime strength of the country. The suggestion that they should be allowed to serve had, he might add, originated with the officers of the mercantile marine themselves, who, seeing that it was open to all other classes of Her Majesty's subjects in time of war to come to the aid of their Sovereign and their country, were desirous of learning drill and gunnery exercise in order that they might avail themselves of the same privilege with the greatest possible advantage. What was proposed, therefore, was that officers who had commanded merchant vessels employed on sea voyages should on producing their certificates under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 be allowed to be enrolled at the discretion of the Admiralty, forming a species of naval reserve in time of peace. If the intentions and wishes of the Government in this matter were carried into effect much would have been accomplished towards removing that jealousy which formerly existed between the naval and merchant services, inasmuch as men would be attracted from the latter to the former who would naturally regard both with favour, who would be anxious to see the Navy prosper, and who, owing to the position which they would occupy, would be of great use in drawing additional men into the Naval Reserve in times of emergency. As things stood at the present moment we had in the Naval Reserve, as first-class seamen, thirteen men holding certificates of competency as masters, and sixty-nine as mates ; there being also thirty-six men serving as mates who had enrolled themselves in the Naval Reserve as able seamen. That officers of the merchant service could, if war should arise, be employed in the manner which he proposed with the utmost advantage there could, he thought, be no doubt ; but as the law at present stood it was not competent for the Admiralty to accept the offer of their services. It would not, he might add, be expedient that all who offered their services should be enrolled for the purpose, it being desirable that those first selected should be men who had obtained certificates, or who had commanded the steamers belonging to the large Companies, or been employed on long voyages. By adopting that course a highly qualified class of officers would be secured who would be available in a period of emergency, and who, when that emergency was at an end, would not be a clog upon the service.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE rose for the purpose of asking their Lordships to reject this measure. The grounds on which he did so were not at all of a party nature ; but, as an officer of the Royal Navy, he felt bound to attempt to preserve that service from the inroad which was proposed against it. He did not think the present Bill was at all called for ; and if it were, he did not think it was brought forward in a manner which was likely to prove acceptable to the officers of the mercantile marine. He thought the speech of the noble Duke would not have much effect with them, seeing that he had told them that they were to be taken up one day and let down the next—in time of war to be made use of for the necessities of the country, and in time of peace to be quietly put aside. He was as sensible as was any man of the improvement in the character of the merchant service, and it was not from any want of sympathy with that service that he urged his objections to this measure—their character was well and favourably known by those who had served afloat. He remembered the merchant service when it was of a description very inferior to what it was at present ; but it must be remarked that the Bill opened an entrance from the merchant service into the Royal Navy, without defining the position of those who were to be transferred from one to the other. The proposal in the Bill before the House would have the effect of admitting anybody who presented himself, and called himself an officer in the mercantile service—whether he had commanded a collier or a small trading vessel—into the Royal Navy. With regard to the great mercantile shipowners, such as Green and others, no one could avoid expressing admiration not only of the beauty of their ships but of the order and discipline of their crews; so that it was not out of any prejudice against the merchant service that he opposed this measure—he opposed it mainly for the purpose of preserving the Royal Navy from an unfair inroad which would be made upon them by the operation of this measure. Up to the present moment no necessity existed for the merchant service supplying the Royal Navy with officers. It appeared there were now no less than 348 captains on the Active List, of whom 116 were employed, and no less than 232 not employed. There were 440 commanders on the Active List, of whom 140 were employed and 300 not employed; and on the Lieutenants' List there were 855, out of whom 612 were employed and 243 were not; besides which there were on the different Reserve Lists 99 commanders and 98 captains. Many of these officers were ready, willing, and anxious to serve, and could do so with efficiency. It was in such a state of things that it was proposed to open the doors of the Royal Navy to the mercantile marine. This was by no means a new question to him; it had been mooted to the Commissioners by two distinguished gentlemen, members of the mercantile marine, who were upon it—Mr. Green and Mr. Lindsay. It was, therefore, no new idea, and it was one that had been cherished in the mercantile marine, because it was of course a great honour and advancement to officers in the merchant service to be admitted into the Royal Navy. But, then, their Lordships must also consider the position of the officers of the Royal Navy—men struggling in the service to get promotion, and many of whom were not employed. Under these circumstances it appeared to him a very great hardship was cast on the officers of the Royal Navy, and it would be viewed by the officers of the Navy in the same light as the attempt made the other day to introduce officers from the Militia into the Artillery, and would give the greatest dissatisfaction. It was said in that case that it was indeed very hard to introduce new blood into a scientific corps, and thereby interfere with the prospects and promotion of those who had studied hard and well. The case of the Naval service was very similar to that of the scientific corps of the Army. Youths came into the Navy by public competition, and went through a very severe apprenticeship for six years. If any persons desired to know what were the hardships that a midshipman had to undergo they could not do better than read the evidence of one of the witnesses examined before the Commissioners, describing the life of a midshipman: it was a life of education and study on the one hand, and of hard service on the other. Having undergone it himself, he might be allowed to describe it as a life of slavery; and when a youth was promoted from the rank of a midshipman to that of a lieutenant he took the greatest step he could do in the Royal Navy; it was a step from the position of a slave to the rank of an officer. They were now simply proposing to pursue a course that would intercept the progress of these young gentlemen, and prevent their promotion, and introduce into the Navy persons—whatever might be their skill as navigators—entirely ignorant of the regulations carried out on board of a man-of-war, of the discipline, and last, though not least, of the etiquette of the Royal Navy, and who could not be expected to do honour to the service to the same extent as those who had been brought up in it. These appeared to him to be very strong reasons why they should not pass a Bill which placed in the hands of the Crown the power of admitting officers of the mercantile marine into the Royal Navy, there to hold such rank as naval officers as the Lords of the Admiralty might please. Under this Bill that rank might be that of an Admiral or a Captain. Such a course would dishearten the Naval service, and would make them feel at once that this power which was placed over them might intercept at any moment their steps in the way of promotion. Of course, it would be the élite of the mercantile service that would be looked for to join the navy; but it was not likely that they would accept the position of inferior officers. When he first read the Bill he thought it had reference to the Naval Reserve, and that it was deemed advantageous to the Reserve to permit merchant officers, bringing a certain number of men with them, to enter the Reserve service; but it was now stated that there was to be an immediate admission into the Royal Navy of merchant officers, who, on enrolling themselves, were to be ready for service at any moment when the First Lord thought proper to call upon them, and were to compete with men who had entered the profession on the clear understanding that it was a distinct profession of itself, under the protection of the Crown, and that they were to rise in the grades of the profession according to their conduct, ability, and service. He was convinced that the first impression made by this measure would be one of great pain to the officers of the Navy; and if the Bill passed it would be at the present moment quite unnecessary, and extremely detrimental to the interests of the Navy. With respect to the rank of master, that was always open in a time of necessity to the merchant service, and there was no necessity for any Bill to admit merchant officers to that situation. This power dated from old times. When formerly the Crown hired their ships, they hired also the officers and crews, and supplied themselves only the armaments and fighting men, and when they took to building their own ships they retained the practice of employing the masters as navigators. He implored their Lordships not to pass this Bill, and he would move that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out "now" and insert "this day six months."

EARL GRANVILLE hoped their Lordships would not agree to the Amendment of the noble Earl, notwithstanding his great authority on the subject. The noble Earl disclaimed any party purpose in proposing his Amendment, and he believed no such feeling existed in his mind. But as all the Naval Lords of the Admiralty and officers of the highest position in the Navy approved of the measure proposed by his noble Friend, he hoped the House would not be misled by the statements which had been made by the noble Earl opposite that the Bill would prove detrimental to the interests of the Royal Navy. The noble Earl said there were only about one-fourth of the lieutenants employed, and three-fourths not employed. That was one of the reasons for passing this Bill. It was desired that promotion in the Navy should not be slackened; and if a large number of lieutenants were added to the Navy, that would stop promotion; while if the services of a certain number of the merchant service were accepted, promotion would go on pretty much as before after the exigency had ceased. At the close of the French war there were nearly 3,000 of these officers in the list, and this was fatal to promotion. He could not admit that the case of the lieutenants of the Navy resembled that of the officers of the Royal Artillery, when it was proposed to incorporate the Tipperary Militia with them. The officers of the Militia had received a superficial training as compared with the officers of the Artillery; while the officers of the Mercantile Marine, whom it was proposed to employ in case of need, would be men who perfectly understood their profession, and who would render invaluable aid to their country. If war broke out, and the Government were obliged to avail itself of the services of the officers of the Mercantile Marine, they would be untrained in the military part of their profession, while by the Bill of his noble Friend, when the emergency arose, they would have acquired training which would render them useful coadjutors in the defence of our shores and the honour of our country. There was no party question involved in this Bill, but their Lordships would take upon themselves a great responsibility if, from the supposed unpopularity of this measure, which was not borne out by facts, they deprived the country of a valuable means of defence in the event of war unhappily breaking out.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET explained, that the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) was under a mistake when he said there were already more lieutenants than could be employed. He had been obliged, owing to the exigencies of the service, to make lieutenants as fast as possible, and when he could obtain from a captain a written assurance that he would take a young officer if he were made a lieutenant, he immediately appointed him to that rank. The necessities of the service made it desirable, in fact, that the ranks of the lieutenants should be increased. Every one who was fit for active service, was employed as fast as possible. There were some indeed, who, from considerations of health and family, asked for temporary rest, who had been in some cases forced into service. He had, indeed, regretted that men who had just returned from unhealthy climates were compelled to go to sea again directly, because there were not lieutenants enough. The operation of the Bill, therefore, in this respect would be exactly the opposite of that indicated by the noble Earl. It was said that to admit officers of the merchant service would impede the promotion of officers of the Royal Navy. Now, if, in case of war, men were brought in from the merchant service and employed in the position of naval lieutenants, a certain number would, no doubt, gain their promotion, and deservedly so. That would be very satisfactory to the Merchant Service. But it was reasonable to suppose that a great many would not even wish to enter the Navy, but would retire with their rank and some mark of distinction for having honourably served their country. The country, therefore, would get the benefit of their services in time of war, and the naval service would receive no injury from them in time of peace. He believed this Bill to be desirable in the interest of the Royal Navy itself.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he was not inclined to reject this Bill altogether, believing that a moment might arrive when the Royal Navy would receive useful additions from the officers of the merchant service; but he was not persuaded that any pressure existed for the passing of such a Bill. If war should break out, a measure of this kind could be passed through both Houses of Parliament in a week; but without any urgent cause he did not think their Lordships would sanction a measure which was alarming, certainly, if not injurious, to the officers of the Navy. It must be alarming to young midshipmen anxious for promotion to see officers of the merchant service made lieutenants and put over their heads.

EARL GREY understood the noble Earl who had just spoken not to object to the principle of the measure. If that were so he would submit to the noble Earl that, if the country was likely to want these men during war, it would be better to prepare them for their duties during peace. It appeared from the statement of the noble Duke that promotion in the Royal Navy was now going on as fast as possible, and that if war broke out every man would be wanted, and, if fit, would obtain promotion. It would be an advantage to the Navy to avoid throwing a great additional number upon the half-pay list, and this Bill would prevent the necessity of making any extraordinary addition to the Naval service. Therefore, instead of stopping promotion in the Royal Navy, the Bill would have just the contrary effect. It was well known that there were in the merchant service officers of the highest qualifications. In the great mail packet companies, for example, there were officers who kept up the highest discipline on board their ships, and who were, perhaps, more capable of putting a ship into any position in which it might be required, especially a steamship, than even the officers of the Royal Navy. It must be highly desirable that the country, in case of a war, should be enabled to avail itself of the services of officers possessing such high qualifications. The Government, on their responsibility, came to the House and asked them to pass the Bill as a measure that would contribute to the efficient defence of the country. Were their Lordships prepared to take upon themselves the responsibility of throwing out a Bill which was thus recommended, and against which so few objections were raised?

On Question, That "now" stand part of the Motion?

SYRIA AND TURKEY—THE DRUSE PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the death of the Druse chief, Said Bey, in prison at Beyrout, and to inquire the decision arrived at with regard to the other Druse prisoners. About five or six weeks ago he inquired of the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as to the intentions of the Turkish Government with regard to Said Bey and the other Druse chiefs, and, therefore, it was unnecessary for him now to allude to all the circumstances of the case; it would be sufficient merely to say that on the faith of certain assurances the Druse chiefs had surrendered themselves to the Turkish authorities at Beyrout; that Said Bey was one of those who gave themselves up as prisoners upon the assurance that justice would be done by them; and that though he had been declared innocent by Her Majesty's Commissioner in Syria, and though his innocence had been confirmed by the British Government, sentence of death had been passed upon him. So far from these assurances having been observed the proceedings had been from the first to the last unjust. When he (the Earl of Carnarvon) alluded to the matter on the former occasion Said Bey was in prison; but in consequence of a protest by Lord Dufferin, the British Commissioner, supported by Sir Henry Bulwer at Constantinople and by the British Government at home, the sentence of death was remitted. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) then endeavoured to impress upon the Government the injustice of allowing a man whom they had declared innocent to remain in prison. He had heard with great regret within the last few days that Said Bey expired a short time since in confinement, and the first inquiry he wished to make was, what was the cause of death? Under ordinary circumstances this would be an unnecessary question; but as their Lordships were aware in the East there was but one step from the prison to the grave, and there were at this moment in circulation in Beyrout reports that, both for the credit of the Turkish Government and of this country, should be investigated. It was affirmed that this chief met his death not from natural causes but by unfair means; and he (the Earl of Carnarvon) was bound to say that when he was in Beyrout some months ago there were tales of harshness and severity practised upon the prisoner, of communication with friends from which he had been needlessly excluded, and of circumstances of such a nature as exposed the Turkish authorities at all events to very grave suspicion. He trusted that nothing but unusual restraint, deferred hope, and the languishing of a spirit under an unjust imprisonment had produced Said Bey's death. But whatever the immediate cause, the death of Said Bey was disgraceful to the Turkish authorities, and reflected little credit upon this country. Said Bey and other Druse chiefs came down from a position of impregnable security, and surrendered themselves upon a guarantee of fair and impartial treatment by the Turkish Government in the first place, and in the next place of a guarantee which, if not actually, yet by implication, was given to him by the English authorities at Beyrout. There could be no doubt as to the distinct promise of Fuad Pacha, for on the 13th of September last year Lord Dufferin, writing to Sir Henry Bulwer, mentioned the guarantee, stating that complete security was given to those who were able to clear themselves of all participation in the late atrocities, and that against those who failed to appear judgment would go by default. But the Druses knew by experience of former years that they could not place reliance upon any proclamation issued by the Turkish authorities; but Major Fraser, whose slightest word, as an English agent and officer, would have had weight, seemed to be perfectly aware that the security was upon the faith of the British Government also, for he wrote to Lord John Russell that the Druse chiefs would have no objection to have their culpability tried by Englishmen, but though they were willing to accept British authority they would submit to no other. Again, Lord Dufferin, in his instructions to the Vice Consul appointed to watch the proceedings against the Druses, reminded that official that he was placed in the court for the express purpose of affording a guarantee to Europe that the judicial investigation would be conducted in such a way as to secure that the innocent should not suffer; and that was all that the Druse chiefs asked for when they consented to give themselves up at Beyrout. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary in very strong language admitted that the faith of England was pledged to the proper treatment of the prisoners, for he said, in a despatch dated so recently as the 18th of March in the present year—

“It is said that the Consul-General Moore induced the Druse chiefs who surrendered at Beyrout to give themselves up upon the assurance that they should have a fair trial. If this is so, it increases our responsibility.”

It did appear to him that it increased our responsibility greatly, and it would tell very little for our credit hereafter that a chief attached throughout his life to English interests, and, in fact, suffering persecution on account of that attachment, who gave himself up a prisoner upon the faith of a British guarantee that he should have a fair and impartial trial, yet suffered an unjust sentence, was allowed to languish for months in prison, and to die no one knew how. In former years he had known this unfortunate chief and enjoyed a hospitality which had been freely shown to English travellers; and he had now no words to say with what pain he heard of his cruel and unmerited fate. But the wrong, such as it was, had been done, and he would not trouble their Lordships further upon that point; but there was still a door open for an act of justice to be done, and it was to this that he wished particularly to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government. The wife and family of the chief were undergoing the deepest and most unmerited suffering, and were, indeed, glad to find shelter in the meanest hovels. She was a lady of great distinction, and Said Bey himself had been possessed of considerable wealth, but the whole of his property had been confiscated, and he wanted to urge the Government to use their fair and legitimate influence with the Turkish authorities to procure its restitution to those against whom not a single charge had been made, and whose only crime in the eyes of Turkish functionaries was the possession of property. The friends and fellow-prisoners of Said Bey surrendered upon precisely the same terms as that chief, they were sentenced by the same unjust verdict, and they were exposed to the same death that he had suffered. He could not conceive a case in which it would be more natural for Her Majesty's Government, they having expressed a very decided opinion upon the case, to use their influence to obtain the liberation of these unfortunate Druses, and the restitution of their property.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE: My Lords, it is not without reluctance that I claim your Lordships' indulgence while I stand for a few moments between the question of my noble Friend who has just sat down and the answer to which he is entitled from this side of the House. My reason for taking this liberty is simply that, having myself to ask a question, of which the noble Baron who represents the Foreign Office here had notice from me this morning, I understand from him that he would find it more convenient to be put into the position of answering both questions at once. Before I proceed to put my own question I beg to express my concurrence with the noble Earl who preceded me in the feeling which prompted him to call your Lordships' attention to the case of Said Bey Joublat. I need not repeat the circumstances so fully stated in his speech; but I may be allowed to say that, the distinguished Druse chief known to us by that name having been judged worthy of release from the sentence of death passed upon him, and relieved from its execution at the instance of Her Majesty's Commissioner in Syria approved by Her Majesty's Government, I cannot but think it behoved the Turkish authorities to open his prison doors without delay or hesitation. Whether his death in confinement was truly attributable to poison or to a natural cause it may now be too late to decide; but any one who, in the course of his travels, has had occasion to visit a Turkish prison will not think it necessary to call in the aid of poison in order to account for the Bey's premature decease. What prisons were in most parts of Europe a century or two ago a Turkish prison is to this day, and I should have been glad on that account to have heard it stated that the same sense of justice and feeling of humanity which saved the condemned man from execution had also operated to deliver him from prison without any unnecessary delay. Passing to the question which I have to address to my noble Friend on this side of the House, I propose to state it in few words, and I trust that the explanation which must accompany my statement may be also given with a due regard for your Lordships' time. A daily newspaper informed the public this morning that, according to the latest intelligence received from Constantinople by telegraph, it had been settled by the representatives of the allied Powers, on the suggestion of France, that Syria should be governed henceforward by a Christian chief. I wish to know, on official authority, whether this intelligence may be relied on? and also whether the chief in question is to be a native or a foreigner, and whether his power is to be confined to the Lebanon or extended to the whole of Syria? I beg, moreover, to ask whether Her Majesty's Government are able to reckon upon the immediate completion of the measures intended to insure the tranquillity of Syria on the retirement of the French army? The importance of these matters can hardly be over-rated. That the present occupying force will be withdrawn by the 5th of June I cannot for a moment doubt. From the first, indeed, I never entertained any serious anxiety on that score. The honour of the French Government was pledged to the faithful execution of a measure adopted in common with their allies, and it would be painful to suspect a great and high-minded Power of seeking to evade, for any purpose of its own, and by a palpable breach of treaty, the fulfilment of an obvious international obligation. But we are exposed to danger of the same kind in another shape, and it behoves us the more to look to it in time, because we have been fairly warned of its eventual approach by the Ministers of France and Russia, by the published notes of M. Thouvenel and Prince Gortschakoff, who refuse to accept any responsibility in consequence of the withdrawal of the French troops, and hold themselves at liberty, should fresh disturbances break out in Syria, to re-occupy that province without incurring the restraint of a fresh convention. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance to know whether the arrangements for giving to the inhabitants of the country security after the withdrawal of the troops are sufficiently advanced to ensure their withdrawal within the six days yet to elapse; and those arrangements give that amount of security which will prevent embarrassment in case of disturbances arising; and whether in the event of a state of extreme insecurity arising it is intended to send a further force into that country? It cannot be denied that if France and Russia, either or both, were to act in the sense indicated. Her Majesty's Government would in all likelihood be thrown into a state of serious embarrassment, attended with danger to our peaceful relations. The temporary measure already announced of keeping a squadron on the coast of Syria, with orders for a force of marines to be disembarked in case of renewed disturbances on shore, would hardly suffice to guarantee the tranquillity of the interior, and if one of our allies were to effect a landing of larger proportions, we should be reduced to the alternative of either doing the same at much cost and risk, or leaving a single Power in the uncontrolled command of a most important province of the Turkish Empire. Were it felt that our interests and those of Turkey imposed upon us the duty of meeting the supposed measure by a firm resistance, the probability of our being carried into a hazardous and unfriendly position towards France would, beyond a doubt, be greatly increased. It is mainly for these reasons that I am anxious to ascertain what progress has been made in preparing adequate measures of security for the peace and good Government of Syria on the withdrawal of the foreign occupying army, and how far we may have reason to rely upon the efficiency of such means as may be finally, if they are not actually, adopted. I confess that I should view with doubt and anxiety the appointment of a Christian chief over the whole of Syria. Such an appointment confined to Mount Lebanon might be attended with less inconvenience and hazards, provided the power involved in it were shaped and restricted by a due regard for local considerations and existing claims. I am well aware of the difficulties attending the appointment of a viceroy; but I think it by no means impossible that arrangements may be devised whereby the security of the country may be insured and yet the Sultan's authority preserved. This is hardly the occasion, and certainly not the hour, for going into the particulars of this question. But I may venture to present to the House even in its present state those leading principles which, in my opinion, cannot with safety or justice be overlooked in framing a new arrangement for the protection and regular administration of Syria. The preservation of the Sultan's sovereignty, a fair administration of justice, independence of the internal administration in Lebanon, separation, as far as possible, of the tribes in that district, a special provision for the whole of Syria, in points of revenue, military force, and police, and also a general disarmament of the inhabitants throughout that mountainous region where the massacres of last year took place—these occur to me as the principles most to be kept in view, and, on the whole, best calculated to give an efficient and durable character to the pending work of settlement. It only remains for me to solicit an answer to the questions which I have already addressed to my noble Friend on the bench below me.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he quite agreed with his noble Friend who introduced this discussion in the deep regret expressed at the melancholy end of the Druse chief, Said Bey, and the circumstances under which he died. If his noble Friend were right in supposing that Her Majesty's Government had given Said Bey, with the other Druse chiefs, a positive guarantee of safety, or that his life would be saved on condition of surrendering to take his trial, he should certainly feel that a grave responsibility rested on Her Majesty's Government. But, so far from this being the case, his noble Friend would find by referring to the blue book that Lord Dufferin most distinctly and positively refused to give this guarantee. At page 148 Lord Dufferin wrote to Sir Henry Bulwer, under date Beyrout, Sept. 21st, 1860—

"I have the honour to inform your Excellency that since the publication of the notice alluded to in my despatch of the 13th instant, summoning the Druse chiefs to appear by a certain day before his Excellency Fuad Pasha to answer for their conduct, repeated applications have been made, in an indirect manner, by Said Bey Joublat, the most important of the Druse magnates, to Mr. Moore and myself, urging us to afford him some assurance of safety should he surrender to take his trial. To all applications of this nature Mr. Moore and myself have agreed to give an absolute refusal. We have felt that the only assurance we could give would be that justice should be done, and that his safety must depend upon his innocence. It is probable, however, that if a message of this description were sent to him he would misinterpret it into a cautious intimation that he might count upon English influence to secure his acquittal. Before the fall of Zahleh Mr. Moore enjoined Said Bey, on behalf of the English Government, to interfere, and to prevent the effusion of more Christian blood. There is little doubt but that, had he chosen, he might have prevented the catastrophe. He turned a deaf ear to all remonstrances, and the place was lost. Under these circumstances Mr. Moore and myself have agreed to refuse to have any communications with him whatever, and to leave it to his own discretion whether to surrender or to fly."

He thought, therefore, his noble Friend, Lord Dufferin, who had acted with great discretion throughout, had taken abundant means to secure himself against being supposed to have undertaken any responsibility in this matter. At the same time, it was quite certain that his noble Friend had omitted nothing he could do both to secure a fair trial to all the Druse chiefs, and also to save the life of Said Bey. His noble Friend had asked him as to the cause of Said Bey's death. Undoubtedly, the rumours he had mentioned had come to the ears of Her Majesty's Government, that Said Bey had died by foul means: but he was glad to assure him that there was the most positive and satisfactory evidence that he had died a natural death from pulmonary consumption—a disease under which for some time he had been labouring, and which was, no doubt, aggravated by his confinement. This fact was positively certified by medical men who had attended him; and although, as had been observed by his noble Friend behind him, a Turkish prison was not generally supposed to be a place in which a prisoner had a very large share of accommodation, Said Bey was placed in confinement in a room which, both for size and accommodation, afforded all the comfort which a prisoner could expect. There was, therefore, no reason to blame the Turkish authorities on that ground. He might further state that as soon as Her Majesty's Government learned that Said Bey was ill they did not lose a moment in sending by telegraph to Sir Henry Bulwer an order to interfere for his release, but before orders could be sent from Constantinople unfortunately Said Bey had died. It did not reflect any credit on the Turkish Government that no decision had yet been arrived at with respect to the other Druse prisoners. The matter had been left for the decision of the Sultan. There was every reason to suppose that decision would be fair one, and show the clemency of the Sultan, but at the same time he must add that he thought it extremely unfair that that decision should have been so long delayed. With regard to the property which had been confiscated, he was happy to be able to state positively, on the assurance of Fuad Pasha, that the property which belonged to the Druse chiefs would not be confiscated, and he might also mention, that Lord Dufferin stated that Fuad Pasha intended to reinstate the wife and children of Said Bey in his possessions. It was only fair to Fuad Pasha to add he had promised that the moveable property which had been laid hands on by the Turkish authorities would also be restored, or full reparation be given to those from whom it had been taken. As regarded the question put to him by his noble Friend behind (Lord Stratford de Redcliffe), whether it was true that the Government had consented to the proposal of the French Government that there should be one Christian Governor of the Lebanon, he must point out to him that in one respect that was a misdescription of the proposal. His noble Friend would find in the blue book laid on the table many despatches relating to the question of the government of the Lebanon, and he would observe, no doubt, that the first plan put forward by Lord Dufferin was one by which the whole of Syria should be placed under one Mahomedan Governor, with a Christian Governor to rule specially over the district of the Lebanon. That plan, however, which inferred a reconstruction of the whole government of Syria, was subsequently abandoned. Afterwards the Commissioners took into consideration the plan of a single governor for the Lebanon. That plan was recommended by the Commissioners. There was, however, a difference of opinion as to whether the Christian Governor of the Lebanon should be a native of the Lebanon or not; but it was not the fact that the proposition that there should be a Christian Governor emanated exclusively from the French; it had been recommended generally by the Commissioners. He would now only add that the proposal was under consideration at this moment—a conference was being held between the representatives of the different great Powers at Constantinople—that proposal, with many other details to which he would not now allude, would be discussed by the Commission, and some determination must be come to by them and be reported to their various Governments. As negotiations were now actually going on, he could not give his noble Friend any detailed information with respect to the opinions entertained by Her Majesty's Government on the different points involved; all he could state was that the question of having a single Governor for the Lebanon was now under the consideration of the Representatives of the Powers at Constantinople. As to whether the arrangements for the evacuation of the country were complete, it was obvious that that question was answered by the other, for since the Conference would deliver its opinion upon the whole question he could not say how soon the arrangements would be carried into effect.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, 'till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, May 30, 1861.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—2<sup>o</sup> Drainage of Land.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What steps have been taken, if any, towards making the Colonial Sovereign coined by the Branch of the Royal Mint at Sydney, New South Wales, a legal tender throughout Her Majesty's Dominions?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, no steps had been taken for the purpose of making the sovereigns coined at the Sydney Mint a legal tender in the other colonies or in the United Kingdom. With respect to India and the colonies the regulation of the currency and the coinage was left in the hands of the Local Legislatures, and, with respect to the United Kingdom, though the admission of the Sydney sovereigns here would be a matter of great interest to the colony, yet it was an Imperial, and not a colonial question, and would require to be settled by an Act of Parliament, and Her Majesty's Government did not see their way to propose any legislation on that subject.

DISTURBANCES AT MILAN. QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table any Official Accounts he may have received relative to the late disturbances at Milan?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was aware that there had been some disturbances at Milan, one of them connected with a circular issued by the Archbishop, and it was at one time suspected that they had political origin, but he did not think they were of importance enough to justify the laying the papers before the House.

THE VACANT SEATS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to proceed during the present Session with the Appropriation of Seats (Sudbury and St. Albans) Bill?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was the intention of Government to proceed with the Appropriation of Seats Bill on the earliest possible day, and he hoped soon to be in a position to name a day for that purpose.

THE IRON GATES AT HAMPTON COURT PALACE.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, At whose request and for what purpose certain ornamental iron gates have lately been removed from Hampton Court Palace Gardens, and whether it is intended to restore such gates to their original position?

MR. COWPER said, there were in Hampton Court Palace gardens certain richly-wrought iron railings, which had been put up in the time of William and Mary. These railings were greatly deteriorated by age, and were fast decaying. Corrosion went on under the paint; and so, in order to preserve these very beautiful specimens of English ironwork, they had been removed to London, with a view to their restoration. Afterwards they were to be exhibited in Kensington Museum, where they would form an important feature in the exhibition of English ironwork, and ultimately such portions as it was thought possible to replace would be set up again in the gardens, preserved, he hoped, from the decay which at present threatened to destroy them altogether.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT. QUESTION.

MR. LANIGAN: Sir, I wish to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, Whether the Representations made to Her Majesty's Government on behalf of the Royal Atlantic Steam Navigation Company, relative to a recent Letter of the Postmaster General in reference to the Galway Contract, have been considered, and with what result?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the only communication which Her Majesty's Government have had with the Company in question since the communication made to them by the Postmaster General consists of a very long and elaborate statement, comprising ten pages of closely printed matter, dated yesterday, and which I received late yesterday afternoon. The facts contained in that statement will have to be considered by the Postmaster General, and whenever an answer is prepared and given to the Company, that answer, together with the statement, will be laid before Parliament, in addition to the Papers already moved for.

MR. BEAMISH: Are we to understand from the answer of the noble Lord, that it is the intention of the Government to withdraw the subsidy at present paid for postal communication between Ireland and America?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I have no hesitation in saying that in our opinion it would be advantageous to the commercial interests of the whole of the United Kingdom that a more rapid communication—as rapid a communication as possible, in fact, should be established between the United Kingdom and North America. My belief is, that Ireland is the part of the United Kingdom from which that communication could best and most surely be established, and Her Majesty's Government are not indisposed to take into consideration, and, if they should think fit, to submit to the House any proposal for establishing that communication which is founded upon open competition, and which upon consideration might appear well calculated to accomplish the purpose.

COLONEL FRENCH: Then we are to understand that the Government have determined not to continue the subsidy?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The House is already in possession of all that has passed between the Government and the Galway Company.

MR. KER here rose and said, I beg to inform the noble Lord, after what he has stated of the intentions of the Government ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman propose to ask a question?

MR. KER: I wish to ask the noble Lord whether he is aware that a Memorial has been sent from the Corporation of the City of Dublin in favour of maintaining the Galway Contract, and also Memorials from the Corporation of Limerick and from the County of Galway to the same effect?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I received a Memorial on the subject about five days ago, but I cannot say from what quarter it proceeded. I am not aware whether the other Memorials mentioned by the hon. Gentleman have been received or not.

BRITISH SUBJECTS IN THE CONFEDERATE STATES.—EXPLANATION.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I was asked, Sir, the other evening by my hon. Friend (Mr. T. Duncombe) a question respecting the treatment which British subjects were alleged to have received in the Southern States by being forced to serve in the militia. I had no information at that time, but I have since received a communication from Mr. Mure, the Consul at New Orleans, who says that an Englishman, who is named, had been seized and taken away to serve in the militia. He immediately made a representation to the Governor, who said he would give redress, and the Englishman was immediately released. It appears, however, that several other British subjects were afterwards captured, but the Governor declared that it was entirely against his orders, and was quite illegal. All these persons were liberated, and the Consul hopes that no similar case will occur.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL. COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. SECOND NIGHT.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

Clause 4 (Repeal of Excise Duties, Allowances, and Drawbacks on Paper),

MR. MELLOR said, that when he moved that Progress be reported, on Monday evening, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) very courteously invited him to proceed with the discussion, and was good enough to promise him a patient hearing from a silent if not admiring audience. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman was sincere, but after the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth he thought it proper to move that Progress be reported. But he must protest against the conclusion drawn from that Motion for adjournment. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer) avowed himself a West Indian proprietor; and, therefore, his opposition to this clause was easy to be understood. No doubt he would prefer a reduction of the tea and sugar duties. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Sir John Ramsden) objected to the repeal of the paper duty because he did not believe there was a surplus. Both of these Gentlemen had voted for a reduction of the tea duties. But he contended that it was no longer open to the Opposition, having once admitted the existence of a surplus by proposing a large remission of taxes in the shape of the tea duties, and having failed in that, to object to any remission of taxation whatever. To admit a surplus for one issue and to deny it for another was a most inconsistent course of conduct, which he was sure the House would never sanction. One objection raised to the remission of this particular tax was that the papermakers, who, it was said, were most affected by it, had not asked for the remission, but it was always the case where an Excise duty was to be repealed that those interested in things as they were were never very forward in asking for a change. Much had been made on this point of a circular placed in the hands of Members from Mr. Bohn, the publisher. But it should be remembered that Mr. Bohn was driving a most excellent trade, that he had a large stock of books on hand, and that the duty pressed less heavily on the class of books in which he dealt than on others. Naturally enough, therefore, Mr. Bohn was well contented with things as they were. He saw no force in the argument that the tea duties ought to have the preference because they were war duties. If a tax was a good tax it ought to be retained; if it was a bad one it ought to be repealed, whether it was a war or a peace tax. The best tax was that which produced the largest amount to the Exchequer with the least pressure on the industry of the country. The hon. Member for the West Riding objected to the repeal of the paper duty because the prospects of trade were so bad; but surely if trade were so bad that was a reason for relieving it from those burdens which put it on an inequality with foreign competition. The hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) the same evening professed the warmest allegiance and friendship for the Chancellor of the Exchequer: but he had certainly the oddest way of showing his friendship. When his vote was of no consequence he was full of allegiance, but when his vote was of importance, and a dissolution of Parliament or the fall of a Ministry was in question, he was either absent or voted against them. The hon. Baronet said, too, that if he thought an attack was being made on the Chancellor of the Exchequer he should be the first to stand by him; but surely everybody knew that the attack was specially directed against the right hon. Gentleman. Was it not notorious that all the appeals, the remonstrances, and the flatteries, addressed to the noble Viscount from the other side of the House were only meant to induce him to throw over the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He had certainly been astonished to hear them, for if there was one quality for which the noble Lord was distinguished it was for loyalty to his colleagues and those who put confidence in him. The hon. Member for the West Riding said, and the argument had been repeated again and again, that to send up a Bill for the repeal of the paper duty this year would be an insult, a provocation, and a challenge to the House of Lords. Now, if the House of Lords had refused to repeal the paper duties on the ground of their intrinsic merits, it might have been a challenge. But everyone knew that no noble Lord justified the retention of the duty on that ground—they all condemned it on principle. There was one noble Lord at all events that would not condemn the present course as a challenge, and that was Lord Monteagle, for his words last year were—"I ask your Lordships by agreeing to my Amendment to reserve to the House of Commons the opportunity of dealing with this tax next Session." It really appeared to him (Mr. Mellor) that there were hon. Gentlemen in that House more anxious to vindicate the House of Lords than were the Lords themselves. There was a very good reason why the paper duty should be selected for remission, because it was a tax more universally condemned than any other. It had been condemned by all those gentlemen in whom hon. Members opposite placed confidence, and it had been condemned by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in their Report to the Lords of the Treasury. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had said that—

"The tax was vexatious in collection; it impeded improvements in manufacture; it heightened the price of an article the demand for which already exceeded the supply, and pressed injuriously on the circulation of cheap literature and the diffusion of news."

The Earl of Derby, in answer to the deputation which waited on him last year, described the tax as "bad in principle and bad in practice;" and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, in the debate on the Resolutions in 1858, which condemned the tax as "a permanent source of revenue," said—

"I look upon the tax upon paper as one of those particular taxes which, when a favourable opportunity arises, I shall be very glad to see remitted and erased from our fiscal system. As well in a commercial as in a moral, literary, and educational point of view, I should be very glad if I felt it was consistent with my duty at this juncture to propose a remission of that tax."—[3 Hansard, cli. 125.]

The juncture spoken of as unfavourable had reference to a period when a number of insignificant duties, which were vexatious in themselves and unproductive to the revenue, existed, but those small duties were all repealed last year, and if there was a surplus no juncture could be more favourable than the present to remit the paper duty. The important question was whether a repeal of that duty would largely benefit trade, and in proof of the affirmative it was only necessary to refer to the effect of the reduction of the duty in 1835. Earl Granville last year stated that the reduction of the duty in 1835 to one-half was followed by such an increase of consumption and diminution of price that the duty raised became double the amount of duty remitted. Lord Monteagle, who, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed the partial remission of the duty, stated on the same occasion that the revenue had increased from £715,000 to £1,400,000. It appeared from the memorial of the paper hanging makers that, in 1834, the total number of pieces manufactured was 1,050,000, and in 1859-60 it was 19,000,000. If they looked at other trades the same expansion had followed a repeal of Excise duties. The number of brick-makers had increased from 9,864 in 1841 to 31,768 in 1851, and the number of glassmakers from 7,407 in 1841 to 12,095 in 1851. The profits on bricks and glass were no doubt as good in 1851 as in 1841, and the increase of makers represented an enormous increase of employment. The case for the repeal of the paper duty was strengthened by the fact that it pressed unequally on different classes of paper, amounting to 125 per cent on the value of wrapping paper, and to only 20 per cent on cream laid post. The argument that the cases of bricks and glass were not analogous, because in those instances there was an abundant supply of the raw material, whereas there was a dearth in the supply of rags, was answered by a specimen of paper of excellent quality, made from straw, which, in the form of a circular, had been sent to himself and many other hon. Members. The mode of levying aggravated the burden of the paper duty. It had to be assessed on the paper when dry, or the maker would have to pay also on the moisture, and the papers used for serial works and newspapers had to be made wet again or the printing upon them would be very inferior. It had been estimated that this aggravation of the tax amounted to at least £6 per ton. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in pointing out the embarrassments in which they were involved by the difficulties of defining what was paper, had stated that they were collecting duty from A while they allowed B to send out goods of precisely the same nature without any interference from the Revenue officers. These arbitrary regulations prevented the application of paper to many useful purposes, and, of course, prevented the due extension of the trade. It was not a question now between tea and paper, but simply whether they would repeal the paper duty. Lord George Bentinck, whose biography had been written by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, laid down the proposition that it was incumbent on wise statesmen to remit Excise duties in preference to Customs' duties, because, independent of the relief to the taxpayer, there was a saving in the expense of collection. The argument was not allowed to prevail in the case of the Corn Laws, but that was because the effect of the duty on foreign corn was to artificially raise the price of the home production, and to put money, not into the Exchequer, but into the pockets of the growers of corn in this country. He trusted that the repeal of the paper duty would not fail to receive the support of many hon. Gentlemen opposite, and especially of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), who generally rose above mere party influences, and the right hon. Member for Hertfordshire, who had done so much by his writings to show how injurious the tax was to the interests of education and literature. Rumours were rife in every club that the Irish Members, having a quarrel with the Government in regard to the Galway contract, were going to take part with the Opposition. He did not believe that the Irish Members would be actuated by such motives. If they had a quarrel with the Government he was sure that they would fight it out manfully, and would not stoop to such conduct as was imputed to them. If, however, the Government should be defeated by such means, the victory of the Opposition would be quite independent of the merits of the question, and if a dissolution followed, he, for one, would be only too happy to meet his constituents in so good a cause. He thought that in such an event even the constituents of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire would be convinced that the battle had been won on a false issue, and by means which public opinion would not justify. Quoting the words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, he would call on the Committee, in the interests of commerce and industry, in the cause of morality, in the furtherance of education and literature, to vote for the repeal of the paper duty.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I cannot help thinking that if hon. Gentlemen would think less of their constituents and more of the interests of their constituents we should be assisted in arriving at a more satisfactory conclusion on this question. Although, Sir, I was perfectly ready on Monday night to have come to a division, I shall avail myself of the opportunity for which we are indebted to the interposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman for placing succinctly before the House the views which I and those friends who act with me entertain upon the immediate measure in question, and upon those subjects with which now it is inevitably and inextricably involved. Sir, after the financial statement of the Minister, which was the origin of these protracted, renewed, and varied debates, there was in the House, on the part of several hon. Gentlemen whose opinions deserve respect, some suspicion as to the solidity of the surplus on which the measure of the Government was founded. I am yet at a loss to understand that the House of Commons would have exercised functions foreign from its highest duty when the financial statement of the Minister being before them, they had hesitated to submit the statement of the Minister to the severest scrutiny. I apprehend in so doing they were only performing their duty and pursuing that course which their predecessors have always followed. Sir, I apprehend that the principle which should guide the House upon such a question as the existence or non-existence of a surplus is one which may be accurately defined. If there be in the House generally a conviction that there has been on the part of the Government so much financial and so much political negligence as not to have duly provided for the public service and the possible exigencies of the state—I apprehend the House, if that be their conviction, have only one course to follow and only one duty to fulfil. It would be due to the Government—it would be due to the character of the House that they should call on the House to declare in a manner which could not be mistaken their want of confidence in the Minister who after such negligence was clearly incompetent to discharge the great duty and to bear the heavy responsibility of the Government. But, Sir, if, on the contrary, that be not the case, I do not understand how as practical men we can do otherwise than accept the statement of the Minister, and act as that statement justifies us in doing. And, Sir, on the first night of this debate, on the question of adjournment, I stated that I had not made up my mind on the question, and that I waited to listen to the explanation of the Minister on this very question of the surplus. I thought that I had on that occasion taken a usual course, and I know that I was influenced only by the desire of fair dealing. I was, therefore, surprised that the noble Lord the First Minister should have challenged the propriety of my conduct. Sir, the charges that were brought—the criticism rather that was offered on the elements which form the surplus of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were of a grave character, that required consideration, and explanation by the Minister. Those points were ably stated to the House. We had the advantage of listening to the answer of the Government upon the main questions which were raised in that discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer on the one hand publicly declared, regarding the payment from China, that he had contemplated all those objections urged against his Estimate, and offered explanations on certain points on which great uncertainty existed, and a repeated statement on his part that he had no doubt that the money on which he counted would reach him. The noble Lord, on the other hand, with respect to that objection to the surplus, founded on political considerations, assured us that those particular objections had been well weighed by the Cabinet, and that he did not himself consider that the circumstances which were unexpectedly occurring in an important part of the globe would call on this country for an increased expenditure. Having received those assurances from the Ministers—not being prepared to challenge the Government on those grave matters, and to ask the House to decide whether they reposed confidence or not in Her Majesty's Ministers—I felt it my duty to state that I accepted the surplus announced by the Government as an actual surplus, and that the only point on which the House should be called upon to decide should be to what purpose that surplus should be applied.

Now, before I touch upon that matter, there is a point on which I wish to make an observation. I think that the charge which has been made against us of wasting the public time in performing one of our highest duties—namely, considering whether the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was justified or not, is one that cannot for a moment be maintained; and I do not believe that any Minister, in his cooler moments, after full reflection, would seriously hold that a scrutiny into the existence of a surplus is not a legitimate duty of the House of Commons. We are further charged with wasting time in discussing the form of the Bill in which the policy of the Government is embodied. Now, that also appears to me to be a charge devoid of justice. It cannot be denied that the form of procedure adopted by the Government in their financial measures this year has been of a novel character. When the Resolutions which were to be moved in Committee of Ways and Means were placed upon the table, every one at once perceived that their form was unusual. Their form being unusual everybody necessarily connected that change of form with grave incidents that occurred in the two Houses of Parliament last year; and surely that was a combination of circumstances which justified on the part of the House inquiry and consideration—inquiry into the reasons which had induced the Government to adopt that form and consideration whether it was a constitutional and legitimate form. I cannot conceive any subject—whatever difference of opinion may prevail between us upon the point at issue—more legitimate and more necessary for discussion and deliberation in this House. Now, I do not want to enter into any controversy upon that subject upon the present occasion, but at the same time I do not desire to conceal my own opinion with respect to it. I believe that, by the precedents upon the journals of this House, Her Majesty's Ministers were justified in introducing Resolutions in the form they have selected. I go further, and I say I believe there may be occasions on which it would be convenient that the financial policy of the Government should be brought forward in a single measure for the consideration of this House, and it is still my opinion that, had the financial measures of last year been brought forward in that complete form they would never have passed this House. But although the course pursued by the Government in this respect may be justified by precedent, although it may, under certain circumstances, be even recommended by convenience, I am at the same time of opinion that its adoption and application this year is unwise, unnecessary, and impolitic, and that instead of conciliation it will tend to a directly contrary result. In the first place, what is there to conciliate? There is no quarrel between the two Houses. I should look upon a quarrel between the two Houses as a great misfortune; and, although I am as willing to maintain the privileges of this House as any Gentleman in it, I should be prepared to make any concession consistent with our rights and our dignity to prevent the occurrence of anything so unfortunate as a misunderstanding between the two Houses of Parliament. But I am not aware that there has been any such misunderstanding.

I conclude, from all that I have observed and all that I have heard, that the conduct of the House of Lords with respect to the measure for the repeal of the paper duty last year was justified by every legal and Parliamentary right. Certainly, if there are any persons of a contrary opinion it cannot be Her Majesty's Ministers. The speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government at the time, the Resolutions adopted by this House in accordance with that speech, would be strong evidence to the contrary. But when we remember that Her Majesty's Ministers, last year, were obliged from the force of circumstances to make a second financial statement, and to bring a second Budget before our consideration, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer availed himself of the Excise upon paper as part of his Ways and Means, it is clear that it is not Her Majesty's Ministers who can impugn the right of the House of Lords as exercised by that House last year. How far that was justified by policy is not a subject which I wish to bring into this discussion; but I believe that the House and the country are both agreed upon it. Then what is there to conciliate in this respect? And why, if there has been no misunderstanding and no collision—why, if the Lords have only done that which the law and the usage of Parliament justify, and which Her Majesty's Ministers have entirely sanctioned by their speeches, by their Resolutions, and even by their financial measures—why should we this year unnecessarily make a change in the form of our proceedings, the only apparent object of which is to produce a collision and to render conciliation impossible? Now, I will not proceed at length into this controversy, because I think that upon the present occasion it is entirely unnecessary to do so, and I only touched upon it because I think that when so grave and delicate a question is brought before the House and debates arise upon it—debates which have been maintained on both sides, and with great learning and ability—the country ought not to be told and led to believe that while we have been endeavouring to arrive at prudent and wise decisions we have been wasting the public time. It is of great importance even for the House of Commons, with all its power, to be on terms of good and cordial understanding with the other House of Parliament. We live in an age of rapid transition. The character of this House has been greatly changed within the memory of man, and the power of this House has been greatly increased. The power of the House of Lords, as we are often reminded, has no doubt at the same time been greatly diminished. During the last thirty years or more the Lords have lost a great deal of power. But we should be under a great mistake if we forgot to observe that they have also gained something. The House of Lords, indeed, can no longer exercise that power which the ancient barons exercised, because there was then only one kind of property in this country, and they were almost the sole possessors of it. The House of Lords cannot, indeed, exercise that power which was exercised by the great nobles who invented the Constitution of 1688 and established an oligarchy in this country. No doubt all that is changed ; but the House of Lords still possess a great and growing influence in the conviction of the national mind that an intermediate body between the popular branch of the Legislature and absolute legislation is a great security for public liberty and for temperate government. The people of England feel that the existence of a body of that kind is a great blessing ; and all the public experience of Europe has assured them that that is a body which cannot be artificially created. They, therefore, consider it a very fortunate circumstance for this country that such an intermediate body should have gradually risen, supported by property, by tradition, and by experience, ready to act with the critical faculty which is necessary when precipitate legislation is threatened, and at least to obtain time, so that upon all questions of paramount importance the ultimate decision should be founded on the mature opinion of an enlightened nation. Now, this is the great influence which the House of Lords possess, and it is a growing influence. I would further say, that if the House of Lords continue to be guided by the wise and temperate feelings which have animated them of late years, that is an influence that, I believe, will increase, and will always be exercised for the public advantage ; and I think that our discussions on our relations with the House of Lords in reference to this very question of our financial policy have assisted this House and assisted the country to arrive at sounder opinions upon the subject. Who, then, has a right to say that we have been wasting the public time while we were discussing questions involving considerations of so delicate and important a character ? Upon both these topics, therefore, on which we have been of late so frequently taunted by the noble Lord, I hold that the House is entirely exempt from blame. Every night we have been told that we have questioned the existence of a surplus, and yet that we have proposed remissions of taxation. Now, I deny that myself or any of the Gentlemen on this side of the House have pursued such a course. I have never denied the existence of a surplus, and I have counselled a remission of taxation on the faith of that surplus. But if I wanted an authority for, at the same time denying, the existence of a surplus, and yet recommending a remission of taxation, I could find very great authority, and it does not become the Members on the Treasury bench to indulge in taunts of this kind. I will not, however, discuss that subject now, because my purpose, at this moment is not to enter into any recrimination of that description, but to place before the House clearly the course which we upon this side, intend to take upon this occasion. I say, however, that in the year 1857 the right hon. Gentleman who is now the Secretary for the Home Department, and who was then charged with the care of the finances of the country, did taunt one of the most distinguished Members of the House, who was then in opposition with denying the existence of a surplus, and yet recommending a reduction of taxation ; and he received from that distinguished Member a most vigorous and able reply ; and if anybody wishes to read that reply—for I will not encumber these few observations with extracts from Hansard—he can refer to a speech delivered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the year 1857. Having said this much in vindication, not merely of myself and my friends, but of the House of Commons, from the charge brought against us by the Minister of wasting public time, because we performed two of the most important functions of Members of this House,—those of scrutinizing the data on which a surplus was estimated, and examining minutely whether our proceedings was justified, regard being had to the privileges of the other House and our own, I will proceed now, merely reminding hon. Members that I myself have never for a moment disputed the existence of a surplus, to state the principles on which I myself think that surplus ought to be apportioned.

I lay it down as a principle of our financial system which ought invariably to be pursued, that in the remission of taxation war taxes should have the preference. I think that a sound and a popular doctrine; and it is popular, I think, because it is sound. Now, I am led to that opinion from considerations of high policy. I think that when on a great emergency—and war is eminently such an emergency—you appeal to the people to bear extraordinary imposts, it is of the highest essence of policy that when the emergency is past you should free the people from those extraordinary charges as quickly as the state of the public revenue will permit; and, for this unanswerable reason, that if an emergency should recur, and you should again have to appeal to the patriotism and the high spirit of the people, you will appeal to them with much less chance of success if they can turn round on you and say, “We have already had an extraordinary addition to our taxation imposed upon us at a great emergency; we cheerfully bore it; and yet, when the emergency passed away, you remitted and reduced other taxes in preference to those extraordinary imposts which you then placed upon us.” I say that if that be your policy you cripple the energies of the country—you diminish the power of the Minister who may have hereafter to appeal to the spirit of the people; and totally irrespective of all considerations of finance and political economy the paramount influence which should guide a Minister is this, that the public contract with the nation, entered into on a solemn occasion, should be rigorously and rigidly fulfilled. Now, assuming, as I assume and maintain it to be a principle of our financial policy, that in the remission of taxation war taxes should have a preference, let us apply that principle to the surplus of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Although the income tax was introduced into our modern system of finance merely as an instrument to accomplish the reform of a tariff, I do not think any wise Minister should hesitate to look on the income tax as essentially a war tax. The existence of such a resource, of such a power of Supply, not drawn upon, in the possession of our Sovereign, is a greater security for the maintenance of peace than fleets and armies. The very fact of the income tax in what I may call a virgin state among the resources of this country would influence the decisions of Foreign Cabinets, and make them hesitate before they took a course which might offend the pride or endanger the interests of England. It should, therefore, be a point of policy to draw as little as possible on such an instrument, to keep it at a very low figure, or, if possible, not to trench at all on its resources. Therefore, had Her Majesty's Ministers come forward with this surplus of £2,000,000, and proposed to appropriate it entirely to the reduction of the income tax, as it at present exists, I should not have questioned the course which they were taking. There are other considerations which ought not to be forgotten. It ought to be borne in mind that there is no tax the remission of which so greatly stimulates consumption. [A cry of “Oh, oh!”] The hon. Gentleman seems to be incredulous, but I am sure the House has not forgotten that in 1857, when we had a commercial and monetary crisis, when we had the highest rate of interest known for many years, our Revenue never decreased, but throughout the year was sustained entirely owing to the remission of £9,000,000 of income tax which had been imposed to carry on the Russian War. However, as there is at present no controversy among us as to the apportionment of the entire surplus to the reduction of the income tax, it is unnecessary to pursue this point. I am perfectly ready to admit that much may be said for a distribution of the relief between direct and indirect taxation. Between the right hon. Gentleman and myself no controversy has arisen upon that matter. I may have an opinion on the whole more in favour of the course which I have just indicated; but I do not pretend to express any positive opinion upon the subject. It is enough to know that Her Majesty's Government have considered that it was most advantageous to the country that the relief to be given should be distributed between direct and indirect taxation. I am not disposed to question the wisdom of that policy. But, assuming that a portion of the surplus is to be appropriated to the relief of indirect taxation, then I maintain that the principle which I have ventured to lay down applies, and that regard ought first to be had to those imposts which are absolutely or effectually war taxes, and that relief ought to be granted from those extraordinary imposts respecting which we virtually entered into a contract with the people that they should be relieved as soon as the opportunity for doing so should arise. Gentlemen, not merely on this, but on the opposite side of the House, were of opinion that in dealing with indirect taxation by way of remission we ought to fix on those indirect imposts which were war taxes, and on due reflection the House was asked to come to a decision on that question, and, at the same time, to declare whether it was more politic to repeal the indirect taxation on paper or to reduce the indirect taxation upon tea? Totally irrespective of the first consideration, on which I need not further dwell—the high policy of keeping our engagements with the people, and of remitting when opportunity offers the taxes which, under extraordinary circumstances, have been placed on their articles of consumption—I say the considerations which influenced us to propose the reduction of the tea duty were such as deserved the attention, and, I think, the acceptance, of the House. The commercial considerations were of the highest character. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of one of the debates, said that my only view of financial change was to reduce duties on articles of general consumption, and that I thought of nothing but the more obvious interests of the consumer. Sir, I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been unjust in these observations. I do not think the interest of the consumer is one which ought in any way to be neglected. A financial measure which consults the interests and advantage of the consumer has much to recommend it. But I do not for a moment pretend that in remitting or reducing taxation you are merely to consider whether the people are to have their tea or their sugar cheaper. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that in all these remissions and reductions we should look to the means by which we can occupy the people, and that it was among those which afford increased occupation to the people that the best measures are to be found. [“Hear, hear!” from the Ministerial Benches.] Why, who doubts it? And, reviewing what has taken place in these debates, I would ask the House whether by reducing the duties upon tea you are not contributing more to the employment and occupation of the people than by the mode which is recommended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer? I do not despise the benefits which must accrue to those who acquire occupation and employment by the abolition of any excise. Everybody admits that the abolition of an excise, if you can afford it, is an advantageous course. I myself have said so twenty times in this House, and the hon. and learned Gentleman has just read a speech of my lamented Friend Lord George Bentinck, which as strongly as possible lays down the same principle. But, if we look at the employment of the people of this country, we must look at it on a large scale—we must look at our foreign trade; and, in the present disordered and disturbed state of the European and American markets, it is in the highest degree expedient that we should study our position in reference to those great markets, including that population of 400,000,000 whose commerce has been opened to us by the skill of our diplomatists and the valour of our troops. And the employment of the great mass of the people of this country will be much more assisted by increasing our commerce with the Empire of China than by relieving what I must call a limited industry and trade at home from the interference of the Excise. At this moment we greatly depend on the China trade. The subject engages the attention of all commercial men who are carrying on large transactions with the East. The fact is, that the consumption of the great staple of China is at present fixed in this country; it does not increase; and the obvious policy to pursue would be by reducing its price to stimulate its consumption, and thus obtain a larger market for our manufactured goods. It appears to me idle to place in competition the advantages the working classes of this country would derive from a great impulse given to the China trade with the limited advantage to be derived from abolishing the Excise on paper. However, the House was called on to give a decision on this question, and it decided not to reduce the duty on tea. But under what circumstances was that decision taken? It was taken not only in a very full but in almost a complete House, and was then carried by a bare majority. But it does not follow because this decision was come to under these circumstances that we should give up any opportunity we may possess of urging on the House the adoption of the policy we think ought to be pursued. It does not in the slightest degree shake my faith in the principle, that if there is to be a remission of taxation, war taxes ought to have the preference in that remission. We have, therefore, to consider the position in which we are now placed. The right hon. Gentleman calls on us to-day to repeal the paper duty. I do not for a moment pretend to say that the Excise on paper is not a disadvantage to the paper trade. But I am not at all prepared to maintain that the Excise on paper is a greater disadvantage to that trade than an Excise duty would be to any other manufacture. No argument I have heard in this discussion has shaken my conviction as to the financial policy we have endeavoured to urge on the House on this subject. Although I am prepared to accept the surplus, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I do not believe that with the present general aspect of circumstances we can indulge in any dream of a speedy or considerable reduction of our expenditure. It is very easy to dilate on the importance of such a reduction, and no man in the House is so interested in effecting a reduction of expenditure as a Minister. But expenditure depends on policy, and I know no party in the House that at this moment would recommend any great reduction in our military expenditure.

Then, in dealing with a remission of taxation we have to consider whether it is wiser to reduce a duty on an article of general consumption or repeal a duty of Excise. In one case, if an emergency should arise, you can again appeal to the same source of revenue; in the other case you can only substitute for the indirect taxation you have lost an equal amount of direct taxation. Now, this is a grave question; it is not to be met by light arguments, or stifled by taunts from the Ministerial bench. It is said we are precluded from offering any opposition to the measure of the Government, because the House has come to a Resolution on the subject. No one is more ready to regard a Resolution of the House of Commons with respect and deference than myself. It is, at the same time, unwise and indiscreet to mistake the character of a Resolution of either House of Parliament. A Resolution of either House—and especially of the House of Commons—is an expression of opinion, and nothing more. Though it is an expression of the opinion of an assembly well entitled to confidence, yet, like the expression of the opinion of an individual, it is subject to the inexorable conditions of time, circumstance, and maturity of thought. If time, if change of circumstances, and reflection affect the opinion of individuals, so time, circumstance, and thought must influence and may change the opinion expressed by a Resolution of the House of Commons. And it is unwise on the part of the House to strain too much the character and influence of its Resolutions. We have seen within these few years—I might almost say within a few months—the Sovereign recommend from the throne an important policy to the House, and both Houses pass Addresses thanking Her Majesty for that recommendation, and pledging themselves to consider the measures necessary to carry that policy into effect. Have not those measures been brought forward by Ministers, and have they not also been withdrawn by Ministers? And who blames them? They were withdrawn because it was ascertained that the general opinion disapproved and refused its sanction to that policy. After an instance like this, on a question so important as the distribution of political power in the State, it is too much for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his colleagues—it is too much for the men who felt justified, and, as I think, were fully justified, in neglecting a pledge of such importance—to rest the chief defence of the policy they are now bringing forward upon a hesitating Resolution, passed in a languid House of Commons. I can, therefore, Sir, offer a sincere opposition to the clause before us. In doing so it is unnecessary to vindicate myself and those I act with, because we take this opportunity of testing the opinion of the House on this subject. Throughout the discussion of these measures it has been my most anxious desire, while wishing to consult the convenience of the Government as much as possible—as in my opinion is the duty of the House—to reserve our right to oppose the measures of the Minister of Finance. On every occasion I have reserved that right; and I have done more than it was necessary to do. I have repeated our intention to oppose that policy; and I believe the occasion we have taken to oppose it is in the strictest sense of the word a legitimate one. I do not wish that course to be mistaken. There may be hon. Gentlemen who feel themselves justified in opposing the clause repealing the paper duty because they have no confidence in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's surplus. I do not recede from the ground I first took on the question, and I pursue a course that is perfectly consistent. I am not prepared, by rejecting the clause, to place Ways and Means in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for which he avows he has no use. I oppose the clause that we may pursue the policy we think advantageous to the country; that when called on to remit a certain amount of taxation we should remit war taxes in preference to any others, and maintain our faith with the great body of the people. I do so upon high political as well as upon commercial and fiscal considerations, and my purpose, therefore, cannot be mistaken. I wish, if I possibly can, to carry into effect the financial policy which was enunciated in 1858, which was then adopted unanimously by the House, and which was sanctioned and supported by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. I wish to terminate, if possible, and at all events to take every opportunity of reducing, the income tax, because I think its reduction, and, if possible, its abolition, would add materially to the power of this country, totally irrespective of the great relief which would thus be given to important classes. But I acknowledge at the same time that the claims of war duties which take the form of indirect taxation are of so weighty a character that they must in some degree divert us from the great policy then recommended. I say, then, re-affirming the policy which in 1858 was supported by an unanimous Parliament, that the first object which a Minister should have in view in the reduction of taxation is the income tax and the war duties on tea and sugar; and when the hon. and learned Gentleman talks about a Resolution come to by the House of Commons upon the paper duty, can he forget—what, perhaps, it is convenient to forget—that the House arrived at that conclusion a few days only after they had unanimously affirmed the policy of reducing the war duties on tea and sugar in preference to all other indirect taxes? It is to that policy I appeal, and it is that policy which I am now attempting to vindicate and strengthen in the course which I am recommending. I maintain that there has been no other course for the House to pursue than the one they are now debating. Hon. Members who, perhaps, do not even trouble themselves to read the Bill, have said to me, “Why, the clauses upon tea and sugar are passed.” But when they read the Bill they will find that if they wish to renew the struggle for the reduction of the tea and sugar duties—if they wish to originate an effort for the reduction of the sugar duty—that opportunity, instead of having passed has not arrived. All that you have done by passing the second clause is to agree to renew the tea and sugar duties, but the rates at which you will renew them must be settled at a period subsequent to the clause which we are now considering, and it is only when you come to the schedule in the Bill that you really can ask the opinion of the House upon the question. This clause, then, is an obstacle to the policy which I am recommending, and unless we can induce the House to reject the clause they cannot act on the sound and popular rule, which ought never to be departed from—namely, that in all remission of taxation war duties should have the preference. It might be expedient to ask the opinion of the House again upon the question of reducing the tea duties, provided this clause is rejected. That is a grave question, but, following the course of Parliamentary procedure, I think there has never been an instance yet known where, after a great struggle on a question of taxation, and after an important tax has been passed in one stage by so slight a majority in so full a House, there has not been a renewed effort to effect the purpose of the minority. That is a question entirely for future discussion. But there are some who object to this course. There are hon. Gentlemen who say “We entirely agree with the principle of the Budget of 1858, that we ought to remit war duties, but, then, the opinion of the House has been taken upon tea, and that opinion ought to be definitive.” But there are other war duties besides those upon tea. Is the war duty on sugar not one of importance? Is it not a most legitimate and proper subject of discussion whether we should not do better to reduce the war duty on sugar rather than remit the paper duty? These are questions which I have no doubt will be brought before the House if the opportunity be given, but no opportunity can be given till this clause is rejected. When, therefore, we are charged with merely opposing the remission of a tax in order that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be embarrassed with Ways and Means for which he has no use, I say there is no foundation for the charge, and that we are acting now for a distinct object, which is to establish and preserve the financial policy which we have always upheld. There is one subject to which I would not have adverted had it not most unnecessarily been imported into the debate by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Mellor) who, I apprehend, although he is not sitting on the Treasury bench, represents the opinions of the Government upon this matter. The questions before us are of so grave a nature—they are questions which touch so nearly the interests of all classes in this country, and which may exert hereafter such an influence upon the social condition of the people, the principle upon which the taxation of the country is established being really the gravest question which can be brought before the House—that, but for the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I should have thought it unnecessary to mention this subject to the Committee, who have to-night a great duty to perform, and who, I am sure, will discharge it with a full sense of its importance. Whatever might be the rumours I had heard in lobbies and in ante-chambers, I did not think that from an hon. and learned Gentleman who had moved the adjournment of the House, and who, therefore, spoke with all the advantage of due deliberation, we should have had insinuations founded upon such miserable topics as he has introduced, as though the opinion of the House and the conduct of a great party were to be influenced by such considerations. I understand from the hon. and learned Gentleman that in his opinion this Motion has been brought forward in consequence of a Ministerial squabble upon some subject. That is the statement which the hon. and learned Gentleman after mature deliberation thinks he is justified in making. All I can say is that our determination to take the opinion of the House upon the policy of the Government was announced weeks before this rumour reached us. Nor do I know that it was possible for us to have asked the opinion of the House respecting that policy on an earlier or a more convenient issue than that now before us. I hope that the great party with which I have the honour to be connected are as sensible of the responsibility of their position as those who sit opposite them; but, nevertheless, we are charged with being influenced by these undignified considerations, and with taking a course actuated by wholly unworthy motives. I find statements made of my having had interviews with individuals deeply interested in certain enterprises, and of having promised them the support of the gentlemen who honour me with their confidence. Sir, I have had no interview with any one. It is an impudent fabrication; and I am bound to say, with regard to a respectable gentleman whose name has been mixed up with mine in these reports, that he, unsolicited, stated to me in the solemn manner that befitted a gentleman of his sacred calling, that he had neither directly nor indirectly sanctioned such reports, and that he had seen them with indignation. I know nothing of this question. When the papers respecting it are placed before the House I shall read them, as subjects of this kind deserve to be read, in a perfectly impartial spirit; and, notwithstanding the insinuations and charges which have been made, I shall decide upon them in the same spirit, with a due regard to the just claims of Ireland and to the general welfare of the country. I hope I have now placed before the Committee my views as to the clear issue before us. It is one of no mean importance. It involves in the policy which you pursue the question whether you will maintain good faith with the public, who, in a moment of emergency and with generous confidence, trusted and supported you. It involves another question of scarcely less importance—namely, whether you will pursue a financial policy which, in my opinion, will render it inevitable to substitute for indirect taxation an equal amount of direct taxation, thereby disturbing what is already in danger—that true balance between the two great sources of Supply which should always be maintained. With these views, and feeling that the Committee to-night will decide upon these great questions alone, and not upon subjects which have been so improperly mixed up with them, I shall most certainly oppose the insertion of the clause now in question.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, before I enter on that which is the immediate question before the House, I feel bound to advert to the last of the topics to which the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, has referred, and upon which I do not enter for the purpose of making any charge against the right hon. Gentleman. I make no charge whatever against him, because I have heard from common rumour what I have no doubt is true—namely, that after the last division on the subject of the paper duty the right hon. Gentleman said the majority was so scanty that he should probably on some future occasion again take the sense of the House on the question. Therefore, I make no charge against him of bringing forward this question for the purpose of obtaining the support of a certain number of Gentlemen who, it appears, are discontented with a recent decision of the Government with regard to a local matter. But, Sir, it is necessary to vindicate the honour of the Government to which I belong. I believe that my noble Friend at the head of the Government and the whole of the Cabinet stand perfectly free from imputation on this subject; but imputations have been made. Those imputations have been referred to in a newspaper which is universally read, and, therefore, they cannot and ought not to be passed over. Sir, the decision of the Government on this subject was made and communicated to the parties interested; and my noble Friend at the head of the Government was asked by a person who seemed entitled to put the question whether he would receive a deputation of Irish Members with reference to this matter on Monday morning last, the day on which the proposition for the repeal of the paper duty was to be brought forward in Committee? My noble Friend absolutely refused to receive that deputation. My noble Friend saw at once what imputations, what misconceptions, what false accusations might arise from his receiving the deputation, though nominally on the subject of the Galway Contract, and he absolutely refused to receive it. The company on whose behalf the reception of the deputation was sought have since made a long representation with regard to their case. That representation will be answered by the Postmaster General or his Secretary, and the communication will be laid before this House; but as to the imputation that the Government intend to postpone for six months their decision on the question, with a view of giving the sum of £36,000, which has been mentioned, for the performance of the postal service for six months, that imputation is totally devoid of foundation. I at once repudiate it as a calumny on the character of the Government. Sir, in respect to another question, with regard to which my noble Friend was asked a question before this debate was resumed this evening. I have this observation to make that, supposing this contract to be at an end, and that it is considered that there ought to be a communication with America from the nearest point of the United Kingdom, it would evidently be unjust to Ireland to say that the question was to be summarily concluded without a consideration of all the circumstances and facts affecting the case—affecting the public money, affecting the trade of the country, and affecting the convenience of the transport of the mails to America; but that is a totally different question from the question of the Galway Contract, on which the Government will act coolly and deliberately. And, Sir, with respect to the matter of the Galway Contract, I say that rather than the Government should make any concession on that question in order to obtain votes to-night, it would be better that ten Ministries should be defeated. It would be better that ten Ministries should be defeated and that the House of Commons should be ten times dissolved than that such a stain should be cast on the Government of this country. And when I say that it is better that ten Ministries should be defeated, and the House of Commons ten times dissolved, that is a consequence that would not be avoided; on the contrary, it is a consequence that would be brought on if any Government in this country were to act in so profligate a manner, because it is not to be supposed that this is a question in which one part only of the United Kingdom is interested. Galway Contracts might spring up in other parts of the kingdom, and if any ten or twenty Gentlemen in the divided state of the House, or of the great parties which are represented here, found that they had defeated one Ministry by this means, the new Ministry would soon experience a similar attempt to make them stoop to this degradation; they in their turn would be defeated, and would be obliged to resort to a dissolution. Therefore, I say, that whether we regard the honour and character of the Government, or whether we look to the general advantage of the country, it is quite impossible that any proposals on this subject can be looked to with a view to any division in this House. Sir, I repeat again, that I make no imputation, no charge against the right hon. Gentleman, or against the great party to which he belongs; but, at the same time, I think it is matter for the members of that great party how far they should give any countenance or favour to—how far they should support even indirectly—any attempt, such as that to which allusion has been made, to force the Government into an opinion contrary to their convictions. That, however, is a matter which I leave entirely to their own sense of the public interests, and their own sense of that honour which belongs to all public men.

I proceed now to the general question raised in this debate, and upon which the right hon. Gentleman has thrown an entirely new light. I confess that on Monday evening I thought we were discussing the question whether, there being no surplus, the House of Commons might not very well refuse to repeal the paper duty, and thereby enrich the public Treasury. It appears, however, that the right hon. Gentleman thinks that there certainly is a surplus, but that there might be some other way of disposing of it besides repealing the paper duty. When my noble Friend and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer complained of a waste of public time, it was not of the time occupied in discussing the great measure of my right hon. Friend. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated to the House his views with respect to the finances of the country; he has made elaborate calculations; he has stated to the House what were the results of last year and what were his expectations for next, and I think it became Gentlemen who have been in the service of the Crown, and more especially those who have been connected with the finances of the country, to consider the proposal of my right hon. Friend. They might have said, "You are very imprudent; you have no surplus, and you ought not to reduce the Revenue of the country to such an extent as you propose." That was one point. They might, on the other hand, have said, "That there is a considerable surplus has been proved to us, but your application of it is unwise. We have a plan for a better application of it, and we will propose it to the House." Either of these courses would have been not only constitutional, but perfectly proper; but what they have done is this:—For three nights they have discussed the question whether there was a surplus or not, without coming to any decision, evidently trying to catch what was the opinion of the House as expressed in a vague and desultory discussion. At last they came to the decision that there was a surplus, and then they said that the surplus ought to be applied to a reduction of the tea duty. I am the last person who ought to find fault with that proposition. It gave rise to a benevolent struggle between two parties, the one endeavouring to relieve the industry of the nation by removing a tax on an article extensively manufactured in the United Kingdom, and the other trying to obtain at a cheaper rate one of the luxuries of the poor people of this country. When this question was discussed and decided one would have thought that it was nearly time to come to a final Resolution as to the manner in which the surplus was to be appropriated; but no; another question was raised; and let me refer to the manner in which it has been treated, for it is one of great importance. The House of Lords having exercised its privilege last year in an unusual manner, and rejected a Bill sent up from this House by which the industry of the country was to be relieved from one of its burdens, we submitted that it would be wise this year to consider in one Bill the whole of the financial measures proposed by the Government, and to send up to the other House in that shape. Well, hon. Gentlemen have said that this is not a fair proceeding towards the House of Lords; that it interferes with the privileges of that House; and that this was not the manner in which our propositions ought to have been made; although the authority of my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), and that of my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote), were in favour of the view taken by Majesty's Government. Nay, the right hon. Gentleman himself last year said that it was advisable that all the financial propositions should be put into one Bill. The question, however, was still open for discussion, and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) with that honest directness of purpose which always distinguished his conduct in this House, determined to bring the question to an issue, and proposed that it should be an instruction to the Committee to divide the Bill so that each tax should be embodied in a separate Bill. Nothing could be a clearer or a fairer mode of bringing the question to an issue; but, instead of supporting it, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), who is one of those who set up for us an entirely new Constitution, and who proposes that the Lords should exercise a power which they have never exercised in the whole course of our history, gave some very good reasons why the Motion should not be entertained; and when it came to a division those who were to defend the privileges of the House of Lords against our aggression slunk out of the House, and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was left with only thirty-four Members. One would have thought that there would have been an end of the constitutional question then, and that those who did not venture to support their opinion by their votes—who had shrunk from the decision by which they might have been committed to an opinion—would never have mentioned the constitutional question again. But no; we had no sooner got into the discussion on the paper duty than up jumped the constitutional question again, and we were told again that we were going to insult the House of Lords. I must ask for one of two things—either let Gentlemen bring the question to a decision in any form which they may think best, or let them refrain from taunting the majority. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has alluded to the times when almost all property belonged to the barons, and when what he called an oligarchy established a Government in 1688. But in those times, when the barons were so powerful, they yielded to the House of Commons on this subject, and, though frequent attempts were made to obtain a control over the taxes, yet on various occasions when it came to a contest they yielded to the privileges of the House of Commons. And as for this oligarchy of 1688 they submitted to a tack to a Money Bill—to an abuse of the rights of this House—rather than not allow the privileges of the House of Commons. How, then, can any one believe that at this time of our Constitution we should introduce new practices, that we should ask the House of Lords to be our partners in the financial scheme of the year? But be it observed in this case that Gentlemen like the hon. Member for the West Riding (Sir John Ramsden), who have been so tender of the honour of the House of Lords, have asked for that House something which they never asked for themselves. What they did last year—unwisely, I think, but still it was a question for their own discretion—was this:—A Bill was sent up to them which they had a right to reject, and they said, “You are engaged in a war with China which may be extraordinarily costly, and you ought not to part, therefore, with any means by which this cost may be met,” and they refused on that ground to sanction the repeal of the paper duty. There is no such case at present. For what I know, and for what anybody knows, the House of Lords may be as much agreed that the paper duty should be repealed as the Government themselves. But hon. Gentlemen say—and really I was astonished when I heard the language of the hon. Member for the West Riding the other night—the Lords may have an objection to repeal the tax; they had an objection last year, and though that was an exceptional case, and circumstances have since altered, yet they may object again to repeal the paper duty, and we must approach them, therefore, in such a way that it will be no humiliation to them to agree to that repeal. That is saying that we shall have no financial measures without the House of Lords, and destroying all the privileges we have hitherto enjoyed on those matters. I can conceive the House of Lords saying that though last year, when there was a China war, they did not think it prudent to part with this tax, yet this year, as there was no war, they would cheerfully give their consent to its repeal. I can understand that being the language of the House of Lords, but whether it is or not, I submit to the House that their ancient privileges oblige them to consider what taxes shall be remitted and what kept on without any reference to the previous consent of the House of Lords. And observe this:—It would be an utter absurdity to say that the House of Lords shall be judges as to the amount of taxes, and to say that they shall not be judges of the amount of expenditure. Every year we send up to them an Appropriation Act, containing the whole of your Army, Navy, and Civil Service expenditure, all in one Bill, which they must take in a lump or reject in a lump. If you say that every tax is to go up in a separate measure, then every branch of the expenditure must go up in a separate Bill. For all we know there might be branches of the expenditure which the House of Lords did not approve, and you would then get your financial arrangements into a state of utter confusion, and the present admirable provisions of our Constitution would be totally nullified by this attempt to make a new Constitution. Having disposed of this constitutional question by 190 to 34—when it was brought forward in a constitutional manner — because I say larding a speech about the impropriety of repealing the paper duty and the state of America with commentaries about the power of the House of Lords is not the way to decide a great question. The way to decide a great question is to come down with a Resolution like the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, and take the sense of the House upon it. That is what we did. We—190—affirmed the power and privileges of the House of Commons, and those who were against the power and privileges of the House slunk away.

MR. HORSMAN: I voted with the majority.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I am very glad to hear it; but the hon. Baronet the Member for the West Riding—

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: The noble Lord does not seem to be aware that I also voted in the majority.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Then that makes the matter more extraordinary still. Having deeply considered, both last year and this year, this question of the privileges of the House of Commons and the power of the House of Lords, and having started certain now and startling theories which they were convinced were improvements on our old Constitution and the views of our forefathers, when this question was submitted to the House in a substantial form, they actually voted against the opinions which they had advanced.

I come now, however, to the main question before us. Last year the Government had to consider, having a sum at their disposal for the relief of the taxation of the people, in what manner that sum could be best applied; they came to the conclusion that the best mode would be to apply it to the total repeal of the paper duty. Various motives have been found for the Government, but I believe that the ground on which their decision was come to was that it would be the remission which would give the greatest relief to the country. If they had been of the opinion that the remission of the tea duties or the sugar duties was preferable, my right hon. Friend would, no doubt, have proposed it. The Government decided in favour of a repeal of the paper duty, and, having been defeated by the House of Lords last year, they this year consistently ask again to have that duty repealed, as a relief to the industry of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer is too well acquainted with the finances of the country not to admit that the abolition of this tax will be a relief to the industry of the country; and, for my own part, I have never heard any argument which separates this Excise duty from other Excise duties which we have repealed. It is, perhaps, not so onerous as those on salt, leather, candles, and soap, which were Excise duties on the necessities of life; but, after those duties, it is the one which most interferes with the employment of the people, and which increases the price of an article of very general consumption. Those appear to me to be quite sufficient reasons for its repeal, and the argument against it is stated in a very singular manner. It is said, in the first instance, this is a tax which does not weigh on the people at all; and it is said, in the next, that if we repeal this duty we shall never be able to re-impose it. I should say that one or the other must be true; but both cannot possibly be so. If the tax is no burden on the people, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able at any future time to say, "The State is in want of money; the navy must be increased to meet the contingency of war; but here is a tax which is no burden on the people, and, therefore, we propose to lay on 1½d. per pound on paper;" and to that the House of Commons will universally assent. Or I can understand a person saying, "This is a tax which does so affect the industry of the people, and the abolition of it has given so much employment, that it is impossible to ask the House of Commons to re-impose it." But then the other ground must be abandoned, and those who say that the tax can never be re-imposed must allow that it is a great benefit to take it off, and that the feeling of benefit would, in fact, be the obstacle to its being re-imposed.

I have looked to see the general result, in a financial point of view, of ten years' experience of the repeal of taxes of a similar kind. In those ten years we took off the glass duty, £624,000; the brick duty, £456,000; and the soap duty, £1,126,000—total, £2,206,000. There were certain Excise duties put on, amounting to £1,764,000; so that the amount taken off above the amount imposed was £442,000. Therefore, you might expect that the Revenue would be worse off by nearly half a million. But what was the fact? The whole amount of the Excise in 1844 was £14,450,000, and the net amount of the Excise in 1854 was £17,007,000, being an increase of £2,557,000. Even to the revenue, the consequence of taking off taxes which affect employment is to increase the consumption of other excisable articles, and to increase the amount of revenue not only from the Excise, but from the Customs, upon which you could not otherwise reckon. A noble Lord, in the course of one of these debates, said that in France the increase of revenue had been as much or more, although they had not taken off any of these taxes. But those who speak like that consider that the relief of the people goes for nothing. But it is the duty of the House always to consider the advantage of the people, and if they can find a less burdensome system of taxation, though it produce not a farthing more or a farthing less, it is their duty to adopt it. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last said that there are other taxes which we might take off with greater advantage, and, as I understood him, he seemed to intimate that when we come to the schedules of this Bill we may take off something more from the income tax. With regard to that, I think my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a very fair proposition when he said, "a penny shall be taken off the income tax, and the duty on paper shall be remitted. There is a direct tax reduced and an indirect tax abolished. There is a fair division."

MR. DISRAELI: I did not intend to intimate that I should move any remission of income tax.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I am glad to hear it. But in support of what my right hon. Friend has done, in taking off part of a direct and the whole of an indirect tax, there remains in my memory what happened in the year 1816, when the Government of that day proposed a repeal of the income tax, and we of the Opposition, who were not used to majorities, obtained upon that occasion a majority. We were very much pleased, but two days afterwards Lord Castlereagh came down to the House of Commons with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a statement that the Government were going to make another reduction. Lord Castlereagh I find is reported to have said, "But when the Members of the House thought proper to relieve themselves—I do not use the expression in an invidious sense, but because the income tax is one which affects more particularly the upper classes—then Ministers found it necessary to make some change in their measures for the relief of the people." And the change which Lord Castlereagh proposed was a remission of £2,000,000 of the Excise duty on malt. I think it would be some reproach to us in these days if we were to say we agree to the remission of a penny of income tax, but we refuse the remission of a tax which more especially affects the industry and employment of the people. Everybody was glad to hear in 1816 that the Government would make a further reduction. There was certainly no surplus then; but the Government borrowed the money in order to do it.

We heard the other night a good deal of political considerations upon which the argument was founded—that it is very imprudent to give up this tax. But that argument comes to this—that we ought to maintain the paper duty, and not reduce other taxes. Those considerations are mere vague apprehensions—apprehensions of the interruption of trade or of the disturbance of that peace which this country now happily enjoys with all the nations of the world. But I submit that if mere apprehensions are to justify the House of Commons in the refusal of any remission of taxation, the time may never come to relieve the country from any existing burden. I really think that the decision should be left to the Executive Government. If the Executive Government see that danger is near, that it will be necessary to increase our armaments, surely they will be the first to wish that there should be sufficient funds in order to meet those requirements. My hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Sir John Ramsden) alluded the other night to one subject in a tone which I was very sorry to hear used by any one. My hon. Friend said that "the great Republican bubble in America had burst." Now, Sir, I am proud to confess—I may be subject to correction—but for my part, when I find that a dark and tyrannical despotism has been abolished, and that people are likely to enjoy free government in its place, I rejoice. It is my duty to represent Her Majesty as friendly to all existing States; but if a despotic Government fall, and the people who have been subjected to it are likely to obtain better and freer Government, I cannot conceal that it gives me satisfaction, and that I sympathize with them. But I own I have very different feelings when a great Republic, which has enjoyed for seventy or eighty years institutions under which the people have been free and happy, enters into a conflict in which that freedom and happiness is placed in jeopardy. I must say the joy which I felt at the overthrow of some of the despotisms of Italy is counterbalanced by the pain which I experience at the events which have lately taken place in America. I admit that I have thought, and that I still think, that in this country we enjoy more real freedom than the United States have ever done. I admit also that the great founders of that Republic, wise and able men as they were, had not the materials at hand by which they could interpose, as we are able to do in this country, the curb and correction of reason in order to restrain the passionate outbursts of the popular will. Yet we cannot be blind to the fact that the Republic has been for many years a great and free State, exhibiting to the world the example of a people in the enjoyment of wealth, happiness, and freedom, and affording bright prospects of the progress and improvement of mankind. When I reflect that the reproaches which are cast by the States of the North upon the States of the South, and the resistance which they have called forth, have arisen from that accursed institution of slavery, I cannot but recollect also that with our great and glorious institutions we gave them that curse, and that ours were the hands from which they received that fatal gift of the poisoned garment which was flung around them from the first hour of their establishment. Therefore, I do not think it just or seemly that there should be among us anything like exultation at their discord, and still less that we should reproach them with an evil for the origin of which we are ourselves to blame. These are the feelings with which I heard the remarks of my hon. Friend the other night, and I must say that I believe the sentiments which he expressed form an exception to the general impression in England. Indeed, I think nothing could be more honourable to our country than the prevailing pain and grief which have been occasioned by the prospect of that great and free people being about to rush into arms to destroy each other's happiness and freedom. I have but few words more to say. It is necessary I should assure the House that neither with regard to America, nor with regard to any of the great European nations, do I see at present any prospect that our pacific relations will be disturbed. The world, however, is in a state of change, and far be it from me to make any prophecy that peace will, in all the changes, be preserved. All I can say is that, as far as I know, the feelings of all States towards this country are friendly; that there are no questions pending upon which any conflict is likely to arise; and that, as far as my humble means can promote the cause of peace and goodwill upon earth, I will exert them to that end.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: I have no intention of intruding myself upon the attention of the Committee, except for one moment, merely to explain, and to remove an erroneous impression into which I am sorry to find the noble Lord has fallen. I assure the noble Lord, and I think his own recollection will bear me out, that no one word ever fell from my lips of exultation over the most unfortunate events which are now taking place in America. I did contrast the condition of America with that of England, in order to draw from it the lesson that it was our duty to be thankful for and to strengthen those institutions which are the pride and glory of England. But as regards America, I referred to the events now taking place there as calamitous events, which we must all most deeply deplore.

MR. PEACOCKE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had assumed a surplus of £408,000. He would remind the Committee, however, that since the right hon. Gentleman made his statement there was reason to believe the amount would be reduced by £200,000, which the Government would have to pay as an indemnity to Denmark, and by the sum of £30,000 which the House had already voted for the Princess Alice, leaving, therefore, the very meagre sum of £178,000. When it was recollected that even the surplus itself was estimated upon a calculated improvement in the revenue, which might never take place, and upon the receipt of the Chinese indemnity, which might never be paid, he did not think hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House could be charged with an extraordinary abuse of private judgment if they ventured to be a little sceptical as to the existence of a real surplus. But, however, assuming a surplus existed, he contended that the paper duty was not the first that should be remitted; but that when in time of war taxes had been laid on tea and sugar in time of peace those were the articles which should first be relieved. For if, in times of peace and surplus, war taxes were retained, in times of war and deficiency there would be no source of revenue to fall back upon. The proposed reduction of 1*d.* on the income tax would be beneficial to the upper classes, but of no substantial benefit to the working-man. Nor would the remission of the paper duty be of any good to the poorer classes. An hon. Member had argued that handboxes would be cheapened, and another that paper coats would be brought into use if the paper duty were removed; but he did not see what countervailing benefit these articles would confer upon the working-man for the augmented price which he paid for his sugar and his tea. But when they were called on to take off the paper duty this year it was but fair and right to the House of Lords that they should consider what their position would have been if that body had consented to remit the paper duty last year. The deficit would have been increased by £1,300,000, which must have been added to the permanent debt of the country; they would not have had the half-year's duty of £620,000 from the paper duty in the six months that it was to be retained for the current year; and that alone would have reduced the anticipated surplus to £600,000, which would not have allowed either of the reduction in the income tax or any other duty. The remission of a penny in the income tax, therefore, was owing neither to the right hon. Gentleman nor to that House, but to the superior wisdom and caution of the House of Lords. He should have thought the right hon. Gentleman would have been grateful for that advantage; but he must say that the language of the right hon. Gentleman was not that of thankfulness, nor his conduct that of gratitude. He recollected that last year the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House, and in a fervid speech called for action. But the action of the right hon. Gentleman consisted in quietly pocketing the surplus which had been forced upon him, while his language was the reverse of that inscribed on some alms-boxes, for in the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at all events, the largest contributions were most ungratefully received. But, however, ungrateful he might be, he contended that his Budget was itself the best testimony that could be borne to the caution and wisdom of the House of Lords, as it was also the best instructive practical commentary on his own improvidence last year. But he (Mr. Peacocke) would invite the Committee to direct their eyes to the next year. There would be a diminution of £252,000 next year from the income tax, and of £665,000 on paper. There were also £1,000,000 of Exchequer bonds that would fall due in that year. If they deducted from those sums the Chancellor's estimated surplus of £400,000, that would leave £1,500,000 to be provided for. How was that deficiency to be met? It must be met either by increased taxation or by diminished expenditure. Some hon. Gentlemen thought that the expenditure could be diminished. But, then, why was it not diminished now? If it could be done consistently with the honour and safety of the country, why was not the expenditure immediately diminished? The right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the finances of the country; it was not for him to turn round upon his colleagues and say, the sin of this profligate expenditure rests, not upon me, but upon your shoulders. He was the Minister that, in the eye of the Constitution, was peculiarly responsible; and if he believed that the expenditure of the country was profligate and lavish, it was his duty to reduce it or to resign. But the right hon. Gentleman did not resign; and, therefore, they were to assume that the expenditure was not excessive—that it could not be reduced, and that the deficit of next year must be met by increased taxation; well, then, after the number of taxes which the right hon. Gentleman had abandoned he would have no option but to increase the income tax or augment the duties on tea and sugar. In his opinion that was too high a price to pay for the repeal of the paper duty—a tax which weighed only on a limited number of newspaper proprietors, but was not felt by the community at large. He believed that such a proposition could not receive the assent of the House, for it would be a retrograde and reactionary step in modern legislation opposed to the whole system of their recent financial policy, for, instead of subverting the monopolies of the few for the benefit of the many, they would be taxing the many for the benefit of the few.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, he would not have interfered in the debate had not a piece of information come to his knowledge which he thought he should not be doing his duty if he did not state to the Committee. Since the preparation of the Naval Estimates their neighbours across the water had laid down no less than nine additional iron-plated vessels. As the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had stated in the early part of the Session that the French had got the start of them, he thought this information most important, and touched nearly the question they had under discussion. Under those circumstances, though he knew there were hon. Gentlemen in the House who thought the expenditure of the country was likely to be reduced, he must say he saw little chance of that expectation being realized. He did not wish to enter into the general question; he would only ask the Committee whether, looking at the state of preparedness for war in which all foreign countries were holding themselves, and having regard to the state of affairs in America, and to the storm which was brewing on the Continent of Europe, was it wise that we should at that moment part with one of our largest sources of revenue? He believed that it was not. The remission of the paper duty was impolitic, unwise, and unwarrantable, and he doubted not that a majority of that House and of the country would unhesitatingly pronounce it to be so.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the real question upon which the Committee was about to divide was not whether the paper duty should or should not be repealed, but whether hon. Gentlemen opposite should take the places of those who now sat upon the Ministerial benches; and, under these circumstances, he thought that the references which had been made to the state of Europe told rather against than in favour of those who had made them, because he had no doubt that if the prospects were so gloomy as they had been represented to be the country would rather have the noble Viscount at the head of affairs than Lord Derby, and the noble Lord the Member for the City of London at the Foreign Office than Lord Malmesbury. The debate had been prolonged by hon. Gentlemen opposite in the hope that something might turn up which would be favourable to their assault upon the Treasury benches. Whether anything had turned up or had not he did not know. He had no hesitation in stating that even supposing the duties on tea and sugar should be reduced in preference to the abolition of the duty on paper, still, as he did not wish to see the two noble Lords now at the head of affairs removed from office, he should give his vote in favour of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the hon. Baronet who had just sat down had done his best to lead the Committee away from the real business that was before them. He confessed he thought that through a large portion of these debates they had been in danger of losing the substance in the form. On the point of form he did not much differ from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was at perfect liberty to propose, and the House was at perfect liberty to adopt, his scheme in the form in which he had put it. He never recognized the probability of a dispute between the two branches of the Legislature. God forbid there should be; and he would dismiss that subject with repeating a remark that was made early in these debates, that if, unhappily, such disputes should arise there was a court of appeal from both—the country at large. He thought they ought now to pass from the form of the measure and to consider its substance. The only Member who had at all dealt with the substance of the measure was the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who said that he could draw no distinction between the remission of the Excise duty on paper and the other remission of Excise duties which took place in former years. Now he (Sir William Jolliffe) thought there was a marked difference between the repeal of the paper duties and the repeal of the other Excise duties. No one would dispute the boon that the repeal of the duty on soap had proved to the working classes. No hon. Member acquainted with the manufacturing districts would doubt that the repeal of the duty on bricks had proved a great benefit to the working classes there, in affording facilities for the investment of their small capitals. And with regard to glass, they all knew that the greatest possible benefit had arisen from the repeal of the duty as a means of stimulating the industry of the country. When Sir Robert Peel proposed the repeal of that tax he said that from our natural advantages there was no country in the world whose competition England need fear in the manufacture of glass. Could similar statements be fairly made with respect to paper? He believed not. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Turner), who was a high authority on this question, said he had given the subject his most mature consideration, and he was satisfied that the paper manufacture must be a declining trade, and that under perfect free trade the home manufacturer could not compete with the foreigner. That was the reverse of what Sir Robert Peel said with respect to glass. All classes benefited by the reduction of glass; but in whose interest he should like to know was the abolition of the tax proposed? The measure was, there could be no doubt, one which would benefit chiefly the proprietors of penny newspapers — those hobgoblins of which the noble Lord the Member for London charged those who sat upon the Opposition benches of being afraid. Those were the sprightly gentlemen whose aspirations “daily,” “morning” and “evening” were for cheap paper at any price, and on them he did not mean to deny a great boon would be conferred by the repeal of the duty. They were naturally anxious to avail themselves of foreign paper duty free, and although it would appear from the fact of so many entering into the field that the trade which they drove was already sufficient to secure a competition, it might still be very far from being remunerative. The paper manufacturers, however, were beginning to see through the agitation maintained by those gentlemen, and the public to draw a distinction between those industriously employed in the manufacture of paper and the small section who so strongly advocated the withdrawal of the duty imposed upon it. The noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office he might add, travelling wide of the subject, had led them away the other night to a dispute of which he had never before heard—a dispute between the Government and certain parties in Ireland. All he could say was, that he was totally ignorant of the matter, and no suspicion had ever entered his mind that any Government—no matter how that Government might be composed—would ever degrade themselves in the way to which the noble Lord had alluded. But, of all things in the world, the attempt to hold the Opposition responsible for what appeared in the columns of a journal which had been alluded to was most extraordinary, and he could not help regarding it as an attempt to lead the Committee away from the real question at issue. It was also said the Opposition played fast and loose with the question of a surplus, admitting it or denying it as it suited their convenience. But he did not consider it was the duty of an Opposition to decide whether there was a surplus or not. He was the last person in the world to dispute

the great abilities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he could not forget that last year, in spite of all his attempts to secure a surplus, even to the extent of trenching on the revenue of the following year, there was after all a deficit. Who was to assure them there would not be a deficit again? But, however, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had a surplus it was not the part of the Opposition to deny it. He was alone responsible for his statements. From his experience in the House, which was now pretty considerable, he found that Liberal Chancellors of the Exchequer were generally troubled with two difficulties; they had always an increasing expenditure and a failing revenue. Last year the right hon. Gentleman had an enormous expenditure, but at the same time he was greatly favoured by circumstances, and yet he had a deficit. His surplus of the present year, too, was very much a matter of speculation. He was of opinion that the repeal of the paper duty would not benefit the people of this country. It was not a tax that affected the working and industrious orders of the country, and under those circumstances he should certainly oppose the clause for the repeal of the duty.

MR. LINDSAY said, it was impossible to conceive greater restrictions on trade than those imposed by the existing Act upon all paper manufacturers in the United Kingdom. They are subjected to various penalties from £100 downwards if they did not carry out the numerous and vexatious requirements of the Act, and were even bound, under a penalty of £50, to assist the excisemen in the discharge of their duties. No papermaker was allowed to establish a stationer's shop for the sale of his own manufactures within a mile of his mill, and if he did so he had to pay a penalty of similar amount. As great capital was now required for carrying on a mill, the trade had become almost a monopoly; and if the duty were repealed, he believed that the manufacture would increase 50 per cent, and that paper mills would spread all over the country, giving employment to a large portion of the rural population. That monopoly, indeed, was the reason why the paper manufacturers were not very anxious to have the existing restrictions removed. He thought that the conduct of the Opposition in objecting to the repeal was most unprecedented, and in his experience he had never known objection to be taken to a financial proposition on the ground that it did not impose a sufficient amount of taxation on the people, for that was practically the effect of the objections urged against the proposals of the Government. He had always conceived it was the duty of an Opposition rather to see the Estimates diminished in amount or kept within proper bounds. They might, perhaps, say they did not mean to increase the Estimates by £1,000,000, but to take the duty off some other article; but the House had already decided to give a preference to paper over tea. What, then, would they do with the million if it were retained? The hon. Baronet who had last spoken had said that the repeal of the paper duty would benefit only the proprietors of the cheap newspapers. What, however, were the facts of the case? Take a penny newspaper, circulating say 50,000 copies per day; the amount of benefit which the proprietors would receive from the repeal of the duty would be about £11,500 a year. But could any one suppose that the whole of that sum would go into the pockets of the proprietors? Far from it. The competition which existed, and which would then, no doubt, be increased, would have the effect of securing to the public a very much larger portion of that sum. The public would have the benefit of a better sheet of paper; and as knowledge was a marketable article, just as paper itself was, the public would have better means of obtaining information than was the case even at present. There would be a greater amount of talent employed on the cheap papers, and they would have information of greater value provided for the readers of those papers. Of the £11,500 from which a penny newspaper with a circulation of 50,000 would be relieved, not more than £3,000 would go into the pockets of the proprietors, while the public would be benefited to the amount of £8,500. They were now voting away every year a sum of nearly £1,000,000 for the education of the people, because they felt it to be a matter of necessity that the people should be educated, and because they believed that the educated man was a better workman than the uneducated. The skilled artizan would produce at a lower cost and in greater quantity than the unskilled man, and if they were able to produce at a lower price than other countries, they would have a better chance of selling the articles so produced in the different markets of the world; consequently it was to the interest of the country to educate the people. A newspaper was a great instrument of education, and many persons who would not attend mechanics' institutions or other places of public instruction were made happier and wiser by the newspapers which they read at home. It had been said in the course of the debate that the Opposition were waiting to see what would turn up. For a long time they looked hopefully to America and the East, but now they had got a windfall in the shape of the Galway contract. Who had circulated the report that the Government were disposed to continue the contract? Evidently that report had come from the Opposition. If the Government should be defeated that evening the country would understand that they were not defeated on the merits of the question, but because they did not make to certain parties concessions which they felt they ought not to make. He trusted, however, that hon. Members would look at the matter fairly and impartially, and in that case he could not but suppose that there would be a large majority on the side of Government.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, it was impossible not to admire the manner in which the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) had repudiated the imputation that negotiations had taken place between the Government and certain parties with respect to their support in that House. He was glad that the noble Lord had taken the opportunity of vindicating, not only the honour of the Government, but the honour of the House. At the same time he was not surprised that hon. Members from the sister country, when they found Ireland deprived of a great benefit, should express surprise and indignation at their representations not being entertained in the manner they expected. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in referring to the question more immediately before the House, had said that the Government came to a Resolution last year that the remission of the paper duty would be of great advantage to the country, and the noble Lord said he could not understand why that repeal should not take place. Now, he (Sir Minto Farquhar) would venture to say why the noble Lord ought to have paused before he made that statement. In the year 1858 the noble Lord, when the President of the Board of Trade brought forward his Motion with respect to the paper duty, stated that it was almost a matter of good faith, upon the next reduction of taxation taking place, that the duties on tea and sugar, which were war duties, should be reduced. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) objected to the repeal of the paper duty, on the further ground that no Excise duty once abolished could be reimposed. That was not the case with Customs' duties. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) was sorry to hear some of the noble Lord's remarks as to America, because he regretted to hear him intimate the possibility of any Englishman exulting at the present state of affairs in America. He was satisfied that there was no one on either side of the House who entertained such a feeling, and who did not ardently hope that such a frightful calamity as civil war might yet be averted from that country. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Mellor) who had opened the discussion that evening had expressed his surprise that the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth and the hon. Baronet the Member for the West Riding should oppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord at the head of the Government, for whom they expressed such great respect. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) could see no force in such an appeal. He had enjoyed the friendship of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer from his early youth. He had been with him at Eton and at Oxford, where his right hon. Friend was facile princeps in the debating society, as he was in that House. He still retained his regard for his right hon. Friend, but that was no reason why he should agree with him in his political views. For, notwithstanding all that had been said with regard to the remission of the paper duty, he had heard nothing to induce him to depart from the opinion he held, that it was impolitic at the present moment to repeal the duty; and that other duties, such as the war duties on tea and sugar and the income tax, ought to be reduced as much as possible before the question of the repeal of the paper duty was entertained. When the question of fire insurance was before the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pathetically introduced the case of the "real old woman," as he called her, to the consideration of the House, saying that there was not one of that class, living on 2s. or 3s. a week doled out by the Board of Guardians, who had not a direct interest in the reduction of the duty on tea, and he asked what she could possibly care about the reduction of fire insurances? But the question might be asked now, What did the dear old lady care about the repeal of the paper duty? If the duty on the "cup which cheers but not inebriates" were re-

pealed, then, indeed, she would care, and be thankful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for giving her cheap tea. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in 1857 when he actually made a speech which was, as it were, an anticipatory answer to that of 1861. To whom did that speech of 1857 refer? Why, it applied to his right hon. Colleague the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who then held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The inconsistencies elicited in the course of these debates were remarkable. In 1857 the Chancellor of the Exchequer denounced the income tax as a dangerous instrument in time of peace. The arrangement of 1853, by which the income tax was to come to a gradual termination, he described as a compact made, not only with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, but also, and above all, with the people of England. Neither in 1860 nor in 1861 had that compact been carried out. The right hon. Gentleman went even further than that, for he said he could not be absolved either in honour or conscience from the duty of realizing the promises and expectations that had been held out. While the Chancellor of the Exchequer was now urging the repeal of the paper duty in preference to a reduction of the war duties on tea and sugar, it was somewhat remarkable that the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary never opened his mouth on the subject. Neither the Secretary of State for the Home Department, nor the Secretary of State for India, nor the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring)—all distinguished Financial Ministers—had ever risen to support the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget. A night or two before the Budget was brought on the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson), who sat on the Ministerial side of the House, had made a most feeling appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the duty upon tea, and entered into a statement with the view of showing how such a reduction would most probably be made up by the increased consumption of the article. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman rather ignored those arguments in his reply. But what happened when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his Budget? The same hon. Gentleman said, though he was inclined to propose himself a reduction in the tea duty, he, nevertheless, could not afford to give up the Chancellor of the Exchequer and embarrass the Government at such a crisis as the present. There again was the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Moffatt), who actually impugned every figure of the right hon. Gentleman's financial statement, and he thought that the hon. Member (Mr. Moffatt) would at least have stuck to his text, but the right hon. Gentleman had replied to the hon. Gentleman at great length, and he supposed it must be assumed that he had converted the hon. Member, as he had supported the Government. He saw opposite to him another hon. Gentleman, the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne), who had last year spoken as well as voted against the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE :—No :—I abstained from voting on the Budget last year.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR : Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman spoke in eloquent terms against the policy of repealing the paper duty, condemning the measure of the right hon. Gentleman as rash, reckless, and improper. That hon. Gentleman was now to be seen supporting the measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It had been said that those who voted against the repeal of the paper duty were not the friends of mechanics' institutes and of public libraries and reading rooms. Now, on the part of the Opposition, he (Sir Minto Farquhar) repudiated those charges. They were still advocates of all such institutions, but they asserted that the repeal of those paper duties would not afford to them anything like the amount of relief supposed by hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the adjournment of this debate (Mr. Mellor) charged hon. Members sitting on the Opposition benches with being opposed to the relief of the industry of the people. But did the hon. and learned Gentleman pretend to say that the reduction of the war duties upon tea and sugar and the income tax would not afford a considerable relief to the industry of the country? He (Sir Minto Farquhar) contended that in relieving the people of those duties they would be giving the greatest, the most just, and natural impulse to all those springs of action which contributed to the happiness and prosperity of the country. He had himself presented a petition from a newspaper proprietor in the county of Hertford against the repeal of the paper duty, on the ground that it was a species of class legislation. The petitioner said that though the repeal would confer a small pecuniary benefit on himself, he, nevertheless, thought it was not worth the cost of £1,500,000 which the people would have to pay for it. His constituents had also sent up a petition stating their opinion that the reduction of the duties on tea and sugar would be a far greater benefit to them than the repeal of the paper duty. He fully concurred with them in that sentiment, and would support it by his vote. The party with whom he acted in that House had been charged with causing an unnecessary delay in the passing of this measure. The importance and peculiarity of the measure, however, demanded the most mature consideration of all its details. About a fortnight ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke strongly upon the evils arising from the delay in the passing of this measure; he said that trade was suffering, the Customs were suffering, and many great commercial arrangements were suspended in consequence of this delay. But what was the conduct of the Government on Monday night last, when it was generally understood that a division would be taken? An hon. and learned Gentleman on the Ministerial side of the House having moved the adjournment of the debate, so far from the Chancellor of the Exchequer rising up in his place and protesting against that further delay, the right hon. Gentleman countenanced it by his silence; and the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had taken two divisions against the question of adjournment a fortnight ago, actually stated on last Monday night that he saw no objection to the adjournment, as he considered the question so important that all the Members ought to have an opportunity of speaking on it. Rumours had arisen in consequence of that delay, for which it was not difficult to account. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had talked of the windfall of the Galway contract. There had been some talk, also, of a messenger from Ireland coming to his right hon. Friend the Member for Bucks. His right hon. Friend had summarily disposed of that charge by stating that he had held no communication with any person from Ireland on this subject. The President of the Board of Trade shook his head. [Mr. MILNER GIBSON : That he had had no interview with any one from Ireland.] The right hon. Gentleman was rather splitting straws in making this distinction.

He had believed his right hon. Friend in the full sense of his words, as he had given credit to the assurance of the noble Lord on the Treasury Bench. On Tuesday there appeared in one of the morning papers an article, an extract from which he would read to the House. The paper to which he referred was known to be a great admirer of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He was not surprised at this latter circumstance, for he was a great admirer of the noble Lord himself. He said that sincerely. He thought the noble Lord had an English heart, and was a distinguished statesman. Well, in reference to the adjournment on Monday night, the paper to which he alluded had the following among other observations:—

“The temptation which has for so many weeks urged the Conservatives to waste the public time has again proved too strong to be resisted. Again the debate has been adjourned. Another night has been sacrificed to satisfy their feverish desire to see what may yet turn up. The abuse of a Parliamentary privilege renders it at all times easy for a factious minority to compel an adjournment; but the public will pronounce an impartial verdict upon a line of conduct so detrimental to the material interests of the country.”

He presumed that the editor of that paper laboured under the impression that the adjournment of the debate on Monday night had been moved for by the Conservative instead of by the Ministerial side of the House. A good deal had been said on the subject of a general election, and sending hon. Members to the hustings. He, for one, was by no means afraid to face his constituents upon such a question as this, and he believed he might say the same generally of hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House. They were aware that the Conservative interest had shown increased strength during the last twelve months, and this debate would give further strength to their cause all over the kingdom. Though no man wished to be sent to his constituents too soon, he believed he spoke the sense of his hon. Friends around him when he said that they were prepared to go. He could not regard the proposition before the House as a part of a system of sound and wise legislation. He must look on it rather as the result of a political understanding. He could not think that there was a unanimous opinion in its favour on the part of the Cabinet themselves, for he could not but recollect that a few weeks ago the noble Lord at the head of the Government intimated to a deputation that there was no intention to repeal the paper duty during the year. He felt bound to give his opposition to this measure for these reasons, and further because he believed it to be antagonistic to the true interests of those whom he represented, and contrary to the feelings and wishes of the great majority of the people of England.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I am sure, Sir, that there is one point mentioned by my hon. Friend in the course of his speech in which the great majority of this House will be disposed to concur. There has been such great discussion on this article of paper—there have been such interminable debates on all that refers to it, that most of the Members of this House will join in the wish expressed by my hon. Friend to go to the country, or to go anywhere else, so as to be rid of this paper business. But, whatever may be the consequences arising from those prolonged those ever beginning and never ending discussions—I must say that I think Her Majesty's Government have no complaint to make of the course taken by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire, who will give the House an opportunity of pronouncing a direct opinion on the subject by his proposition to negative the clause for repealing the duty. After the interminable and purposeless debates which we have heard in this House, inaugurated by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) and followed up by the exhibition of a Hibernian mare's-nest, presented to us in a somewhat addled state by the hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Macdonogh), neither of whom tested the House by going to a division, it is somewhat refreshing to find that an hon. Member is about to submit an “Aye” or “No” by which the question may be fairly decided on a Parliamentary division. I was twitted by my hon. Friend who has just resumed his seat with having abstained on a former occasion from voting for a repeal of the paper duty. He has quoted certain words of mine by which I abide; and, were I about to discuss this question from a financial point of view, I would reiterate those words; but I consider that this question is taken out of the general fiscal view. What has occurred since the subject was under discussion here last year? No one can forget that this House has twice affirmed the repeal of the paper duty; and that, by what I think a somewhat great stretch of power, the House of Lords has placed us in a totally different position from that which we should otherwise have occupied. Looking at the matter in that light, I am not prepared to discuss this question, or to vote on it, upon mere fiscal grounds. I think they are the truest friends of the rights and privileges of both Houses who seize the first opportunity of putting an end to a state of things which may induce further jealousy and irritation between the two branches of the Legislature, and for that reason I would vote for a proposition calculated to effect that object. I cannot agree with the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire that this is purely a financial question. He says there is no quarrel between the two Houses. Granted. But although there be no quarrel between the two Houses, does that right hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member mean to assert that they are not laying the seeds for future differences by leaving this question completely unsettled? The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) is an able and a bold man, who would not hesitate to take the command of the Channel fleet in any difficulty; he is not afraid, but we have not all those iron nerves or that great confidence which he possesses. I think this is altogether an exceptional case. It is exceptional in a financial point of view, because it takes a place among constitutional questions which it behoves the House finally to settle. In the discussion the other night we heard a good deal about the public apathy out of doors, and the hon. Member for Dorsetshire stated that his constituents felt no interest in the subject; but I understand a great many of his constituents do take an interest in it. He was followed by a Gentleman who thought he had disposed of the question by a quotation from Macaulay as to the apathy of the public upon the question of the privileges of this House upon Money Bills. I drew a different inference from that quotation. If there be any apathy on the part of the people, the more it behoves the Members of this House to be watchful, and not to give up the privileges of control over the purse, which are the essence and cornerstone of our liberties. So much for the argument about public apathy. But an hon. Gentleman for whom, from the great carefulness he displays in collecting statistics, I entertain a great respect—argued this question from a purely Irish point of view. I refer to the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy). But I was surprised to find that in discussing the question of the repeal of the paper duties that hon. Gentleman went back to the old Budget, and attempted to prove that the reduction of the duty upon foreign butter had been fatal to the Irish agriculturists. The hon. Member may be a good judge of statistics, but I must take leave to tell him that he never made a more unfortunate mistake than when he referred to the sale of Irish butter as having deteriorated since the reduction of duty upon foreign butter, for it is notorious that among the thriving traders of the south of Ireland are to be found the dairy farmers of that country. It was evident that the hon. Gentleman, although he represents a body of dairy farmers, had very little dairy land in his own possession when he made that statement. The fact is, that since the reduction of duty upon foreign butter the prices of Irish butter have almost doubled. The hon. Gentleman, I understand, was one of the Irish vice-Presidents of the Society for the Repeal of the Taxes upon Knowledge, which, of course, included the paper duties. That seems odd, as he now vigorously opposes the repeal of the paper duties. I am surprised, too, to hear objections from the hon. Gentleman, because we know that in Ireland, notwithstanding her great advantages of water power, the erection of a paper mill is an exceptional case, while the closing of paper mills is but too common. In 1838 the number of paper mills in full operation in Ireland was 61, while in 1861 they had dwindled down to 26. Is it too much to expect that if the paper duties are repealed Ireland, with her great facilities for manufacture, and her immense water power, is above all the country that will be benefited? I have not been a member or a vice-president of the Society. I can imagine that cheap literature may combine somewhat of the cheap and nasty form. I can imagine that; but, at the same time, the great criterion of advancement and social progress is the number of publishers and booksellers in a country. Now, what is the case in Ireland? I am obliged to take 1859, as it is the latest period at which the numbers were published. I find that in Ireland there are 74 towns, with a minimum population of 7,500, under the census of 1841, without a single bookseller. Scotland, with one-third of the population, has three times the number of booksellers, being a proportion of 9 to 1. I have a list here of 74 towns without a single bookseller, which I will show to the right hon. Gentleman opposite who is about to increase his Irish connection. There is Dungarvan, Carrick-on-Suir, Youghal, Carrickfergus, Cashel, Newtonards, Lisburn, and Kinsale. There are also six counties which cannot boast of a single bookseller or circulating library. They are Donegal, Kildare, Leitrim, Queen's County, Westmeath, and Wicklow. That is for the year 1859; there may be some changes since. Let hon. Gentlemen go through Irish towns, and they will notice that the most striking fact is the absence of booksellers. Is it too much to expect that if you give an impulse to the paper trade the number of booksellers will increase? I was much struck the other night with a remarkable speech from the back benches on this side. That speech created a great impression, as might be expected, not only from its ability, but from the position of the hon. Gentleman who delivered it as Member for the West Riding (Sir John Ramsden). It has been objected to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is the keystone of the arch which connects Birmingham with Tiverton. I do not find any great slur in that, as it seems to me that those who open communications between distant and extreme portions of the country are deserving of praise rather than of blame; but of the speech to which I allude I think it may be said that it was the subterranean viaduct that connects Yorkshire with Stroud. There was a family likeness to another speech—one might almost say they were "counterfeit presentments" of two brothers—in eloquence, diction, and in sentiment. But the hon. Baronet began by making a most extraordinary blunder for one who has ever held office. He talked about a surplus as a thing actually in hand, and that the Budget was theoretical and dependent on the future. I was astonished to find the hon. Baronet talking of a speculative surplus and doubting the existence of a surplus; but whatever he thought we find him voting for taking off the tax upon tea, which would make the surplus worse by some £300,000 than the repeal of the paper duties, and he went on in an alarming strain about troubles in America and in Europe, while if he were consistent he ought to have resisted the taking off the penny from the income tax or any tax at all. He was consistent in opposing the repeal of the paper duties, but when he went on to dispute the existence of a speculative surplus he was not entitled, giving the reasons he did, to term the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the expedient of a speculator upon the Stock Exchange. I confess I have been puzzled to discover in the course of this debate what is the object of the Opposition. It really is a problem which is not yet solved. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had come down to the House and announced a deficiency, and had proposed to lay on new taxes, I could understand this ceaseless opposition. But he does no such thing. He comes to us with a surplus, which is admitted even by the right hon. Gentleman the leader on the other side. Does he propose to lay on any new tax? No, but to remit one; and yet night after night he is met by this ceaseless and untiring opposition. There must be some reason for it. My hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) disclaims any personal attack upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and twits the noble Lord the Member for London with having made use of his usual claptrap. Well, that is not confined to the noble Lord. I fully acquit my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth of entertaining any feeling but one of affection and regard for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I am sure it is with pain he is going to vote against him; but when he quoted a bit about "empty coffers" from Timon of Athens, did he recollect Timon's answer—

"I am not of that feather, to shake off

My friend when most he needs me; I do know him

A gentleman that well deserves a help."

At any rate, differing from the hon. Baronet, I feel convinced that the object of the Opposition is, if not to break up the Government as a whole, at least to weaken it in detail by ejecting from the Cabinet one whom I look upon as its very soul and life-blood. If this is not the object of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, why are these compliments paid to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, to the disadvantage of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? I trust, however, that the House and the thinking and considering people of the country will stand by the right hon. Gentleman. We have heard something of Timon of Athens; but let me turn from him to the author of the New Timon, the right hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Sir Bulwer Lytton), whose motives and conduct are as much above suspicion as his abilities are above criticism. And what is his opinion on this question of cheap literature? The right hon. Baronet was the first man who, twenty years ago, brought in a Bill to repeal the taxes on knowledge; and he has always remained of the same opinion on that question, though he has changed it on some others. In 1855 the right hon. Member said—

“The question really is between the tax-collector and the public, and it is this—whether it is not time that we should enforce that great principle of the constitution, of civil liberty, and of common sense, which says that opinion shall go free, not stunted nor sliced away by fiscal arrangements. . . . Thus much it is just to say on behalf of the working classes, to whom we are told that cheap libellous periodicals will especially appeal, that no class hitherto has so little supported newspapers of a libellous and gossiping character as the working classes of this country. I remember when certain Sunday journals profaned the Sabbath by hebdomadal ribaldry and scandal. Who supported them? I fear it was the clubs and the drawing-rooms, certainly it was not the working-class.”—[8 Hansard, cxxxvii. 1123-24.]

After that let us hear no more about the change benefiting libellous publications. I have quoted a great authority, to which the House cannot object. In the course of this discussion we have heard something of an illegitimate majority; we are told there may be such a thing as an illegitimate majority. But I can conceive no majority so illegitimate as one that, under pretence of discussing the repeal of an Excise duty, only covers a local squabble. We have heard of the Galway contract. I fully acquit the right hon. Member for Bucks of knowing anything about it. He is too independent to be bothered by Father Daly or anybody connected with it. But let me read a passage from a speech made by a distinguished supporter of the right hon. Gentleman at a public meeting, held on Saturday last, in Dublin; it is from a speech of Mr. Vance, the Member for Dublin. [“Order!”] Well, is he not Member for Dublin? He said—

“He thought it was very judicious in the meeting to tell the Irish Members that the people expected they would attend the House next Monday; and if the Government refused to rescind the determination which they seemed to have arrived at, to drive them forthwith from the helm of State. There were worthy and excellent men to succeed them, who might have their entire confidence.”

After this can we be told that the right hon. Gentleman is not looking to the Irish Members? Let the hon. Member for Dublin explain what he means by driving the present Government from the helm of State, and putting other “worthy and excellent” men in their places. I do not doubt the statement of the right hon. Member for Bucks—I believe every word of what he has stated to-night; but I do not believe that all his party are as innocent as he is himself. I yield to no one in the interest I take in the prosperity of Ireland; let this Galway contract be brought before the House on its own merits and I shall be ready to give it every consideration. It is an Irish question, and when a hundred Irish Members are united on any point whatever the English House of Commons is bound to attend to it; but do not convert an Imperial question of taxation into a mere local squabble; do not use this paper-knife merely to terminate the existence of the Government, or you will deteriorate your value as Members of the House, and put a stamp upon Ireland she neither desires nor deserves.

MR. MONSELL said, he had never heard a speech that filled him with more astonishment than that of his hon. Friend. It was the first instance in that House, he had ever heard of anyone announcing his intention to support a financial measure that he admitted was unwise and unsafe. That support rested entirely on the fact that the House of Lords rejected the measure last year after it had been passed by the House of Commons; but if, as the right hon. Member for Carlisle admitted, the House of Lords only exercised their undoubted right, in so doing, would it not be more reasonable in the House to accept the new position in which it was placed by what the other House of Parliament had done, and consider the measure simply on financial grounds, without allowing any other motives to influence its judgment? As for himself he was in no way influenced by the Galway contract or any other extraneous question—he was about to repeat the vote he had already given, but he was at a loss to understand how those who objected so strongly to other Members being influenced by the Galway contract, could themselves confess that party, as opposed to financial considerations, would govern their own votes. Though he should with great regret give his vote against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, yet he should give it on financial grounds only. Was it wise to abandon for ever such a large source of revenue, and thus prevent any future Chancellor of the Exchequer from reducing the too heavy amount of direct taxation, while if the state of Europe and the country required an increased expenditure, the amount of that taxation must be increased? He did not deny that the repeal of the Excise duty on paper would be a good thing; but they had abundance of evidence that it was not the Excise duty alone that impeded the progress of the paper manufacture. The Irish paper manufacture had been much referred to. The question was asked, "How is that paper can be made so much cheaper abroad than in this country?" to which the reply, of the one engaged in the trade, was, "Solely on account of the lower price at which foreign papermakers get their raw material." Then the difficulties of getting rags were stated, and it was evident from their whole statement that the papermakers believed the obstacle in the way of increasing their manufacture to be not the Excise duty so much as the difficulty of getting a sufficient amount of raw material. His hon. Friend talked about the spread of knowledge in Ireland being hindered by the paper duty; did he seriously believe that it was the paper duty that prevented the light of knowledge from shining on those benighted towns of which he spoke? If he did so believe he was very inconsistent in disapproving the remission of the duty last year. In point of fact, no rational man could believe that the saving of  $\frac{1}{2}d.$  on each copy of Colenzo's Arithmetic, and on other books in that proportion would cause one single new bookseller's shop to be established in Ireland or anywhere else. It was said that since 1838 the small paper mills in Ireland had very much decreased in number, but during the same period the quantity of paper manufactured in Ireland had doubled. The reason for the fact alleged was exactly that which caused small manufacturers to be driven out of any other trade—namely, because machinery had been introduced, which required a large capital to work it; and hon. Gentlemen were much mistaken if they supposed that by remitting the paper duty they would increase the number of small mills. Was that, however, the time to give up a permanent source of taxation, which it would be difficult to replace, considering both the financial condition of the country, its enormous expenditure, and the critical state of affairs abroad? The treaties which once bound the nations of Europe together had, they were told the other day by a Prince of the Imperial house of France, been cut in pieces by the sword of the Emperor of the French; and the large armaments which we should be compelled to maintain, together with the change in our arms which was now at much cost being effected, rendered it impossible at the present moment that we should largely reduce our expenditure, while if any difficulties arose abroad we should be obliged to increase it. Under these circumstances would the House purchase the repeal of the paper duty by an increased income tax? That was the real question. The real issue was direct or indirect taxation. Having a strong opinion on this question, and believing that Ireland was deeply interested in it, and would feel far more any new direct tax than the repeal of the paper duty, he only wished that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would allow the vote to be taken that evening on financial grounds only. If the noble Lord would only state that this was not a party division, and that Gentlemen would be allowed to vote as they pleased, his hon. Friend (Mr. Bernal Osborne) would then walk into the lobby with those who opposed the clause, along with about half the Members on the Ministerial side of the House. [Cries of "No!"] Hon. Gentlemen might cry "No!" but all the discussions and conversations he had heard during the last month convinced him that the repeal of the paper duty was not popular on the Ministerial side of the House, and was unpopular in the country. The country felt that the repeal of the paper duty was only a prelude to increased direct taxation. To this they objected, and he objected also; so that, though he deeply regretted opposing his right hon. Friend, he should feel bound to vote against the clause.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had given the noble Lord at the head of the Government a very sensible piece of advice in recommending him to treat the question irrespective of all party considerations; that was the only rational course to adopt when they were in Committee upon a financial question, for the moment they turned questions of the sort into party questions they violated the first duty of the House of Commons. He had been surprised at many parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard, but he was most surprised to hear him say that his object was to allay irritation. He had often listened to the speeches of the hon. Gentleman, but that was the first time he had ever heard him profess a wish to allay irritation, and whatever his wish might have been, he had not been particularly successful in the attempt. The hon. Gentleman had asked what were the objects of the Opposition in opposing this clause? Now, the Opposition was composed of various sections, who held different views on this subject, in which respect it was remarkably like the Ministerial side of the House. He was only a unit of that Opposition; but he would state very briefly the grounds on which he should give his vote. They had heard a great deal upon the question of a surplus, and its existence had been both affirmed and denied. Much had been said about the statements of the right hon. Gentleman for Buckinghamshire that there was a surplus. It was his misfortune to differ from the right hon. Gentleman on that question. He did not think a surplus could be said to exist when that alleged surplus consisted partly of money borrowed and partly of money the receipt of which was doubtful. The Chancellor of the Exchequer based his financial statement on the assumption that the House of Commons were bound to re-enact every existing tax; but he thought no Chancellor of the Exchequer was warranted in declaring the existence of a surplus when that surplus was dependent on a future decision of the House of Commons. So far from a surplus existing, there was a deficit to the amount of the whole income-tax and all the tea and sugar duties. If he wanted to argue against the Budget he could find no argument so strong, and no language so clear, convincing, and conclusive as that contained in the two celebrated speeches made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853 and 1857. The general aspect of affairs at this moment was such that no man would venture to predict what would be our actual financial position a few weeks hence. In these circumstances was it wise to re-enact the tea and sugar duties, and repeal the paper duties, which could not be re-enacted again? They had heard a great deal about the Galway contract, but he thought it would have been much better if that question had not been raised in the present discussion. He fully accepted the denial of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire that he had had any communication with any one on the subject of the Galway contract. Nay, more; though it was not always his good fortune to agree with the right hon. Gentleman, he could from his own knowledge vouch for the fact that his views with regard to the policy of repealing the paper duty were held altogether irrespective of any considerations arising from the Galway contract. He also accepted the statement made by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, and acquitted the Government of entering into any unworthy trafficking or negotiations with any Members to influence the decision of the Committee upon the question. He begged to say, without delivering any opinion on the merits or demerits of any decision which the Government might have come to with reference to the Galway contract, that if the investigation consequent on the papers being laid on the Table should lead to an abrogation of that contract he would rejoice at it, and for this reason, that it would probably be the first step towards the abrogation of all contracts of that kind, for he looked upon the whole system as one of spoliation and plunder. If they were to have the blessing of free trade, they ought to have it in postage as in everything else. Two remarkable instances had come to his knowledge which to his mind, proved that Gentlemen opposite were mistaken as to the views of the country on this question. Some time ago the hon. Member for Norwich presented a petition from that town in favour of the repeal of the paper duties, and he naturally came to the conclusion that that petition represented the opinion of the people of Norwich generally. But since that time a counter petition had been presented from Norwich, signed by 1,400 of the most influential inhabitants, of all shades of opinion, and in favour of a reduction in the tea and sugar duties. A petition had been presented from Coventry to the same effect, and showing that an earlier petition in favour of the repeal of the paper duty did not express the feeling of the people of that large town. But he would turn to what he considered the turning point of the question. He wished to appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who now seemed by his attitude to be preparing himself for the coming struggle. He would, however, do his best to attract the attention of the noble Lord. He had on two occasions asked the noble Lord whether, as Prime Minister of this country, he did not think that the occurrences in America would render it necessary for us to increase our armaments, and were likely to cause a falling off in the revenue derived from Customs and Excise?

[Second Night.

The first time he failed in obtaining a reply; but on the second occasion he received from him the marvellous answer that what was passing in America would not, in his opinion, render it necessary to increase our armaments, and that our Customs and Excise revenue was not likely to be diminished. There might at that time have been some remnant of doubt as to what turn affairs would ultimately take in the United States; but now there could be none, for a civil war was raging in that country, and was not likely to terminate till the one party bore the other down. Under these circumstances he would again put the question to the noble Lord whether he did not think that an increase of our armaments would be necessary, and that our Customs and Excise revenue was likely to suffer from the disastrous state of affairs in America? He put these questions, not out of a spirit of hostility to the Government, but because he thought they were paramount to all other considerations. At a time of great financial difficulty they were about to do away with an amount of revenue which the country could ill spare, and which could not be replaced; and they were going to inaugurate a system of taxation now advocated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but originated by the hon. Member for Birmingham.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, he would entirely confine himself to the question as it affected his constituents. The fact had been referred to in the course of debate that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire presented a petition from Coventry against the repeal of the paper duty. He (Sir Joseph Paxton) presented that evening a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of Coventry in favour of a repeal of the duty. And he had received another petition from the leading riband manufacturers of the place to the same effect, but it did not reach him in time for presentation. That petition was accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Riband Manufacturers' Association of Coventry, which stated that the manufacturers paid between £35,000 and £40,000 a year for paper, the duty on which amounted to nearly £10,000. He claimed the vote of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire on this occasion, because that hon. Gentleman said he would vote for the repeal of the paper duty if he thought it would give relief to the distressed riband maker of Coventry. Within the last four years there had grown up a practice of packing ribands in a new way. A yard of paper was placed between every yard of riband, with a view of showing the article to advantage. This practice was introduced by the French, and the manufacturers of Coventry were obliged to bring their ribands to market in the same style, and they had to contend against a tax in the shape of paper duty, while the foreign articles—riband and paper included—were admitted free of duty. It was said that they got a drawback. He held in his hand a piece of cardboard which paid duty, but on which, as soon as it was converted into what was called the Jacquard card, a drawback was allowed. But that was not the case with regard to the paper used for blocking riband. He knew one manufacturer in Coventry who paid £400 on account of this duty, and in the present state of the riband trade could it be said that that was not a heavy burden? He hoped that fact would have some effect on hon. Gentlemen opposite. A great deal of extraneous matter had been introduced into the debate. The hon. Member for Radnorshire had said that the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a sop given to the most unpopular party in that House. He could only say that if those who contributed to the repeal of the corn laws and to the removal of taxes upon industry were an unpopular party, he was anxious to belong to it.

MR. COBDEN: Mr. Massey, it has not been my good or ill fortune to have been present in the House for six weeks during which this complicated question has been discussed; I, therefore, do not know exactly what has already been said, and I am fearful that in what I may say I shall probably only be repeating what has been better stated before. I will be very brief, therefore, in what I do state. I should not have spoken at all, but that I am anxious to make one word of allusion to a subject in which I have been myself concerned. Now, Sir, I will treat this question as it appears before us, without importing any extraneous matter. The proposal is, that we repeal the paper duty. I thought the question of substituting tea and sugar for paper had been disposed of. I thought the question whether or not we have a surplus had been settled. But whether or not, for my part, I am willing to take paper from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as he proposes, and when he professes to have a surplus, I leave him responsible for his calculations for the future. Now, Sir, it is something new in our Parliamentary proceedings to see a party united, persevering, constant in their resistance to the repeal of a tax. I have seen—nobody has seen more than I have—that we can have parties united to maintain what are called protective duties—that is, duties not laid on for the purpose of revenue, but for the protection of a native industry. That I can understand as being a good basis for a party, and a party who had that cause in hand fought long and boldly for it, though they were beaten in the end. But I never before met, in all my Parliamentary experience, with a party who has taken its stand in opposition to a Chancellor of the Exchequer to prevent the remission of any tax. But we have now a systematic opposition to the repeal of this duty—a party banded together for the purpose—and in whose interest? And who are the parties outside of this House who oppose the repeal of the paper duty? We cannot disguise from ourselves that they are the large paper manufacturers, and the large paper printers. These are the parties who have originated the movement. It is not a new thing—it is not unnatural. I have seen something of the kind before. The very earliest public movement with which I was connected nearly thirty years ago was accompanied with the same thing. I recollect that a deputation came up to London on the subject of the repeal of the Excise duty on printed cottons. They saw Lord Althorp, then Chancellor of the Exchequer—a shrewd, sensible man, as we all know—and I remember quite well that in the course of their conversation the remark was made that, although all the young calico printers and many of the most respectable among the old firms were in favour of the repeal of the duty, the greatest house in the trade was opposed to the repeal of the tax. Lord Althorp, with that instinctive sagacity for which he was remarkable, instantly replied that he had never heard so strong an argument in favour of the repeal of the tax, for it was quite evident that if any cotton printers were interested in keeping the tax on, it could not be for the public interest. And what are the grounds on which these parties—who are not cotton printers, and not, as our opponents then were, harmless individuals in their strength—who have power, who use a mighty instrument, who are organs of public opinion in this country to which many of us have succumbed in times past, and to which too many of us are ready to succumb now? What are the grounds on which these parties justify their resistance to the repeal of this tax? Last year the whole of Europe resounded with their cry for free rags, simply because they wished to make a party war out of paper. I was at the time on the Continent, and it seemed as if the Chancelleries of almost all the embassies in Europe were ringing with this question of rags, simply because one notorious print that wished to make a party question of rags, sounded the alarm that we had been defrauded in the treaty with France, because she would not allow the exportation of rags duty free. I may say in passing—and it is all I have to say on the subject—that, so far as regards the French Government in its dealing with this question of rags, it acted towards me not merely with perfect good faith—for that is a small compliment to pay any Government—but it showed an enlightened appreciation of the business it had on hand, and it took especial precaution that there should be no misunderstanding upon the subject of rags. The French Government, as we all know, had a prohibition on the exportation of rags, but we know also that other countries on the Continent—such as Belgium and the Zollverein—had a prohibition against their exportation as well. The French Government contemplated, after completing the treaty with us, making treaties with Belgium and other countries on the Continent, and they wished to retain in their hands the power of making concessions on the question of rags to those other countries from whom they might in return ask for a certain reciprocity. If they had allowed exportation to those countries without stipulating for reciprocity from other countries it must be evident that they would at once have parted with their power of preventing their rags finding their way into those countries. Exportation differs from importation in this—you may give one nation an advantage in importing goods, but when once you allow of the exportation of goods you cannot prevent their free circulation into other countries. The French Government, therefore, with my full consent, retained that question of the exportation of rags in their hands. The House may remember, if it is worth while to go back to them, what a volley of foul imputations was poured on the Emperor of the French and on his Government, what unscrupulous charges of having imposed upon me in this matter of rags. That is the spirit in which this matter was resisted, and let it be a warning to hon. Gentlemen opposite how they touch this question, and how they deal with these parties. How is it that at this moment you hear very little of that question? It is because the cry, the falsehood, has been extinguished by subsequent knowledge of the truth. But, leaving this question of the treaty, to which I am not going to refer further, how does the question of rags really affect the matter in dispute? Have the papermakers any more right to claim protection for paper because other countries have the advantage in rags than you had to claim protection for your corn because other countries had an advantage in the production of that article? Nothing is more certain than that we adopted it as an inflexible principle that we would never regard the cost of the production of any article, and that we claimed the right of importing all productions, and the cheaper they were produced the more we insisted on it. When you claimed exemption from that principle—I am speaking now to the landed interest, which appears to have allied itself with the opponents of this remission—when you claimed protection against the importation of Russian corn, because you said you could not compete with Russia, where corn was produced by the labour of serfs fed on black bread—and protection against corn from America, where land could be bought in fee simple for 6s. an acre, whereas the English farmer had to pay 20s. an acre for rent—these very parties, who set up a claim for protection upon paper, laughed you to scorn, and denied you the protection you then sought. The case of sugar is still stronger, because when we claimed the admission of foreign sugar there was the strongest argument that could be found in favour of protection to colonial sugar. The planters said they were obliged to raise it by free labour, whereas their opponents raised it by slave labour, and not only had they no slaves, but it was made felony to buy a slave. Still we disregarded these arguments, and we admitted foreign sugar on a perfect equality with colonial sugar. All these things must be well remembered, particularly by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were then refused the protection they sought in their own case. What is the ground on which this paper duty is to be made an exception to all other Excise duties? Is it a novelty that we are now coming to ask for the repeal of the Excise on paper? By the way in which my right hon. Friend

the Chancellor of the Exchequer is attacked one would think that this is some novelty suggested entirely by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, that the right hon. Gentleman had taken his inspiration from him alone, and that the matter had never been heard of twelve months ago. Why, it is one of the oldest questions we have had before us. I turn to the Financial Reform volume by Sir Henry Parnell, dated 1831, and I find that on this subject he says—

“Contrary to every sound principle of trade the manufacturers of paper, glass, and printed calicoes have been selected as subjects of taxation. . . . The duty on paper has an injurious effect on many other trades besides that of the papermaker. The limited consumption which it occasions injures the makers of machinery, type-founders, inkmakers, printers, engravers, booksellers, bookbinders, stationers, paperstainers, and several other trades. But the greatest evil of all is the high price of books which it gives rise to. By this a great obstacle is thrown in the way of the progress of knowledge, of useful and necessary arts, and of sober and industrious habits. By the use of books the productions of the human mind are carried over the whole world, and they may be truly called the raw materials of every kind of science and art, and of all social improvement.”

I do not know that anything has been said on the subject of paper which could much enlarge on the language of that Report, written by Sir Henry Parnell thirty years ago. That was in 1831, when my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had not yet reached man's estate. Recollect that during those thirty years every other Excise tax, not including alcoholic and fermented liquors and hops, has been abolished. [An hon. MEMBER: Malt?] I ally malt with alcoholic and fermented liquors. You have abolished the duty on soap, on printed cottons, on glass, on leather, and every other article, and now, when paper comes the very last, which Sir Henry Parnell put the first, you ask, “Who wants the repeal of the paper duty?” For ten years to my knowledge there has been a society in existence for effecting the repeal of the paper duty. I, who highly approve that mode of carrying reforms in this country which enables us, by resorting to public opinion, to publications, and to public meetings to carry reforms, instead of descending into the streets to fight for them, have long been a member of that association. I have been a member of this association from the first—I believe it was formed in 1849—and yet it is said, who has asked for a repeal of the paper duty?

Then we are told that the repeal of the paper duty will do no good, and that it yields a small amount of revenue. The same argument might have been used against the repeal of the duties on glass, bricks, butter, and other things. They were all items much smaller than this. They have been removed one by one—not more than one in a year, and that year forming an epoch in our finance. Yet, from the successive removals of these restrictions on industry has proceeded that state of content and quietness which the hon. Gentlemen opposite are constantly vaunting as proofs of the Conservatism of the age. I am old enough to remember when the streets of London were periodically crowded with multitudinous and violent men calling out for some impracticable measures of reform, nearly allied to revolution. I remember that every three or four years we were liable to have the North of England thrown into a state of confusion bordering upon anarchy, from the possible failure of a harvest or of a market for our industry. But, as we have expanded those markets, as we have removed restrictions, as we have given further development to capital and more employment for labour in all our various manufactures, we have placed ourselves, humanly speaking, in that position in which it is scarcely possible to believe in any great calamity happening to this country from any particular quarter, without finding it compensated by the prosperity and advantages which we enjoy elsewhere. Well, then, is it a hard, is it a difficult thing to govern a people who ask only to be allowed to work? They are contented if you allow them to labour and to earn moderate wages. Do not tell me that the people have not clamoured for these reforms. We are here because we are assumed to know better than they. That is our only title to be here. And with this long experience can any one doubt that the true policy is to proceed in the path which has been marked by such a career of advantage and prosperity? It is attempted to frighten us by saying that there are some impending calamities overhanging us from the Western hemisphere. There is a danger—the only danger which can menace this country, for I can conceive no other danger of a great calamity or catastrophe but that which may arise from a short supply of the raw material of our industry. From everything else we guard ourselves by the number of our markets and the variety of our resources. A catastrophe may come from such a source. I hope it will not be so bad as some hon. Gentlemen surmise. But, admitting the worst—admitting that danger—what can we do better under the circumstances than follow the path pointed out by experience, and by removing the shackles from industry give a better chance of finding employment for the people? We have been told that instead of taking the duty from paper we ought to take it from tea or sugar. I have no objection to either or to both. I can even hope that with the average prosperity which we have seen for the last few years we may in another year greatly diminish the duty on tea and on sugar. But I am not sure that the argument made use of with considerable stress by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) with regard to a market for our manufactures in China is well founded. We were greatly disappointed with what was called the opening up the trade with China in 1840. I think that within four years we had a Committee of this House sitting to inquire into the subject, and here, in passing, I may say that I have no faith whatever in what is called opening up China to Englishmen. From what I hear of China, the Chinese merchants are quite as clever as our own. They have superseded the English merchants at Singapore; they have the whole trade with San Francisco, and I believe that if trade is opened with the interior of China it will be by Chinese and not by Englishmen. But, at all events, I shall be very happy to see a reduction of the tea duty, though it may not be with the same certainty of an expansion of trade which may be procured by the repeal of the tax on paper. Have hon. Gentlemen considered what is to be the end of the present struggle. I fancy I see hon. Gentlemen opposite arraying themselves very much in the same way they did some sixteen or eighteen years ago, opposed very much to the same people and the same influences, and likely to be landed in a very similar disaster. What are you aiming at? You are aiming at preventing the Chancellor of the Exchequer from continuing in a course which he has not the merit of originating. I cannot give him the credit for the least originality. Nor can he be accused of precipitation. He is only going in the path which every Government must follow, whether it be called Whig or Tory. Is it for the advantage of hon. Gentlemen opposite that they should place

themselves in this position? If you succeed by a majority in overturning the Government and coming in yourselves you must instantly adopt the very policy which you are opposing in opposition. There is no alternative. The principle rooted in the public mind of England is to remove those barriers which impede the progress of commerce and manufacture, so as to give the chance of employment for a growing and an increasing population. You yourselves have the greatest interest in promoting that policy, and in nothing more than the repeal of the paper duty, by which you offer the advantage of employment to a class superior to those affected by any other article subject to the Excise duty, for bear in mind that there is no article which gives employment to the same educated class of men as paper. If I were a young man, just fresh from college, with nothing in the world but a good education, there is nothing I should look for with so much interest as making perfectly free the press of this country, by removing all the taxes which tend to render dear and scarce literary productions. What should I want? I should want employment for my pen. Is it not an advantage to rising educated young men that more editors, more contributors, more shorthand writers should be required? ["Oh, oh!"] Do not treat this as a light matter. I am not going to offer a menace to hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am the last man who would hope to influence them through their fears. But do not shut your eyes to the fact, and let it be an element in the calculation of success in the course you are pursuing—do not shut your eyes to the fact, that all the cheap and rising and growing literature of the country is in favour of the removal of this duty. You have nearly 300,000 daily papers at a penny issuing from the press, and almost every one of them is advocating the removal of these duties. Fortunately, their interest is the public interest, and, therefore, I am very happy to find them advocating the removal of this duty. You have 70,000 or 80,000 dear papers issuing daily, and generally they are silent, or they are trying surreptitiously or openly to prevent the repeal of this duty. But can you doubt, if it comes to a struggle, to a dissolution, to a change of Government, that these 300,000 papers, with a multitude almost innumerable of weekly papers at a penny, will every one be opposed to those who are opposed to the emancipation of the press? I am sorry to say it is not a question which can be argued at length upon its merits as a fiscal question. The minds of hon. Members are straying to other subjects. This is made a political question. I cannot go into the lobbies and I cannot stand here without seeing that it is made a political question. I ask, then, hon. Members opposite, to take that view of it, and I say that the course they are pursuing cannot possibly lead to a successful issue. I have been so little in this House of late that I do not pretend to enter upon the question of the rival strength of parties. I may say, honestly, I like to see an Opposition which has some principles belonging to it, which may make it eligible for the country to resort to it, if it has occasion to seek better measures by a change of Government. At whose instigation this course is being pursued I know not. It cannot be that the wise heads of that party are the instigators of it. But I tell them candidly they cannot give the country the benefit of their services even if they succeed in overthrowing the Government. I can see no benefit to them, but a long and protracted controversy without any issue—controversy such as that we are wasting the hours upon at this time of night. I say I cannot see that the course the Opposition is pursuing can possibly advantage them or injure the Government, and therefore I entreat hon. Gentlemen opposite to let this question pass. Let us have this Budget settled. Let hon. Gentlemen then consider how they can adopt a course of policy which can give them the opportunity of holding out to the country the prospect of better measures than those which the present Administration can give, and then with their great numbers, if they do come into power, they may come in without the certainty of being obliged to falsify their own principles or to be turned out of office. I am not going to trouble the Committee at any greater length. I am not sufficiently conversant with your recent debates to do so. But I thought it my duty to state my views in this plain manner, and I sincerely hope hon. Gentlemen opposite will allow this Budget to pass, and allow us to proceed with other business of a practical character.

MR. T. BARING: Sir, I am sure I am only expressing the opinion of the Committee when I express my own gratification at the return of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down to his place among us, for we always welcome ability, however much we may differ as to the subjects on which it is applied. At the same time I cannot help thinking that the hon. Gentleman gave strong evidence of the length of his absence from this country when he described the opposition to the repeal of the paper duty as consisting of only a few monopolists, and asserted that there was no feeling at all on the subject throughout the country. Let me tell him that the opinion of the country is that, if it be in our power to remove any tax, this is not the moment for the removal of the paper duty. I believe that if he were to poll the country, aye, and this House too, apart from party considerations, he would find the almost universal opinion to be that any diminution of taxation which the Government can afford may be applied with far more benefit to the national interests, with far greater relief to the consumers, and with a far stronger stimulus to industry, than by the repeal of the paper tax. The hon. Gentleman professes to be astonished that a party should take its stand on the opposition to a repeal of taxation. I would agree with him if we were certain that we were able to do without the tax, and that its removal would benefit the people in the greatest degree. But, in the first place, we on this side do not feel quite sure that you can with benefit remove this tax, because we know that, if once removed, it can never be re-imposed. No man is gifted with omniscient sagacity, and if by any misfortune there should be an error in the calculation of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—if the revenue should fall short or the expenditure exceed his Estimate, we know that you cannot revive the paper tax. We know also full well that there is an elastic tax—the income tax—which will be employed to meet any deficit. Again, we oppose the immediate removal of this tax because there are other duties, to the reduction of which the House at large, and the right hon. Gentleman especially, is pledged—I mean the war taxes on those articles which enter into the consumption of the people. I recollect that the financial reform sketched out by the hon. Member for Birmingham a year and a half ago comprised the reduction of taxation on the consumption of the labouring classes, the reduction of the duties on tea, sugar, and tobacco; but I think he made no mention whatever of paper. The removal of the paper duty will not stimulate industry nearly so much as the reduction of the duties on those articles which we receive from other countries. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cobden) made an observation in regard to the prohibitive duty on the export of rags from France which ought not to pass unnoticed. I quite agree with him that the French Government acted with the greatest good faith, and we have now his own admission that it was with his assent and approbation, and almost on his suggestion, that they refused to make any change in regard to that duty. I have always thought that our Government might have made better terms in that respect, but this is the first time that we have heard, on official authority, that the French Government acted in this matter with the assent of our representative who was charged with the whole of the negotiations. The hon. Gentleman maintains the principle that we ought to receive a commodity from the country which can produce it most cheaply. That is true; but we must remember that on the occasion in question we went on the principle of a treaty, and were bound accordingly to get as much advantage for ourselves as we could in return for our concessions. The hon. Gentleman says he will not appeal to our fears, but he reminds the Committee that there is a branch of the press which is continually extending throughout the country, and which will resent the continuance of the duty, and urges us to conciliate them by removing it. That is just the argument which we have been using against the repeal. We object to it, because it will benefit a class, and not the community at large. I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman that the House ought to accept the Estimates of revenue and surplus from the Chancellor of the Exchequer without examination or discussion. I hold that it is the duty of the House to scrutinize them carefully, and subject them to every test which doubt or criticism can suggest. I hope, with the hon. Gentleman, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is sure of his surplus. I am no prophet to tell what will be the revenue of the next year. The right hon. Gentleman, however, may have underestimated some of the items of revenue—probably he has under-estimated some of the items of expenditure as well. There are two items which have sprung up since the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman. There is the increased interest on Exchequer Bills, which has already led to an addition of about £50,000 on the year.

[Second Night.

MR. T. BARING: It may be so in the meantime; but the right hon. Gentleman must be gifted with second-sight to tell what will be the state of the money-market at the end of that period. Then there is another item of expenditure in the payment on account of the Stade Dues, which public report fixes at about £200,000. Adding that to the £25,000 for six months' interest on the Exchequer Bills and it would make a deduction of £225,000 out of the surplus of £430,000. Similar items of expenditure are always liable to spring up, and if we abolish this duty we shall be able to meet them only by falling back on direct taxation. The noble Lord the Member for the City said that he could not understand how we should object to the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer without proposing a vote of censure upon them. When I objected to the Budget without moving an Amendment, I did so because I wished the House to reflect upon the course it was called on to pursue. I believed that the proposals were unpopular, and that representations would be made to the Government which would lead them to reconsider, and perhaps to modify, their scheme. As I anticipated, there is throughout the country a feeling that it would not be wise to repeal this tax at the present time. I, for one, am anxious that a sufficient surplus should be maintained to meet every possible exigency. I do not hold myself at all bound to the proposal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bucks, to make a further reduction of taxation, if this measure be rejected. Any further reduction of taxation must be regulated by existing circumstances, and from day to day there seems to me to be greater uncertainty as to the future, and greater change in those circumstances which ought to guide this House in its financial measures. It is, consequently, more and more incumbent upon the Government, on its own responsibility, to maintain such a surplus revenue as may guard us from any future difficulty, and to preserve at once the faith of the country and its influence in the world, at a moment when the influence of England is becoming more and more important.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Committee has just heard delivered the opinions of two hon. Gentlemen among the most distinguished and able of its Members, and men whose high characters are not less remarkable than their abilities. One of them is the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), the other is my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden). The latter recommends the repeal of the paper duties as a measure which is wise, politic, and acceptable to the country; the former recommends the rejection of that measure as being neither wise, nor politic, nor acceptable to the people. Under these circumstances it is natural to examine into the comparative authority of these two hon. Gentlemen, and to seek for the sources of that authority by a recurrence to the advice which respectively they have given on previous occasions. In the hon. Member for Rochdale we see the man who, more than any other, living or dead, contributed to the destruction of the Corn Laws; the man who eloquently advocated the repeal of the Navigation Laws; and the man who, on every point, in a struggle of twenty years has taken the most active and powerful part in recommending that legislation which has not only augmented the wealth of the country, but done more for its Conservative principles than all the measures promoted by hon. Gentlemen opposite. On the other hand, the hon. Member for Huntingdon opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws as a national calamity, bewailed the repeal of the Navigation Laws as probably involving the ruin of the country, and upon every—or nearly every—occasion when it has been proposed to amend our commercial laws, and to relax the existing restrictions of our system, has been found among the stoutest and most ardent defenders of those restrictions. I say, then, that upon this occasion also the man who has always heretofore interpreted rightly both the wishes and the interests of his country is more likely to give sound advice than the man who throughout the whole of his past life has misunderstood both the one and the other. The Committee, I know, must be wearied with hearing the discussion of the paper duties, and it is with an unfeigned reluctance that I present myself to them on the present occasion. I trust, however, that I may be allowed to occupy some small portion of their time, because, whatever may be said as to others—whatever senses or constructions may for others be put upon this discussion—at all events there is one man in the House for whom it can bear but one construction, and that is the person who now respectfully entreats your attention. The hon. Baronet the Member for Radnorshire (Sir John Walsh) made some remarks which will lead me to the point on which I wish to address the Committee, for I want to attain, if I can, to a true conception of the position of both parties upon this subject. My hon. Friend declared—and he declared with perfect sincerity—that the Opposition had no greater desire than to give their support to Her Majesty's Government. He stated that nothing but an absolute necessity has brought them on this occasion upon the field of battle, and that it was the excessive and wilful unreasonableness of the Government in making so strange a proposal as the repeal of the paper duties which really left to hon. Gentlemen opposite, however pacific might be their inclinations, no choice whatever, but compelled them to step in for the purpose of restraining us in our rash and furious career. Here, according to him, is the secret and explanation of the present party conflict. Is that really a fair and a just statement? We have heard a variety of opinions expressed in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, nevertheless, concur in their votes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) frankly admits that an Excise duty is a bad duty, and that he retains the opinion on that subject which he has expressed on previous occasions; but the tendency of the minds of many hon. Gentlemen opposite is explained much more accurately by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) who, in a very ingenious and candid speech, went back to the legislation of 1842 and 1844, ridiculed the argument of Sir Robert Peel upon the glass duty, and contended that the present progress of the country neither was nor could have been owing to free trade legislation, but was due to a set of causes entirely different. I have no argument to address to the noble Lord. Upon his standing ground it appears to me that he is entirely unapproachable by us; but I speak in a Parliament where the opinion opposed to his is no longer regarded as matter of opinion, but as an established fact, resting on the solid proof of a happy experience, and where we are entitled not to argue for, but to argue from, the proposition that the relaxation of commercial restrictions and the liberation of trade are the true and wise policy for this country to pursue. Is there anything so strange, then, in the production by the Government of the proposal to repeal the Paper Duties? In the first place, it is strictly true, with exceptions so insignificant that I need not refer to them, that except as to the constituents of strong liquors, which by the necessary principles of your fiscal system are and must continue to be heavily burdened, the trade in paper is the one single trade within the limits of this country which at the present moment is in all its branches burdened, and in many of its branches actually proscribed. Every other restriction is gone. Every other Excise, one after another, has been sacrificed. Was that because there was a call for it from the people? No such thing. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: Hear, hear!] I hear a voice well known to me—Sæpe sinistra cavâ prædixit ab illic cornix. The hon. Member cheers a truth, when he cheers the assertion that Excise duties have never been removed in obedience to calls from the people. I have had the curiosity to look back to the case of the glass duties. I believe the whole number of petitions for the repeal of the glass duties in three years, including 1845, the year of the repeal, was one. For the repeal of the brick duties there may have been six or eight petitions. For the repeal of the soap duties there was not a single petition before the proposal was made by the Government, and even then the number was very insignificant. The paper duty is the only Excise duty for the repeal of which there has been a constant demand from the country, and that demand has been supported by many Members of Parliament. Hon. Members of Parliament not belonging exclusively to this side of the House have thought fit to join an association for promoting the repeal of the paper duties. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), for whose vote the country will look with interest to-night, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Herts (Sir Bulwer Lytton), whose vote upon a former occasion was given in the manner that we expected from what we knew of him, are members of an association for the repeal of the paper duties. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks is not himself, as far as I know, a member of any such association. He has probably acted upon the principle to which I have always adhered, and, without censuring others, has declined to be a member of any association outside the doors of this House for Parliamentary purposes. But the object has received the most distinct, conspicuous, and emphatic support from the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman voted for the repeal of the paper

duties in 1850, when the duty on tea was at 2s. 2d. per lb. What did the right hon. Gentleman do in 1858? I am afraid I cannot approach this part of the subject without coming to a point on which I differ from my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, because in my opinion all abstract Resolutions on the subject of the extinction of taxes are imprudent and unwise. My right hon. Friend thought differently, and he moved a resolution condemning the paper duty, selecting it from all other duties, and making no reservation in favour of tea. By his Resolution he pledged the House to the proposition that the paper duty should not be permanently maintained, and that distinction was conferred upon the paper duty alone. There was one Gentleman more responsible for that Resolution than my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend moved it as a private Member of Parliament; the right hon. Gentleman accepted it as the organ of a Government. I confess that, as it appears to me, he did an imprudent act in acceding to that Resolution; but I confess, also, that it seems to me that having acceded to it he would have done better to avoid the temptation which has since been put in his path to endeavour to explain it away. ["Oh, oh!"] Why, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has since told us that that was a hesitating Resolution, passed in a languid House; and it was, according to him, a Resolution that meant that, at some future time or other—probably in the days of our children or grandchildren, but at all events, when the war duties upon tea and sugar, as they are called—and I will say, a word upon that subject by and by—had been disposed of, and the income tax was extinguished, then forsooth, we might proceed to repeal the paper duty. But does the right hon. Gentleman think that he, as the organ of the Government, was right in advising the House to give that pledge in the face of the country, and does he think that he is using weapons which are either safe or honourable when the House of Commons is encouraged, in order to avoid some momentary difficulty or to obtain some momentary favour, to hold out promises of that kind which are to be explained—I repeat the term—which are to be explained away in order to meet the prudential considerations which the exigencies of party may subsequently suggest?

The right hon. Gentleman has to-night set up a doctrine which as far as I know

is entirely new. These are the main proportions of the statements he has made. In the first place I must say that, differing in this respect very much from some hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from that side of the House, he has stated the issue with perfect fairness. He made a comparison between an Excise and a Customs duty, and he said, "I admit at once that we are not to look to the mere question to what extent a reduction is to be effected in the price of some article of subsistence, but we are to look to the effect of our measures upon the general trade, industry, and employment of the country." With respect to that I will only say that I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the principle, but I believe it to be impossible for any candid man, after any examination, however cursory, of the facts of this case, to maintain that the removal of some 3d., which is the utmost that could be taken off the duty upon tea, would have anything like the effect upon the industry of the country, that we must in common prudence anticipate from the abolition of the duty on paper. What is the effect of a Customs duty? The effect of a Customs duty is by burdening the article to which it applies to limit the consumption. The effect of an Excise duty so far considered is the same, but over and above that effect an Excise has a serious influence through the medium of its restrictive regulations and the indirect cost which it entails, which amounts not merely to a burden but, in many instances, to an absolute prohibition. What was it that, in the year 1830, caused Sir Henry Parnell to designate this paper duty first among those that called for repeal? That was not the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and every authority from that time to this has concurred in that judgment. The facts of the case as they concern the effect of the paper duty are these. You are not simply to consider what is the incidence of the duty upon the paper that is made in this country, so far I grant that there is a certain parallelism between that duty and the tea duty—what you must consider is, what are the trades or branches of trade which are positively prevented or extinguished by the operation of the paper duty. Were this the time for details it would not be difficult to state many such trades to the House. On a former occasion my noble Friend mentioned one instance and I mentioned another—and they might be greatly multiplied—of a trade in paper, that is to say in sheets made of fibrous materials, that is actually rendered impossible, or all but impossible, in many cases quite impossible, by the operation of the paper duty. The right hon. Gentleman, feeling the pressure of the argument, resorted to a doctrine which I believe to be entirely novel, which I grant to be ingenious, and which I admit would have been entitled to influence our decision if it had been true, by true, of course I mean accurate. He said that the tea and sugar duties are war duties, and that Parliament is under a pledge to remove them. “Let us, therefore,” continued the right hon. Gentleman, “let us above and before all things keep faith with the nation.” Now, Sir, I am glad to get the issue between us in some degree narrowed. If the first part of this statement can be proved, I do not contest the latter portion of it. I say “by all means let us keep faith with the nation.” But is it true that these are war duties? In what sense are they war duties? Were they imposed in time of war? No. Were they imposed for the purposes of war? No. When were they imposed? They were imposed in time of peace and not for purposes of war. [Murmurs of disapproval on the Opposition benches.] I do not in the least complain of those murmurs. My desire is to convey information, because I am sure that hon. Gentlemen, although they seem to muster as if for a party struggle, are really actuated much more by a love of truth and a desire to understand the facts of the case of a great many of which I do not think that they can possibly be aware. I want to know what is the meaning of a war duty. I do not now ask whether this expression has prevailed as a cant phrase, or has been adopted as a convenient one. I do not know who is the author of it. I cannot tell whether or not it has ever passed my lips. I am not finding fault with the phrase, because I can understand that if you treat it as a popular designation it is so far true that the duties with which tea and sugar are now burdened are higher than those which were proposed before the Russian war. But that does not make them war duties. Is the present income tax a war income tax? The present income tax was imposed in 1859. Is there, then, any pledge connected with the Russian war to reduce the income tax? I do not speak of any time that is gone by. I speak of the tax upon incomes imposed in 1859, and

I say that you may, if you choose, popularly call that a war income tax, because it is higher than the income tax as it was originally proposed, when we had an expenditure of £52,000,000 or £53,000,000 to provide for; but I say that it would be ludicrous to call it a war income tax in the sense of founding upon that term an engagement—because that was what was done by the right hon. Gentleman—an engagement to reduce that tax as if it had been an income tax laid for the purposes of war. If there is no such engagement, the whole argument of the right hon. Gentleman falls to the ground. What I say of the tea and sugar duties is this. In the first place, however, I must complain of the unfairness which is practised upon this subject. Again and again we are told how wrong it is—and an endeavour is made to delude the public upon this subject; again and again the people have been told that it is absurd to repeal the paper duty instead of repealing the war, tea, and sugar duties. [“Hear, hear.”] The noble Lord the Member for Staffordshire (Lord Robert Cecil) considers that a fair statement of the case, does he? Now that is exactly the point to which I want to bring the Committee. The noble Lord says that, instead of repealing the paper duty, we ought to repeal the war, tea and sugar duties, the repeal of the paper duty entailing a loss this year of £600,000, and ultimately of £1,250,000, while the abolition of the war duties upon tea and sugar would cause a loss of £2,500,000. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: No, no.] The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich denies that statement. I beg leave to say that, speaking in round numbers, I have stated accurately what would have been the cost for the year of repealing what are called the war duties upon tea and sugar, and I do not think that it can be denied that it is grossly unfair to represent the repeal of the paper duty to the public as if it prevented the repeal of another duty which would cost more than twice the money. [Sir John Pakington was understood to say that no proposal had been made for the sacrifice of so large an amount of revenue.] I am stating that this is the way in which the subject has been repeatedly handled in speeches, and the way in which it is constantly represented to the public. I have in my hand the last and most authentic instance of this unfairness. You say that the people are entirely in favour of your policy and you challenge a reference to the people. We have had an election within the last few days—[interruption—we have had an election within the last few days, and the issue raised by that election was a very definite one, because a most respectable, most competent, and well-qualified gentleman made his appeal to the constituents, whose suffrages he solicited entirely upon the ground of opposition to the financial measures of the Government. Here is his address, and in it a mode of statement is adopted which I have no doubt was suggested from headquarters. In the most authentic manner, as if he had undergone a regular training through a course of these debates, he runs through the old points of the surplus, the state of the national finances, and the comfort of the labouring classes, and he then says—

“The permanent sacrifice of £1,500,000 of paper duty seems to be imprudent at present, and the consequent maintenance of the war duties upon tea and sugar—those necessary articles of consumption in every home—appears unjust.”

I merely state, and I confess that I did not expect that there would have been so much disposition to question that statement, that it is an unfair mode of putting the case to place against the repeal of the paper duty, and to declare to be the alternative of that repeal, a measure which would cost at least twice as much. Now the case of the tea and sugar duties to which I return is this:—They cannot, properly speaking, be called war duties, inasmuch as they were not imposed in time of war or for war purposes. In the year 1854 the sugar duties were increased for the purposes of war, and in 1855 the tea duties were increased with the same object, and I am quite willing to admit that the right hon. Gentleman says truly when he contends that there is a sort of general pledge given to the public that war taxes should be taken off when the cause for which they have been levied has ceased to exist, and, in point of fact, the increased duties which I have just mentioned lapsed with the conclusion of the war itself. I was, I may add, one of those who differed with the Government of my noble Friend near me when they first proposed to prolong these duties for twelve months; but that was not the time when the question was settled. It was in the month of August, 1857, that my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department proposed to re-enact the tea-duties at 1s. 5d. for three years, without the slightest reference to the purposes of war, and, I believe, without one syllable being said by him as to the lapse of the duty or its removal at the expiration of that period. I myself, who have been so much misquoted on this question, recognizing the proposition of my right hon. Friend as being rendered necessary by the increased scale of our peace expenditure and by the special demands of that particular time, thanked him for the provision which he had made. I refer to these matters to show that the proposal of my right hon. Friend had no bearing whatever on war duties in any sense of the word, and that, in point of fact, the doctrine of engagement laid down by the right hon. Gentleman opposite on the subject as being applicable to the tea and sugar duties is a pure and perfect figment, not having a shadow of support. In short, I feel I am perfectly right in asserting—and my right hon. Friend near me can correct me if I am wrong—that these duties, when enacted in 1857, were imposed without any expectation being held out as to the course Parliament would take at the expiration of three years, for which they were granted. Well, that being so, it became my duty to lay before the House the case as it had come under the consideration of the Government as to the respective claims of two very important taxes to remission, the one being the extra, or I may as well term it the war duty on tea, the other the duty on paper. Now, hon. Members will do me the justice to recollect that in discharging that duty I did not for one moment presume to state that there existed such a difference between the merits of these separate propositions as to render it impossible for us to accept that one of them which might be regarded with the greatest favour by the House. There were, however, reasons which many persons felt to be very strong for the selection which we made. We had at the time on hand a Treaty of Commerce with France, as well as very extensive measure for the abolition from our statute book of the remains of protective duties. Could there be a more appropriate and just accompaniment to our proposals for exposing the British manufacture to unlimited competition with the foreigner than a simultaneous measure for relieving him from the duty on paper, which constituted a tax on the export of his manufacture? It is, indeed, said by some that this is an insignificant burden, but I much doubt whether that is a correct view to take of the matter, when I bear in mind that we had a duty levied under the name of an export duty to the extent of £100,000 per annum, that Sir Robert Peel deemed it desirable to remove it, and that its abolition was accepted with gratitude by the trading community. It is more difficult to estimate the effect of the paper duty on the exports of this country, but I am not, I think, far from the mark when I say that the paper used in connection with our export trade must pay a duty of not less than £300,000 or £400,000 a year. Now, I put it to the hon. Gentleman who intend to deal with the case on the principles of justice—I put it to the hon. Member for Radnorshire, who seems to imagine that we are actuated in this matter by no better motive than to gain the favour of a Gentleman who at the same time can give no favour in return, inasmuch as the hon. Member says he is the most unpopular man of a most unpopular section. I put, I repeat, to those who are desirous of proceeding in this case on the principles of justice, whether we are not acting entirely in accordance with those principles when we say to the British producer, “We are about to leave you without a single sixpence or shred of protection at home, but we will relieve you from a tax which presses on one of the essential accessories of your trade?” For my own part, I confess I was surprised when I heard the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) treat with ridicule—for it amounted to that, and I may observe in passing that it was the first time I ever heard him indulge in a vein of ridicule in this House—the idea that the paper duty could be a tax of the smallest importance to the distressed manufacturers and people of Coventry. Why, Sir, we have been told, as the results of inquiry made on the spot, that a sum of £10,000 a year is paid by persons in Coventry for one particular purpose—and that £10,000 being in the nature of deductions from profits would probably represent a capital of several hundred thousands of pounds, and I cannot believe that Parliament will refuse to entertain the claims urged on behalf of those gentlemen whom we require to meet the French manufacturer, without the slightest advantages in the British market, and to whom hon. Gentlemen opposite wish us to say, “You must continue subject to a tax on the accessories of your trade, from which your competitors are entirely free.” What, I would ask, can be more inconsistent or absurd to enter into a discussion about rags, and to undertake to relieve our own manufacturers from the inequalities of foreign legislation, while we require them to go into the market unequally weighted, not in consequence of foreign but owing to burdens imposed at home? These are considerations which I must say have had great force with both myself and my colleagues in bringing us to the determination on the subject of the paper duties at which we have arrived. When, however, matters reached a certain degree of maturity, we had other vital and essential elements in the question to take into our view.

The House of Commons read last year a second time, by a considerable majority, a Bill for the repeal of the paper duty. For a period of forty years a vote of that kind on the part of this House had been accepted by the trade and commerce of the country as an absolute and final decision. In all such cases persons interested in trade and industry of the nation have felt themselves justified in accepting the assurance which such a vote afforded, and upon the faith of it invested their capital and pledged their credit. This was done last year, in consequence of the conclusion at which the House of Commons arrived, and I now send back to the right hon. Gentleman opposite the challenge which he threw out, and I say to him, “Keep faith with the country; keep faith with those who have trusted to the vote of last Session, as they have done to a long list of similar assurances which in a hundred cases we have given them. I will not trouble the Committee by going into details upon this point; but I would illustrate by referring to facts the statement which I make, that a long course of precedents has given the public a title to rely upon votes similar to that of last year given by this House. I hold in my hand a letter written by Mr. Grey, a gentleman who is well known to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), who is one of the most enterprising men in this country. I do not know that he possesses large means; but about thirty years ago, when such enterprise was much rarer than at present, he conceived the ingenious idea of establishing a paper as a gratuitous advertising medium. The undertaking was successful, and conferred, I believe, a great benefit on the country. Well, this gentleman writes to me to say that, trusting to the Vote of the House of Commons last year, he had at once committed himself to his subscribers, and that the consequence had been that there was a considerable diminution of his profits ; but they were still sufficient to keep the roof over his head which, after thirty-four years of indefatigable industry, he was enabled to call his own, but such could not continue to be the case unless the paper duty were repealed during the present Session. He adds that he, perhaps incautiously, trusted to the pledge given to the public by the Vote of this House of last year ; that he, nevertheless, kept his word with his subscribers, and that the consequence had been to entail upon him a fearful loss. Now, I put it boldly to the Committee whether this gentleman was not justified in relying on a decision of the House of Commons, which for forty years in similar instances has been regarded as a pledge not to be departed from ? I say, then, those hon. Members must have formed very singular notions with regard both to our duty and our honour who could suppose that in the course which we have taken we had no better motive than to curry favour with any Gentleman or set of Gentlemen in this House.

I do not think it necessary to enter into the general merits of the paper duty after the arguments which have been used, and particularly after the speech of an hon. Gentleman with whom I do not often agree, the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) whose close and able reasoning there has not been a single attempt on the other side to answer. But I cannot pass from the subject altogether without adverting to one or two things which have been said in debate. What said the hon. Baronet the Member for the West Riding (Sir John Ramsden) ? He accused the Government of having pursued an unexampled course with regard to the surplus set up, and he actually undertook to instruct and inform the House, and feeling that he himself perhaps was chargeable with a course somewhat unusual, he anticipated the charge by saying that the Government had pursued a course never before heard of. He contended that in all cases where a surplus had before been presented it had been actual—a surplus in hand. I really do not know how I am to deal with a statement like that. The thing the hon. Baronet says not only has not been, but never can be. It so happens that when there is a surplus in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer it is applied to fixed purposes under ascertained provisions of law, and never can be made the subject of dealings by this House. [Sir

JOHN RAMSDEN : Hear, hear !] The hon. Baronet cheers my explanation, though his original statement was that any surplus hitherto presented by a Chancellor of the Exchequer had always been realized. In touching on the question of surplus I must not forget that the hon. Baronet does not stand alone. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), and the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), have all questioned the existence of that surplus exceedingly, yet each and all of these Gentlemen voted to take from it, according to the best official Estimate that can be framed, £285,000 more than would be absorbed by the proposal of the Government. And then the hon. Member for Huntingdon comes down here and challenges me about Exchequer bills and Stade dues, and says I shall lose £220,000 by Stade dues and £50,000 by Exchequer bills. That would make in all £270,000, but I should still be £15,000 better off than their proposal, if carried, would leave me. The hon. Member found fault with my calculations ; but it was he, and not I, who ventured to predict what the state of the money market would be six months hence. He it was who said, in his desire to make good the case which he was urging with great ability, that he had calculated the Exchequer bills for twelve months, forgetting the provision of law which —

MR. T. BARING : I asked what the amount was.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : You computed it at £220,000, and you —

MR. T. BARING : I wish to explain. I said that as it was stated by the right hon. Gentleman that the increase on the interest of Exchequer bills would not be for more than six months, I took that item at £25,000, and the payments on account of Stade dues I said were fixed by public opinion at £200,000.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : I am very much obliged by the explanation. I thought the hon. Member said the Stade dues would be £220,000 ; and, in point of fact, neither he nor we had any accurate means of computation, not knowing whether the arrangement would be completed or not. My hon. Friend, I believe, is now of opinion that the arrangement will probably be carried out. It will require a sum of £155,000 or £156,000, and that, of course, was one of the reasons why we objected to the repeal of the tea duty, feeling it necessary to keep in hand a sum of £400,000 or £500,000. Of course, in a country like this you cannot possibly foresee every accruing charge for the twelve months, and you keep a small surplus, not exactly in hand, but before you on paper, so as to meet contingent charges which may arise. The hon. Gentleman is still in a very uneasy state about the surplus, and thinks it very doubtful whether there will be any after all. I must say I do trust that the subject of a surplus as it has been handled in these debates will not be a precedent for future times. To-day it is denied, to-morrow it is asserted, the next day it is exaggerated, and the following day it is denied again. One time we are told the surplus will not admit of a remission of £15,000; next it is endeavoured to force upon us the remission of £1,500,000; and then the hon. Baronet, the Member for the West Riding (Sir John Ramsden), rises in his place and thinks it becoming his station and position to say that he thinks the estimate of that surplus [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] On this subject, and in the discharge of a public duty, I must vindicate the privilege of speech. I think it right to call to the recollection of the House that the hon. Member for the West Riding did think it right to state [Renewed cries of "Oh!"] that the estimate of surplus which I have submitted was no better than the reckoning of any speculator. If that be a misrepresentation, I am ready to listen to any explanation.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: I believe, Mr. Massey, the words were these: That the estimate of surplus was liable to prove as fallacious as the scheme of any speculator on the Stock Exchange.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That appears to be precisely the sense imputed to the hon. Baronet, and which I was in hopes he might have been induced to qualify. However, having been deceived in that expectation, let me deal with another assumption of the hon. Baronet no less astounding. He said it was unexampled after a deficiency in a particular year to propose the repeal of a tax in the next. I need not go very far back to produce a remarkable instance, in which, I suppose, the conduct of the Government of the day will not be much disapproved by the hon. Baronet, as he took office with them shortly afterwards. In 1857 my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, having had a deficiency of £4,000,000 in the previous year, repealed taxes to the extent of £10,700,000, and immediately after this was done the Government which had been guilty of such astonishing profligacy was joined by the hon. Baronet. My hon. Friend, the Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer), who made this Motion, has thought fit to repeat imputations on me which I have never noticed in this House. As long as the most sordid motives or the most questionable proceedings are imputed only by anonymous writers of the press, or at any rate by those from whom one has no right to expect favour or indulgence, I think by far the best course for a Member of this House to take is to pass them by in utter silence, and to trust to the candour of his countrymen, which, I believe, will never fail him; and, I must add, to their appreciation of his character and his services, be those what they may. But my hon. Friend, whom I have had the pleasure of knowing from boyhood, and my respect and regard for whom no political circumstances can ever in the slightest degree affect, has imputed to me that the proposals which I have made in this House are brought forward for some mysterious purpose of conciliating the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Birmingham. Now, Sir, in the first place with regard to any supposed sympathies of mine with the hon. Member for Birmingham, I must say that if I did sympathize with him I should not have the slightest hesitation in avowing it, because I know of nothing in the character or in the conduct of the hon. Gentleman which need make any man who agrees with him afraid to state it. His character has, in my opinion, always been marked with strict integrity, and his conduct has been uniformly straightforward. But, when a statement of that kind is made against a person like myself, who am not at all aware of holding the same opinions in politics as the hon. Member for Birmingham, I must observe that neither my hon. Friend who made it last, nor any Gentleman who made it before, has ever attempted to support or sustain it by any language I have used, or by any sentiments I have expressed. I certainly do sympathize with the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Birmingham, in regard to the whole course of that commercial legislation which has conferred such immense boons and blessings on the country, and of which he has been one of the most distinguished champions. And I regret to find that that policy still has many opponents in this House, who, though unable to prevent it from taking effect in the main, are apparently glad to find any opportunity of crippling it, or of covering it with discredit. I should not be doing justice to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham if I attempted to describe my own opinions with respect to matters of finance by mixing them up with his, of which I have no knowledge other than that which every Member in this House possesses in common with myself. But if my hon. Friend the Member for Dorsetshire wishes to make any imputation on my opinion, such as I can explain, I am willing to give him an explanation. I have no doubt that he has a meaning, which I am obliged to conjecture, as he has been content to make use of vague and shadowy language. He means, perhaps, that I am one of those who entertain the concealed and covert intention of changing the system of taxation of this country—shifting the burden from commodities to property, and effecting thereby a considerable alteration in the relative position of classes. If such be the belief of hon. Gentlemen opposite, I have no doubt that the proposal we now make for the repeal of the paper duty is regarded as the insidious beginning of a serious innovation, fraught with danger to the country. It might, perhaps, be enough for me to say that not one syllable had been adduced from any speech of mine to sustain that belief. Whether such be the desire of the hon. Member for Birmingham I know not, but it is not mine. [Interruption.] I am sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite will permit me to state in a few words the view I take of the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. We are not now at the beginning, but at the accomplishment and consummation of a great series of legislative changes. We are not introducing novel principles, but working up the residue of great and beneficent operations introduced by great men, whose names will ever live in the grateful memory of the country, and who advanced them up to a certain point and then handed them over to us, simply and in all humility, but, likewise, in all fidelity to complete. I confess that, in my opinion, the days of what are called by their friends comprehensive, and by their enemies ambitious Budgets are gone by. They began in 1842 and 1845 with Sir Robert Peel, who had a great work to do, and who set about in the spirit of a workman equal to his business. The next offender—if offence there be—

was the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, who, in 1852, quite justifiable in his own point of view, though I did not concur with him, produced an extensive and comprehensive new financial plan. In 1853 I was myself responsible for a plan of the same kind, and again last year, taking the opportunity presented by the Treaty with France, we introduced a measure which, in our view, went to complete the whole of that series of changes which had been initiated, though not entirely, in modern times by Sir Robert Peel. Therefore, it is not the commencement, but the conclusion of our commercial legislation that we are now proposing, and, viewed as the conclusion, I put fearlessly to the House the proposal for the repeal of the paper duty, as being one as well and as firmly founded in all the sound principles of finance and of industrial economy as any proposal that, during the course of the last twenty years, was ever submitted and met the approval of Parliament. I heard with deep regret last night the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), though not, indeed, with the same regret as I heard some other remarks made by the hon. Baronet the Member for the West Riding (Sir John Ramsden). I hope that the hon. Member for the West Riding will express his regret, before the conclusion of the debate, for having, with or without premeditation, spoken of the American Government as a great Republican bubble. [A cry of "Hear."] I am sorry to hear that phrase cheered by a single Member, and had hoped that was the first and last time we should hear any Member allude in a jeering way to the tremendous calamity which threatens to fall upon a great country; but I do not believe that the hon. Member for the West Riding had any intention to speak in such a spirit. With regard to the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, I cannot express the regret with which I heard it stated by him that this measure is one which appears to aim at some extensive substitution of direct for indirect taxation, and is not a measure of free trade. The recollection of the long years during which I, as well as others, had the privilege to sit by the side of one in whose memory the hon. Baronet is entitled to feel the deepest interest, led me to a different conclusion, and I think it would greatly puzzle the hon. Baronet to draw a distinction in principle between this last Excise duty which we are now proposing to remove and those other Excise duties, not one whit more objectionable in principle or more oppressive in practice, which his honoured father was the instrument of repealing. I certainly had hoped that in the work of removing this description of legislation from the statute book we might have had the advantage of the hon. Baronet's assistance; but, if not, we must still appeal to the convictions and experience of this House, and until I see the contrary I never will believe that this House, after the eleventh hour, will withdraw the last hand from the work it has hitherto carried through with firmness and courage; and, on the present occasion, I anticipate a decision which, while it will be faithful to the spirit of the former acts of the Legislature, will also be provident of the future and permanent interests of the country.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: I rise to explain, though it is with the greatest reluctance that I feel obliged to throw myself for a single moment on the indulgence of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has commented in somewhat severe terms on the observations I ventured to utter. He said that I stated that previous surpluses had been actually in hand, but he omitted to add some important words, on which the whole meaning depended. I said that formerly the surplus had been either actually in hand, or in some other form equally tangible and secure. I put it to the sense of the Committee what is the plain meaning of those words? I did not speak in childlike ignorance, as the right hon. Gentleman seems to think, of the arrangements by which the surplus in hand is devoted to certain purposes; but I meant to convey this meaning, that it is not justifiable to repeal permanent and safe taxation, except on the faith of a surplus which the experience of the previous year has shown that we can depend on. I went on to say that it was unprecedented for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to close the year with a deficit of more than £2,500,000, and then to propose to remit taxation on the faith of a surplus purely founded on speculative calculations. The right hon. Gentleman takes exception to that, and quotes against me the case of the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary in 1857. If I was speaking of any one for whom I had a less unfeigned respect than I have for the Chancellor of the Exchequer I should say that to adduce that example is trifling with the sense of the Committee. For what was that year? It was the year when we were returning to a peace establishment from the great expenditure of the Crimean war. I repeat the challenge I made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to show in a year of peace a case in which any Finance Minister has closed the year with such a deficiency, and has proposed to remit taxation on the face of a surplus so purely speculative as the present. Grave charges have been brought against me. The right hon. Gentleman has seen fit to renew the observations which in an early part of the evening were made by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. At that time I rose and offered an explanation of the remarks to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. If I might be allowed to form an opinion of the sentiments of the Committee, from the manner in which they received my explanation, I believe it was perfectly satisfactory. The explanation which the right hon. Gentleman asks has, therefore, already been made, and has been thoroughly accepted; and I now leave it to the fairness of the Committee to judge between the right hon. Gentleman and myself.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I am glad the hon. Baronet opposite has not complied with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman that he should express regret for one of the best and most effective speeches I have ever heard. At this late hour I will not interfere between the House and the division. I will, however, claim their attention for a few moments, as I believe I am almost the only Member of the House who has not yet spoken on the Budget. My reason for now rising is that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of his speech, put a question which I think it is in my power to answer. The right hon. Gentleman complained that the present duties on tea and sugar had been described as "War Duties," and he asked who was the author of the phrase. To that question, I believe, I can give an answer. In 1857, in one of our debates, one of the speakers said, "It is almost matter of good faith, that when next remissions of taxation were made, the duties on tea and sugar, which were, in fact, war duties, should be reduced." The speaker added that there could be no greater claim for a reduction of taxation than on those articles which entered so largely into the consumption of the people. Who spoke these words? The noble Lord the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Therefore, the author of the phrase "War Duties," as applied to the duties on tea and sugar, of which the right hon. Gentleman complains, was the noble Lord his colleague, to whom I refer him. I confess I have heard with extreme surprise any reference to the Flintshire election. The right hon. Gentleman took part in that election, and also in the same election two years ago. If there is a man in this House from whom I did not expect to hear any reference to the Flintshire election it is the right hon. Gentleman. I claim the right to say that I have listened to these debates from first to last, and have heard nothing to affect the opinion I entertain, and which the great majority in this House and the country also hold with me, that this Budget is open to three fatal objections. The first is that the arrangement is one that is financially unwise. The second is that the Budget is no better than a party manoeuvre, and has been arranged with a view to the interests of party, and not of the country. Lastly, I am of opinion that this Budget does involve unnecessary offence, if not insult, to the House of Lords. The House of Lords, however, I have no doubt will treat that offence with the contempt it deserves. I maintain that the House of Lords has never objected to repeal the paper duties. They only objected to reduce the resources of the country. If hon. Members will refer to the speech of the Earl of Derby they will find in it a distinct statement that he agrees in thinking that the paper duty is an objectionable impost, that its maintenance is a mere matter of time, and that whenever the state of the finances renders it desirable he is prepared to support the total repeal of the paper duty. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) as being unable to resist the temptation of explaining away the part he had taken in 1858. But the part taken by my right hon. Friend requires no explanation. He held the same language then that the Earl of Derby held last year. We were parties to a Resolution, and we thereby acknowledged that it was right to repeal the paper duty whenever the financial state of the country would permit. When the right hon. Gentleman imputes to us that we are inconsistent in proposing to repeal the tea duties, whereby we reduce the revenue by £200,000 more than he proposed, my answer is to be found in an extract from another speech by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell). He was then an independent Member of the Opposition. In 1857 the noble Lord said he was sure that a reduction of the duty on tea to 1s. per lb. would be followed by an increased consumption that would soon bring up the revenue to its former amount. This is an answer to the charge of inconsistency. The—[Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I never said the revenue would be made up in one year.] No; but I adopt the language of the noble Lord, and say that the duty in a few years will be entirely made up. I think that the Government ought to have considered the interests of the country, and not the interests of party; and, had they done so, they would have repealed the duties which, in time of war, were put on the comforts of the people instead of repealing the duty on an article which contributes to comforts of the masses in only a very slight degree. For those reasons I cannot concur in the proposition of the Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot begin the very few words which I shall feel it my duty to submit to the House on the present Motion without expressing the satisfaction I feel, and which I am sure is participated in by all present, at seeing again within these walls my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, returned after rendering those valuable services which he has performed for his country, and restored to that health which I am sure even those who differ from him in politics are happy to see him enjoying. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) has asked me a question which he has repeated now for the second time, and I presume it will be a question put every fortnight till the end of the Session. I am happy, however, to be able to answer that question in the same words in which I answered it before. The hon. Member asks me whether there is anything in the present state of Affairs on the continent of America which induces me to think it will be necessary to apply to this House to increase our armaments either by land or sea. I stated to the hon. Gentleman that I saw nothing in the events now taking place in the United States which was likely to lead to those consequences. The hon. Member asks me again whether those events in America are likely materially to affect the Customs' and Excise duties of this country. The best answer which I can give him on this point is to state the fact that during the eight weeks ending last Saturday the produce of the Customs and Excise and

Stamps—the fixed revenue of the country—was £500,000 more than in the corresponding period before those occurrences. Judging, therefore, of the future from the past, I do not think we have need to be under any anxiety on the subject. Passing from that topic, I must observe that the state in which the House is this evening is certainly a remarkable contrast to that which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire stated to have been its condition on the occasion when the Vote on the Paper Duty was before taken. This certainly is not a languid House; nor is the vote likely to be a sleepy vote. We are told that hon. Members have come down to give freely, and without reference to party considerations, those votes which on mature reflection in their study they may be led to give on the repeal of the paper duty. Why, Sir, I dare say that is the case. At all events, the vote of this night will be one remarkable for the manner in which different conflicting opinions have, without any party object whatever, been brought to concur in a single vote. We are going to have a vote against the repeal of the paper duty by those who on former occasions voted against that repeal, and by those who decidedly and enthusiastically voted for it. We are going to have the same vote given by those who denied the existence of a surplus, and by those who exhibited a wish to diminish the surplus which my right hon. Friend proposed as the result of the financial year. We are going to have the same vote given by those who advocated a repeal or remission of the duty on tea, by those who on former occasions demanded a reduction of the Excise duties, and by those who supported a repeal of the income tax. We are going to have the same vote given by Free-traders and Protectionists. We are going to see every variety of opinion merge into one common vote, and we are told that this is not a party vote. We are told by the right hon. Baronet who has just spoken, and who has just censured what he calls a party manoeuvre, that there is nothing of party in this vote. Indeed, on the contrary, we are assured by many of the hon. Members who have spoken in this debate that there is nothing which hon. Gentlemen opposite have at heart so much as to maintain and support the existing Government. Well, Sir, at last we shall come to an end of this long debate; and if we wanted any authority for the opinion that this debate has lasted an unusual time, it is afforded us by the first sentence of the speech of the right hon. Baronet, who stated that he believed he was almost the only Member of the House who had not spoken on this discussion. Therefore, Sir, I may be excused for saying that this has been a long debate, and that hon. Gentlemen have had a full opportunity of making up those independent opinions and uniting them in one harmonious whole which are to characterize the division to-night. But I hope that, in spite of this fortuitous concurrence of discordant atoms in one united vote, hon. Members will remember that we are deciding a most important question of financial regulation; that they will bear in mind all those arguments have been refuted by those who have spoken on this side of the House, and will not be led away by the conflicting, and, I may say, by the unfounded arguments of those who have spoken against the proposition of the Government. Almost every one has concurred that the paper duty is vicious and hurtful in itself and vexatious in its collection. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have argued, and confirmed that argument by their votes, that this tax ought to be repealed on the earliest occasion on which the finances of the country will allow of its repeal. It has been proved and admitted that the tax is one which not only imposes a burden on the industrial exertions of the country, but is promotive of impediments to any fresh operations in the particular branch of trade on which it is levied. My right hon. Friend has reminded the House that this is the last remnant of an objectionable system of Excise duties; that we are not inaugurating any new system of finance, but only completing a system which has been sanctioned by many of the most competent authorities in former times as well as at the present in all that relates to the commercial transactions of the country. I do, therefore, hope that no extraneous matter—no question of party, independent of the matter at issue—will affect the votes on the division which is about to take place. Relying on the assurance which has been given, that hon. Gentlemen are going to vote free from all party considerations, and on a full and mature consideration of the merits of the case—and believing and being convinced that the merits of the case are clear as the sun at noon day—I confidently look to the result of the division which is to decide the question on

TELLERS.

Taylor, Col.
 Whitmore, H.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the statement made by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs; that statement he considered prejudicial to the honour and independence of the Irish Members of the House. The noble Lord, he understood, stated that a deputation of Irish Members had applied for an interview with the noble Lord the Prime Minister, on the subject of the Galway contract. On the part of all the Irish Members with whom he had spoken, he declared that there was no foundation for this statement. They had never thought of asking an interview with the noble Lord; and, under the circumstances, he did not believe that any Irish Members would have attended such an interview. A certain individual, not representing the Irish Members, did have a conversation with the noble Lord at the head of the Government; he (Colonel French) had asked him whether he had made any statement to the noble Lord that might compromise the honour and independence of the Irish Members, and he (Colonel French) was authorized to state that the report was wholly destitute of foundation.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Perhaps Sir, the Committee will allow me to answer the statement of the hon. Member instead of my noble Friend, as what the hon. Gentleman has said is founded on a communication made to me. My noble Friend did not state that any proposal for a deputation had been authorized by the Irish Members. What passed I will state exactly as it occurred. There is no use in concealing names. Father—that is Mr.—Daly came to me on Saturday, and urged many reasons why the decision of the Government with regard to the Galway contract should be rescinded. I stated to Mr. Daly that I did not consider him authorized to represent anybody, and declined to enter into any discussion with him about the contract, as

I did not consider him the ambassador of the Irish Members in general, or of the Galway Company in particular. I said it was a public question; that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had given notice of a Motion on the subject, and that the question must be discussed publicly in the House of Commons, not privately in my room. Mr. Daly said, if I would not discuss it with him, would I do so with a deputation of Irish Members? I said I did not see that it was a matter between me and the Irish Members, but between the Government and the Galway Company; nor did I see what the Irish Members had to do with it more than to take part in the discussion that must follow on the Motion. Mr. Daly said I was mistaken, because the Irish Members must take some action on the subject. I said “Yes, that action will be on the discussion.” Well, Mr. Daly said, “That won’t exactly do; I wish to bring a deputation of Irish Members to you on Monday.” But Monday I told him was the day appointed for the Budget, and the Galway contract is a different question. I said, “There is no discussion on Monday about the Galway contract. There is no reason why I should receive a deputation on that day, and, moreover, if I were to receive a deputation, I know already everything they could say to me, and I can only tell them what I tell you—namely, that it is a public question to be discussed in the House of Commons, and not in a private room in my house.” “Well, but,” said Mr. Daly, “I am anxious that you should see them on Monday, because they must take action on the subject, and that action must be taken on the Monday evening.” “Oh,” said I, “I now understand you; and when it is put to me in that way I must, with all deference and respect for the Irish Members, entirely decline seeing any of them.” So the matter ended, and that is what I stated to my noble Friend as well as to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not know what authority Mr. Daly had for anything which he said, or for his undertaking to bring me a deputation of Irish Members. My noble Friend did not say that he was authorized, and it is for Mr. Daly and the Irish Members to settle this point between them.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that no one had a right to go to the noble Lord and act in his name, or in that, he believed, of any other Irish Member. However much he might condemn the conduct of the Government in reference to the Galway contract, he would have equally opposed the financial measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the contract had been continued. He opposed those measures because he had no confidence, and his constituents had no confidence in the right hon. Gentleman.

Remaining Clauses and the Schedules were then agreed to.

House resumed; Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

House adjourned at half-after

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MONEY POWERS IN RAILWAY ACTS.— STANDING ORDER No. 185.

LORD REDESDALE moved, That the Standing Order No. clxxxv. (formerly 223) be considered, in order to its being amended in the following manner, after paragraph 2, to insert:—

“3. That no Provision authorizing any Company to raise Money or to subscribe towards or to guarantee any Money in the Undertaking of another Company, shall be introduced into any Bill which is not brought in by the Company thereby authorized to raise Money or to subscribe or to guarantee.”

The noble Lord said the Amendment had become necessary from a practice that had sprung up of Companies bringing in Bills in which powers were taken for other companies to contribute money or to guarantee money; so that a person looking at the especial Act of Parliament governing a particular Company was not enabled to ascertain what was the real extent of the company's liabilities.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the effect of adopting this as a Standing Order would be to require Railway Companies to bring in a Bill whenever they proposed to subscribe towards any small branch promoted by a local Company, as well as the new Company applying for Parliamentary powers to construct it. He thought it unwise, where a line was for the benefit of the community, to impose unnecessary difficulties or restrictions on the parties promoting it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that although the authority of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees was of great weight, yet he thought there was much reason in what had been stated by the noble Marquess as to the danger of increasing the Parliamentary expenses of railways. That was very undesirable. It was, besides, unadvisable to multiply Standing Orders which did not agree with those of the other House of Parliament. Perhaps the better course would be to postpone this matter with a view to its being more fully considered.

LORD REDESDALE stated that the terms of the Resolution had been communicated to the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and had been approved. It was not intended that the Standing Order should apply to Bills before Parliament this Session. He had no objection to postpone it.

SALMON FISHERIES.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY rose to call the Attention of the House to the Report and Recommendations of the Commissioners upon the Salmon Fisheries of England and Wales. Upon one occasion the late Sir Robert Peel was said to have declared that he never knew a Session which could not boast of a Salmon Fisheries Bill, and it appeared that the present Session was to be no exception to the rule, because their Lordships were not only to be called upon to consider the provisions of a Salmon Bill, but they had upon their table a copious volume in the shape of a Report and recommendations of a Royal Commission issued to inspect the salmon fisheries of England and Wales, and to inquire into the causes of the diminution in the number of fish caught. He had spent many pleasant hours of his life in salmon fishing, and he was, therefore, not likely to pick holes in any recommendations that might be made for the preservation of that particular fish, but, on the contrary, was most anxious to encourage by all fair means its preservation and increase. At the same time, however, he could not put aside altogether the prejudices with respect to the liberty of the subject and the rights of private property, which they had all been taught to reverence and maintain:

but he must say he thought the Royal Commissioners, in the exercise of their duty, which they seemed to have carried out with zeal and ability, and which had resulted in an excellent Report containing good advice, had been carried away by overmuch zeal, and had conducted their inquiries upon the principle that a salmon was almost the first animal in creation. Parodying the old lines they might have finished their report by saying—

All other things, of course, give place.”

Misled by exaggerated evidence as to the miraculous quantity of salmon that formerly existed, they had been brought to the conclusion that the same wonderful quantity might be restored by an Act of Parliament. He could not persuade himself that there ever existed the enormous quantities of salmon which were described in old charters, or that, supposing there were, we should ever see anything of the same kind again. The Commissioners laid stress upon certain old documents, which said that apprentices should not be fed upon salmon oftener than twice a week. He knew that such parchments existed in Salisbury and other places at the heads of rivers, but we did not find them at the mouths of rivers. The natural inference was that the unfortunate apprentices concerned were crammed with black or foul fish, which were found in great quantities at the heads of rivers, and which were unfit for human food. We all knew the exaggerations of old men—laudatores temporis acti. Every old fisherman believed that salmon were formerly twice as large and twice as numerous as now ; but, as far as his own experience was concerned, he could not say that he saw much difference in the “take” of fish. In 1856 there were more fish caught in some of the rivers in the south of England than had been taken for twenty or thirty years before; and although some reasons might be given for a general diminution in the breed of salmon, yet the variations from year to year were as unaccountable as those in the number of woodcocks. There were several points on which he agreed with the Commissioners, and with respect to which he would offer no opposition to their recommendations. For example, he had no doubt that the removal of obstacles at the mouths of rivers was very desirable, inasmuch as it would allow the fish to reach the spawning beds in the upper water. He thought, also, that there should be a regular close time, to be observed most strictly during the breeding season, when the fish were really not fit to be eaten. A penalty should be attached to the sale of roe, provision should be made by which the fish should be allowed to attain a proper size before they were taken ; and a stop should be put to the exportation of fish out of season, which could be done most effectually by an arrangement with the French Government. Such measures for preserving and increasing the breed of salmon might be easily put in execution without any infringement upon the rights of private property or upon the liberty of the subject, and he thought they were all that it would be wise or necessary to adopt. Other recommendations of the Commissioners—recommendations which were embodied in a Bill now before the other House—were, if not impossible, at least impolitic, and, he believed, impracticable. It was actually proposed that the whole of England, land as well as water, should be put under the paternal protection, as far as salmon were concerned, of the Home Office ; that there should be a Central Board established to govern all fisheries ; that local boards should act as the lieutenants of the Central Board. So complicated was the machinery for carrying out the supervision of the Board that he could almost imagine himself reading a new Reform Bill. All fisheries were to be valued, and rates levied upon them to defray the expenses of general superintendence and of constabulary for the protection of the fish ; the water-bailiffs were to be empowered, whenever they pleased, to walk over the private property adjacent to rivers without let or hindrance. The last proposal pointed to an interference with the rights of private property which would be fatal to the peace of any rural community. In many cases the fishery belonged to one man, and the banks of the river to another, so that the landowner would be trespassed upon for the benefit of the fishery proprietor. If a man possessed both fishery and land, he surely might protect his own fish ; if the water only belonged to him, he could protect it by going up and down the river in a boat. At present no person could land or net, or angle without the permission of the owner of the banks, and, therefore, it was proposed to give to other parties a power which even the proprietors of fisheries themselves did not possess. It was recommended, moreover, that all streams which were led from large rivers for purposes of irrigation, should be stopped at their entrances by gratings, with a view to prevent the passage of fish. To do that would sometimes be equivalent to the stoppage of the whole drainage of the country, owing to the accumulation of water which would take place in consequence. It was quite true, he admitted, that the Commissioners recommended that, in case any damage was occasioned by such stoppages, reasonable compensation should be made; but he could conceive nothing which would be likely to create more constant wrangling than that official gentlemen should at this time of the year walk through the grass and corn on the banks of rivers with the object of carrying that recommendation into effect. Their Lordships had no idea, in short, of the complicated machinery which the proposals made on the subject, if carried out, would entail; and when he took up the measure itself, in which those proposals were embodied, it appeared to him as if the Government had aimed at framing a new Reform Bill. It embraced a system of double election—that of a central as well of local boards—and provided for the supervision of the Home Office in the case of those bodies. If, he might add, the objections which he had pointed out were not removed, he felt assured that annoyances and disputes would prevail to such an extent that people would say they would rather have no salmon at all than be kept in such a continued state of turmoil. He trusted, therefore, the Government would not try to do too much in the matter, and would not, by following too strictly the recommendations of the Commissioners, embark on a course of impossible legislation, but would rather consider the advisability of introducing some less stringent measure.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he could not lay claim to this special knowledge possessed by his noble Friend, and he was one of the very few Members in either House of Parliament who happened never to have sat on a Committee on a Salmon Bill, or to have taken part in legislation on the interesting and vexed question to which the noble Earl had just called attention. He knew, however, sufficient of the subject to be able to form the opinion that there was a diminution in the quantity of salmon, and in that opinion he was confirmed by the Report of the Commissioners. Their Lordships would, he might add, be deceived by what had fallen from the noble Earl if it should lead them to suppose that the Commissioners had founded the conclusion at which they had arrived simply on the representations of some old fishermen. The increased cost of salmon, the diminished rental of rivers, as well as official and formal documents, had, in addition, furnished them with actual proof that both in number and in weight salmon had diminished in all the fisheries of the country. But, be that as it might, it would be entirely out of order to discuss the provisions of a Bill on the subject which had not yet come under their Lordship's consideration, while at the same time he thought it was, perhaps, desirable that an opportunity of ventilating—to use a vulgar phrase—a question of considerable importance should be afforded. He would, however, be going far beyond his duty if, as a member of the Government, he were to enter into a discussion of the details of a Bill now under the consideration of the other branch of the Legislature. He should, therefore, content himself with saying that the subject was one which required the introduction of a Reform Bill, and that the Government, acting on the advice of the Commissioners, had prepared a measure which was founded almost entirely on a law now in existence in Ireland on the same subject, which, he was informed, worked in a most satisfactory manner. The subject was well worthy the consideration of the House, and when the Bill came up to it in due course, he trusted its provisions would receive careful consideration and revision.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON IN INDIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE: I rise to present a Petition to your Lordships from the Cotton Supply Association of Manchester, in which they express their alarm at the prospect of a serious diminution in the future supply of cotton to this country in consequence of the civil war now raging between the Northern and Southern States of America, and in order that I should not occupy too much of your Lordships' time, I will only read the Prayer of the Petition—

“Your Petitioners, therefore, pray your Right Honourable House to adopt such measures as will contribute to the development of the agricultural and commercial resources of India, and in particular to a supply of cotton from that country.”

The first object they have in view is that the sale of land may be made in fee simple; the second is the establishment of efficient courts of law; the third is the construction of all necessary public works, such as roads, railroads, canals, the improvement of the navigation of rivers, and particularly the Godavery. In directing your Lordship's attention to the petition I have just presented, I must crave your indulgence when I make a few observations on a subject vitally affecting the interests of so large a portion of the manufacturing population of this country. To myself it is a source of gratification to think that the first time I have had the honour of addressing your Lordships it should be in support of that branch of industry which long experience teaches me is the keystone to our agricultural prosperity. In common with your Lordships, I feel with deep interest the crisis that now hangs so heavily on the heads of the people of the United States of America. The two countries have been so long and intimately connected in commercial transactions, that what deranges the trade of one must necessarily affect the industry of the other. It, therefore, does not surprise me that the manufacturers of Manchester and Glasgow have taken the alarm at what is occurring on the other side of the Atlantic. Their trade and the bread of hundreds of thousands of our manufacturing population and their families depend at present on the supply of cotton from the Southern States of North America. They must naturally now look to some other country to supply their wants. Your Lordships are aware that India has of late become one of the chief markets for the disposal of our manufactured cotton goods, and by encouragement such as it has a right to expect, I have no doubt that it will soon supply our manufacturers with the raw material. From time immemorial that country has produced cotton sufficient to clothe 200,000,000 of its inhabitants. Now, my Lords, during the last thirty years past anxiety has been shown by the authorities at home, and by the Local Government in India, to meet the wishes of the manufacturers of Manchester and Glasgow in the improvement of the cotton wool of India. But the extraordinary demand for it has only shown itself during the last few years. If your Lordships will refer to the blue books containing the minutes and proceedings of the Local Government on this subject, you will find that the quality of cotton wool sent from India has been considerably improved of late years, and the quantity imported into this country has much increased. No doubt

there has been a difference of opinion in regard to the cause of the supply not being equal to the demand of our manufacturers of late. Those who trade in cotton seem to think that it is owing to the defective state of the land tenure in the Ryotwar districts of India, to the bad state of the roads which connect the field of production with the port of export, in consequence of the rivers and their tributaries which traverse the cotton fields not having had the obstacles which impede navigation removed, and particularly in the Godavery, to the insecurity of invested property, as well as of advances made to the Natives for the purposes of cultivation. Before I sit down I will revert to these points. When I was in India I heard opinions expressed very similar to what I have heard since my return home. I consequently gave every consideration to the subject, and after much investigation I recorded the same opinion in regard to the principal cause of the deficiency of supply from India that I entertain now—that unless the manufacturers of this country engaged in the cotton trade send out agents, who are thoroughly acquainted with their wants, into the cotton districts of India, with instructions to purchase from the Native cultivator cotton of the quality, and cleaned as they desire to have it, at a remunerative price to the grower, they need not expect to see themselves made independent of other countries by the amount of supply that would be imported into this country from India; and this opinion is corroborated from what I hear from India in the present day, as well as from men in whose experience I have confidence, now living at home. I am glad to say that the Cotton Supply Association have appointed a gentleman to carry out these views who is thoroughly acquainted with the wants of our manufacturers, and who will arrive in India before the cotton crop is ripe. I feel assured, if your Lordships were aware of all the tricking and deception that used to take place, and what I am told still frequently takes place, with the cotton from the time it leaves the cultivator's hands, and gets into the possession of the Native chitty and broker, until it is put on board of ships, as well as the exorbitant rate of interest (from 18 to 40 per cent) that the Native cultivator frequently pays for the advances made to him by the soucar, you would not be astonished at the course I recommend. I firmly believe, that if the manufacturers' agents purchased cotton from the cultivators, and had their own gins in the cotton district, it would soon put an end to the necessity of the Natives requiring advances, and would enable them gradually to amass capital, as they would then receive the full value of their produce. They have been so long oppressed in the disposal of their produce by the Native brokers, &c., that they will require for some time to be accustomed to the straightforward dealing of a European agent to make them forget all their bad habits which have been forced on them in the disposal of their raw material. And, if the same agents themselves would import the cotton into England without the interference of the Native chitty, a still greater profit would be derived. We must remember that the Native weavers always offer a market for the indigenous cotton of the country, with which they produce cotton cloth of sufficient quality for the use of its inhabitants. The indigenous cotton plant is an annual, and in the American planters' estimation whom I consulted, was capable of considerable improvement in the length and strength of its fibre, so as to suit it for the machinery of this country. The Bourbon cotton in demand at Manchester for the coarser fabrics is a biennial. The Mexican and New Orleans cotton grown in India is of sufficient quality for the manufacture of the superior kind of cotton goods, but the quantity produced there is limited. Unless the Native cultivator is certain of an annual demand, not depending on a good or bad crop in the Southern States of America, he will neither grow the biennial nor the perennial species in sufficient quantity to be a substitute for a short supply from that country. He has his land tax to pay punctually at two periods of the year; and, therefore, he will only grow that species of cotton for which he has an annual market. Climate is of much greater consequence to the Mexican and New Orleans cotton plant than the soil in which it is planted; that is to say, that a superior climate with an inferior soil will produce a greater quantity and better quality of cotton than a superior soil with an inferior climate. The Southern States of America, bordering on the Gulph of Mexico, between north latitude 30 and 33 have great advantages over other countries in producing the Mexican and New Orleans species of cotton; the climate is very humid, causing heavy dews and thick fogs at night, which the bright sun that prevail in the morning and during the whole day, dispels at the time the plant requires moisture most, and brings the bole to maturity in a manner that no artificial irrigation has been able to effect in India, except in small patches of gardens when watered with great care by artificial means. Artificial irrigation is accompanied by a great increase of insects which destroy the cotton wool in the pod before it comes to maturity. There are several reasons for trying to improve the indigenous cotton of India. It stands the three months of dry hot winds that blow over many of the cotton fields of India which are destruction to the exotic species, and as soon as the bole is gathered the Native cultivator grubs up the plant, prepares the land for another crop, sows, reaps, and markets it before the year has expired; and, consequently, has two certain crops to dispose of, with which he pays his land tax. The great defect in Indian cotton when compared with the Southern States' cotton is its want of the rich oily substance that is so conspicuous when handling it, and which may be attributed to the poverty of the soil from constant cropping, and the deficiency of home-made or artificial manure for enriching it, as well as the effect of hot dry winds. I have heard great anticipations raised on the effects of the skill and enterprise of the Anglo-Saxon in producing cotton in India, and it is alluded to by the petitioners, who contrast its absence in India as being the cause of America having hitherto obtained precedence over India in the cotton market. Now, my Lords, I attribute it to other causes. The climate of the cotton fields of the two countries is very different. That of the Southern States of America is between the latitude of 30 and 33 north, which is in a comparatively cool climate without the tropics; the cotton-producing country in India alluded to here is within the latitudes of 8 and 24 north. According to the information obtained from India on authority, as well as from other sources, the climate of the cotton fields does not appear to be suited to the European constitution, and, I feel assured, if an unacclimatized European who attended the fieldworkers, and the other duties he would have to perform, felt the heat of a tropical sun and the discomfort of the hot dry winds that blow for three months of the year over most of the cotton fields, and how little prepared he would be to encounter them, added to the other inconveniences he would have to overcome, which are greater than in other countries, particularly in cultivation of the land, or in the propagation of the cotton plant in a climate of which he has no experience, and the hot sleepless nights he would have to endure, I think he would find it beyond his powers to undergo such fatigue, exposed as I have described his daily work to be. But if these anticipations had been attributed to the energy with which Europeans would introduce capital into India, which is so much required by purchasing cotton from the Native cultivators, then I should have willingly joined in all their expectations. For skill in cultivation in a tropical climate I know of no country which at different periods of its history has excelled India. I consider that my own native country is as far advanced in the highest principles of cultivation as any country I know in the present day, but when I look to the experience of India in times past I find many of the principles which guide us well known to that country from its earliest days. I shall now touch lightly on those questions to which I have previously alluded. It is unnecessary for me to occupy your Lordships' time by referring to the revenue system of Madras and Bombay (previous to the year 1852), the two presidencies where Ryotwar prevails, and where cotton is principally cultivated for export, as a material change took place in that year when real Ryotwaree became the revenue system of the Madras presidency. In the year 1852, under express orders from the Court of Directors, and with the concurrence of the local Governments of Madras and Bombay, a Standing Order was issued from the Revenue Boards of both presidencies that on no account should any extra cess be exacted from the ryot for any improvement made by himself on his farm and at his own cost. And that no interference should take place by the revenue officers with the ryots during thirty years which were the terms of the lease. This, in 1852, stood good for Bombay. In Madras the Government protested against a lease, as the ryots there held their farms in perpetuity provided they pay their kist punctually. At the same time they informed the Court of Directors that the ryotwaree in the Madras Presidency was considered, not only as a settlement of the land tenure in perpetuity, but also of the land tax. The minute of consultation of the Madras Government remained unanswered for seven years. In 1857 the Revenue Board of Madras in a public letter expressed a strong opinion on this point in contrasting the ryotwar system of Madras and Bombay. An extract from the proceedings of the Board of Revenue, dated the 15th of July, 1857, No. 2,400, is as follows:—

“Paragraph 13. It may not here be out of place to notice that a general opinion prevails in England that the Bombay settlement for thirty years secures a far greater permanence of tenure to the landholder than the present ryotwary tenure of Madras.

“This is altogether an error, for a Madras ryot is able to retain his land in perpetuity without any increase of assessment as long as he continues to fulfil his engagements.”

All the ryots had to do in each presidency was to pay their land tax punctually, which was ordered by the authorities to be light, unvarying, laid on the land, and not on the crop. The Bombay Government reserved to itself power at the end of thirty years to reconsider the rate of assessment, to raise or to lower it, depending on the rise or fall of price. The Madras Government, according to the construction they put on the ryotwar tenure and land tax of that presidency, reserved no such power, as the ryot held both in perpetuity. At the same time in both presidencies the ryot is only liable for the assessment on the land which he holds in occupation. He has the privilege of transferring by gift or by sale, or to resign to the Government any field of his holding, and thus frees himself of his liability for paying the assessment on the land so given up. The ryot can extend his occupation by taking up fresh land by giving notice to the collector of his intention, and he, consequently, must pay the assessment fixed on that piece of land. In 1858 an order appears to have been sent out to the Madras Government from the Secretary of State in Council placing Madras on the same footing as Bombay, by giving the Government power to reconsider the rate of assessment of the land tax at the end of thirty years. It is a very objectionable course of proceeding to allow the Revenue Board to publish a new system of land tenures in the presidency without the sanction of the highest authority, as it is understood by the Natives that all orders issued by that body emanate with the authorities at home, and consequently become permanent. Your Lordships will naturally ask to what class of land are the fields that the ryots resign to Government transferred? The statement showing the extent and assessment of cultivable lands in the several districts of the Madras Presidency at the absolute disposal of Government is distinguished under three heads. 1st. Circar Ayacut—namely, Government land, after deducting Perumboke or immemorial waste, and Juams or rent-free lands. 2nd. The quantity of this land in occupation of ryots is stated to be 13,207,602 acres of irrigated and unirrigated land. 3rd. The remaining waste or culturable land at the absolute disposal of Government is 13,554,333 acres; and if you select Bellary and Coimbatore, which are known to grow a good quality of cotton, those two districts united have an area of 4,800,000 acres of cultivable waste at the absolute disposal of Government. From this it would appear, as Europeans can hold such land on the same tenure as Natives, there should be no difficulty in supplying their wants. It must be remembered, however, that most of this waste land is reported to be in small patches, and so intermixed with the cultivable lands in occupation of the ryots. The desire, however, of the European being to purchase lands laying contiguous, or within a ring fence. It would be difficult to find so large a property as a European capitalist would desire to possess under these circumstances, unless he purchases land from the native ryots, and so squares his property, he cannot gain his object. I shall now draw your Lordships' attention to the land tenure on building land, and land occupied by buildings in Madras. The following is the Government order for its disposal:—

“Land hereinafter sought for building purposes by Europeans or Natives, will be put up to auction sale, and sold out and out to the highest bidder, the upset price being twenty times the amount of the yearly quit rent or tax on the land. As soon as the transaction is concluded Government will give a freehold title deed.”

The local governments have had the power since 1837 of granting freeholds in land for building purposes. This power has only been fully carried out since 1859. Government resolved to make the order applicable also to the whole of the land on the Neilgherry, the Shevaroy and Pulney Hills, and to the coffee lands in the Wynaud-Talook. In the last mentioned case it will generally be the land tax, only that is redeemed, not the proprietor's fee or rent. Where the proprietor's right is vested in the Government they will be prepared to allow the redemption of the rent also. The Government is the proprietor of these lands, except where the Zemindars in Malabar or Wynaud have forest rights. In the Neilgherries any rights the Todac have are settled by arbitration. At Tatallo the ground on which the Wellington Barracks are built Government allowed an arbitration, and compounded with the Todas by a money payment. The foregoing contemplates the redemption and extinction of the land tax, by the payment of a sum equal to twenty years tax or quit rent. The next point to which I shall allude, is the first, second, and third class roads and canals in the Presidency of Madras and Bombay. Before referring to the returns made by the India Office on this head, I may remind your Lordships, that in 1844, by order of the noble Earl, then Governor General, 40 lacs, or £400,000 of transit duties were repealed in the Madras Presidency, for relief to commerce; and in 1845 the Court of Directors sanctioned a sum of four lacs to be annually expended on the Trunk Roads of the Presidency, and it took three years to get the road establishment into working order. The second and third class roads are under the management of the different collectors, through whose districts they pass. In some districts they are very good: their state depends on the taste of the collectors for making roads, as no fixed allowance is sanctioned by Government for that purpose. From the year 1848 the returns commence, which show that up to 1859, 654 miles of first class roads, 3,709 miles of second and third class roads, and 502 miles of navigable canal, have been opened for traffic in the Madras Presidency, being in all, 4,905 miles of land and water carriage communication, at an expense of 1 croze and 14 lacs, or in English money £1,140,000 sterling; and the Governor General has lately sanctioned the expenditure of such sums of money in the different Presidencies as may be necessary to keep the district roads in fair order. These roads in the cotton districts, which in many cases are near the sea, have all been made with a reference to the convenience of traffic between the fields of production and the trunk road and railroad leading to the sea. In Bombay and Scinde, since 1848, of first, second, and third class roads and navigable canals, 6,896 miles have been opened for traffic. So that in the two Presidencies 11,801 miles of communication have been opened since 1847. Your Lordships must remember that the material for making roads is difficult to be obtained in a champagne country, and it has generally to be brought from a considerable distance, which very much enhances its price. From what I hear of the roads in Bombay and Madras, they are in very fair condition—very much improved of late years—and the authorities are quite alive to the absolute necessity of continuing their exertions in the same direction, for affording facility of transit to commerce. I now turn to the railroads which are under construction,—if I look to the southern point of India, on the maps published by orders of the House of Commons, showing the course of the trunk railways in that country, I find one from Negapatam to Palamacotah, leading through the centre of Maduva and the east side of Tumevella, both cotton districts, each having a terminus on the sea coast. From Madras a railroad will be opened to Calicut, on the west coast, at the end of this year, which will pass through the centre of the Coimbatore cotton district. Another railroad from Bombay to Madras will pass through the cotton district of Sholapoor, the border of the Douale of Raichore, through Bellary, Caddapah, and the south end of Kurnoul, having a seaport at each terminus. The district of North Canava has been handed over to the Presidency of Bombay, and is about to have a second road made down the Coompta Ghaut to connect the cotton district of Dharwar with Shedashagur, the new sea port for the convenience of trade. From Bombay a railroad is to connect that port with Allahabad, on the great line of railroad leading from Calcutta to Lahore. It will pass through Candeish by Nursevabad and Tublepoor round the north-west side of the Berar cotton country. A branch is to lead from Nursevabad to Nagpore, which will pass Oomroutee, the principal market for cotton in the north district of that far-famed valley for growing a superior quality of cotton, which is in extent of area four times the size of Ireland. The principal portion of the valley of Berar has no prospect of a railroad being carried through it. But the river Godavery, with its tributary streams, the Wurdah and Poornah, traverses those parts at a distance from railroad communication, and they only require the hand of the engineer to make them permanently navigable. Their eligibility for purposes of navigation has been pointed out by that eminent pioneer, Sir Arthur Cotton, whose time and thoughts have so long been engaged in laying down plans for improving the irrigation and navigation of the rivers in different parts of India, and recorded by Captain Haig, an officer of engineers, well known for his experience and ingenuity in making rivers useful for purposes of navigation and irrigation, who has made surveys of the river and who has pointed out all the difficulties to be overcome in the bed of the Godavery. This officer has examined the rivers in America as well as in Europe, and reports that there are fewer difficulties in the Godavery than in many of the rivers to which his report refers in these parts. His report has been considered by the Governor in Council of the Madras Presidency, and has met with his highest approbation and recommendation to the Supreme Government of India to carry out Captain Haig's report. The resident of the Nizam at Hyderabad, Colonel Davidson, who is well acquainted with the Nagpore portion of the valley of Berar, as well as that which forms a part of the Nizam's territory, observes that the impetus which will be given to trade when the navigation of the Godavery is opened out will invite capital, and that population invariably follows is known to be an unerring law. We may, therefore, reasonably look forward to a large extent of waste land at no very distant period being brought under profitable cultivation. The Governor General in Council has all the information he can require to satisfy him on the advantage the manufacturers of cotton at Manchester and Glasgow would derive from the navigation of the Godavery being opened permanently. In a military and political point of view, statements and calculations on the economy of using the Godavery river for the conveyance of troops and stores in preference to the common road tracks of the country, have been submitted by the Madras Government to the Commander-in-Chief, the Inspector General of Ordnance, the Commissary General, the President at Hyderabad, and to the Commissioner of Nagpore, and the actual annual expense, so far as it can be represented in figures, now incurred in the conveyance of military stores to Hyderabad and Nagpore by the land route has been determined, and it is found to be about £18,350. The cost of transit of the above quantity of stores by the Godavery route would be £2,483; and the impression the above information appears to have produced on the mind of the Madras Governor is a thorough conviction of the desirableness of having the impediments to the navigation of the Godavery removed. He has, consequently, sanctioned three lacs, or £30,000, to be spent this year on that operation, four lacs in 1862, four more in 1864. The cause of his Excellency having limited the sum is said to be occasioned by the deranged state of the finances, in consequence of the mutiny. Now, my Lords, I must call to your recollection what I stated to be the grounds of the petition—

And they point out that India possesses the capability of meeting the requirements of this country, not only as a source for the supply of cotton, but also as affording a market for the products of their industry. They further call attention to the advantage which must accrue to India, and to the cotton trade and commerce of this country, by the speedy opening of the navigation of the River Godavery. I believe the statement of the petitioners is founded on reasonable expectations. Is it necessary for me to remind your Lordships what would be the effect of four millions of our manufacturing population being put out of employment, should the alarming prospects of your petitioners be realized? and what prudent man would risk such an unfortunate state of things when it can be partially, if not wholly, remedied by the expenditure in time of so small a sum of money as that named by Captain Haig, to have the Godavery made navigable—an object so earnestly pointed out by your petitioners? I ask your Lordships whether it is not the duty of the Houses of Parliament to indemnify Her Majesty's Government under such circumstances, to raise a loan for the particular purpose of offering a cheap transit for cotton from the valley of Berar to the port of Covinga? The distance from Oomroutee by the railroad to Bombay is 470 miles. A ton of cotton going to Bombay must first ascend 2,000 feet to pass the Western Ghauts, and then descend 3,000 to the port, at a cost, according to the authority of the chief engineer of the Bombay and Nagpore line, of 2½*d.* per ton per mile. Oomroutee, by the Wurdah and Godavery, including the contemplated canal to be made from Oomroutee to Natchengong, to which town the river navigation will be made complete, is a distance from Covinga of 530 miles, having a descent of 900 feet to that port; and Captain Haig, the engineer who has surveyed the river, calculated that when the arrangements which attend the opening of the river for navigation are complete, such as steamers, boats, &c., the cost of carriage on the Godavery of a ton of cotton per mile ought not to exceed half that on the American rivers, or from one to three pice, ¼th to ⅓ths of a penny, per ton per mile during nine months of the year. If the manufacturers of England would gain so much by the cheap and speedy carriage of their cotton by the navigation of the Godavery being opened to Covinga, what inestimable advantages it would also afford to the Native cultivator to have a cheap transit for his hemp, oil, seeds, hides, and other agricultural produce to the sea port, which are now conveyed on the backs of bullocks, or on miserable country carts, over tracks not deserving the name of roads. We must not forget that salt would be conveyed into the interior of the country, as a return cargo, at so trifling a cost as would place it within the reach and means of the Native to purchase it as a substitute for the earth salt, which is now the cause of so much disease to those living at a distance from the sea. An additional benefit would also be afforded to our merchants by a cheap transit for their manufactures to the markets of the Nagpore, as well as the Hyderabad territories. The expense of effecting this great object of economy will be at a cost of £300,000 to open the river for purposes of navigation, and an equal sum of £300,000 for making it a permanent work. I have now touched on those points of the petition on which I am enabled to form an opinion, founded on such information as I possess. I shall conclude by reminding your Lordships that India holds a prominent position in the minds of our fellow-countrymen. It contains much within her territories that will make her a valuable acquisition to Great Britain. She is worthy of your Lordships' experience in the establishment of efficient courts of law, which will afford protection to the ryot as well as security to capital and the means of enforcing the just fulfilment of contracts, and if our merchants will create a permanent demand for her raw produce, in return she will afford an ample market for all kinds of our manufactures.

LORD HARRIS said, he gathered from the terms of the memorial presented by the noble Marquess that the object of the memorialists was to insure such measures by the Government as would give every encouragement to the outlay of capital. He believed that British capital would be expended in India with very fair prospect of a good return. As regards works of irrigation he knew, for the calculation had been made under his own direction, that the works in Tanjore had exceeded 100 per cent annual profit. On the Godavery returns had also been received, and he had known instances where the great Native proprietors would have been willing to advance money at 5 per cent to Government, to be expended in irrigation works by Government officers, on which a large profit could be made, but unfortunately the local Government had not the power to take up loans for such purposes. The memorialists alluded to a change in the tenure of land. He would most seriously deprecate any interference with the customs of the Natives, in that respect we had already received a severe lesson against arousing the fears and apprehensions of the Natives, and he knew no subject on which they were more jealous than that of the tenure of land. Much more had been done to facilitate communications than was generally supposed; the Government of India would have sanctioned more but for the pecuniary difficulties which the mutiny had entailed. He would not presume to enter upon the subject of the descriptions of cotton. He had no doubt that a large supply would be received, though probably not of the best sort.

LORD BROUGHAM was sure he only spoke the sentiments of every one of their Lordships when he offered to the noble Marquess his cordial thanks for the able and instructive statement he had made. He agreed with his noble Friend in thinking that the petitioners from Glasgow and Manchester, with a view to increase the supply of cotton from India, ought to send over persons duly authorized by them to make the cultivators sure of a market by making arrangements for the purchase of their goods. With respect to the deficiency that might be occasioned by those most lamentable and deplorable events that were taking place in the United States—if he could still call them the “United” States—there were many difficulties in the way of receiving cotton from the East Indies as a substitute for American cotton. The climate on the other side of the Atlantic was, in many respects, much superior to that of India for the production of cotton. Their Lordships were aware that what was called Sea Island cotton was, beyond all comparison, the best cotton that was produced, and that was, no doubt, the result of climate; for the production of that cotton required not merely a moist climate, but a mixture in the atmosphere of saline particles with the moisture. He understood that the samples of cotton which came from India brought about 5*d.* a pound in the market, while cotton from America, and from those colonies to which he had called their Lordships’ attention a few nights back, brought as much as 9*d.*, 10*d.*, 1*s.*, and even 1*s.* 2*d.* a pound. There was nothing more certain than the capacity of our own West India Colonies to produce the best sorts of cotton. In Jamaica alone there were, he would not say millions, but hundreds of thousands of acres fit for the cultivation of the best quality of cotton, while there was a sufficient supply of hands among the free people of colour. White people as well as these people had two objections to work on the sugar plantations. In the first place, the labour under the sun of the country was too severe for whites; and, in the next, free people of colour had the natural objection to it that it was slaves’ work. There had been efforts made in other colonies—in Trinidad and Demerara, for instance—to increase the number of hands, and this had led to the doubtful policy of advancing large sums of money for the purpose of encouraging immigration, which sums of money were advanced by way of loan, the interest to be paid by the planters. No doubt, there were objections to this system of immigration, and it ought not, on any account, to be allowed to take place in any colony where there was not an absolute want of hands. In Jamaica he might say, from information he had received, that the number of hands was almost unlimited, at least as regarded cotton lands. The same observation applied to Demerara and Trinidad. There was no difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of hands for the cultivation of cotton in those colonies, and he believed that as much cotton could be obtained from them as would supply the utmost probable—he would not say possible—deficiency likely to arise from the deplorable state of things in the United States. The supply of cotton from India at present did not amount to more than a ninth or tenth part of the quantity that came from America; but there would be no difficulty in obtaining from our West Indian Colonies, or from the growing source of supply on the African coast, as much cotton as would make up for any deficiency that might arise in the supply from the United States.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH :— My Lords, it is quite impossible to over-rate the importance of the question to which my noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Tweeddale) has called our attention; and I must express, as my noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) has done, my deepest thanks to him for the statement he has made. I think the House cannot but be grateful to the noble Marquess for the attention he has paid to this subject and for the speech he has favoured us with—a speech full of valuable information, which it would be extremely difficult to obtain from any number of blue books, but which my noble Friend has placed before your Lordships in a most useful and instructive manner. To a very large portion of the population of this country cotton is food—it can be regarded in no other light—and if the supply were seriously reduced, the reduction would affect, not one, but every interest in the country. It would affect our commerce all over the world; it would greatly diminish our exports; it would greatly diminish our facilities of obtaining the means of support, and altogether impair the strength of our resources. Feeling this, and not entertaining all the sanguine views which my noble and learned Friend has expressed with reference to probable large arrivals of cotton from our West Indian colonies, I confess I feel deep alarm at the state of things on the continent of America. I am aware that certain measures are suggested by the petitioners with the view of obtaining supplies from other sources. It may be good and prudent to adopt those measures, but not one of them meets the emergency; and, therefore, what I should wish to know from Her Majesty's Government is, whether they have any plans in view—and, if so, what they are—to meet the difficulty which has come upon us? That difficulty is not one which has come on gradually, and which could have been perceived from year to year; it is a pressure that has come on us suddenly; and I am sure I only give expression to that which must be in the minds of all your Lordships when I venture to observe that if there be any measures—no matter what they may be, or how much they may interfere with our ordinary rules of action—by which we can meet the emergency, it is our duty to adopt them. No doubt successive Governments and successive Governor Generals have done a great deal to improve the cultivation of cotton in India. I wish I could say that they have accomplished what we must all wish to have been the result. But there can be no doubt that they have proved this—that under favourable circumstances India can produce, though not in very large quantities, cotton equal to the best cotton from America. I will further observe that, having considered this matter so long back as twenty years ago, I still adhere to an opinion which I have for a considerable time entertained—namely, that the cotton which succeeds best in India is the indigenous cotton well cultivated. That succeeds better than any imported from abroad. No doubt it is of short staple, and not, perhaps, fit for the superior purposes to which some cotton is in this country applied. Many of our merchants are desirous of colonizing India, and getting possession of large quantities of land there for the purposes of cultivation; but owing to the system under which property is distributed in India it is impossible, without violating existing rights, to get possession of any considerable portion of the land; and we must not, to accommodate these persons, destroy the rights of the Natives. But I should think that, of all things, the most imprudent which any capitalist adventuring his money in India in the purchase of cotton could do would be to attempt to get possession of a large quantity of land in India for the purpose of planting and cultivating it. The safest thing for any person to do is to turn his capital as often as he can, to keep it in his own hands, to have no fixed place of residence, to use as much as possible the agency of the Natives, to buy what he can and to sell how he can. No doubt the Governors have at different times done as much as they could; but they have not been assisted to the extent they ought to have been—indeed, I do not know that they have been assisted at all—by the merchants of England. The only thing that can facilitate the continuous production of cotton in India is a continuous demand for it; and that demand has never been afforded. It is, therefore, a little too hard to throw the blame on the different Governments, and to expect that they should have brought about a state of things by which an enormous quantity of the raw material of our most important manufacture should have been ready to meet the demand arising from the present emergency. I think it obvious that that would have been impossible. I must say, too, that, looking at the state of things now existing in Bengal and Behar—when I see that the Anglo-Saxons, where they have occupied land to a great extent and existed as cultivators for a considerable number of years—unfortunately, perhaps, as a result of their occupation, and perhaps unwittingly, have led to a state of things by which the most tranquil and peaceable part of our Indian dominions has been brought to the verge of a general agrarian insurrection—going not merely to the length of the non-performance of civil contracts, but to the extent of a refusal to pay rent for land—a state of things which was never heard of in that country before—when I see that in order to protect the interests of those planters it has been thought necessary to move large bodies of troops and battalions of armed police, and to pass an Act to make the non-performance of a civil contract a criminal offence; when I see these things, I confess I cannot say that this is the most favourable time at which gentlemen could ask Parliament to make arrangements for the first time for their introduction, as planters, into India. When at Allahabad, I recollect seeing near the cutcherry of the Commissioner a small plot of ground, not exceeding one or two acres, on which, like a sensible man, he had resolved to show the Natives the difference between their own mode of cultivation of cotton, and the improved method employed in the United States of America. One half of the land was devoted to the old system, and the other half to the new. Any one who went on the ground would in a moment see the enormous difference in the produce. This was not affected by the application of machinery, or by any extraordinary amount of labour, but by the more instructed application of labour. Having left the little field the visitor entered a small building, containing only two rooms, into one of which the cotton was conveyed to be cleansed, and into the other of which it was conveyed when cleansed. The visitor saw the article in its dirty state in one room; but in the other he was overwhelmed with flakes of the most beautiful snow. That little field and those little rooms told the whole history of the present difficulties and of the future prosperity of India in regard to the cotton cultivation. I recollect that there were Americans there who had superintended the cotton plantations, and they all concurred with me in opinion that if the Government could only do in other places, where cotton was cultivated, what that gentleman had done in that place at his own expense, an example and instruction would be given which could not fail to have a most important effect upon the produce. At Allahabad the thing was done; an example was set, instruction was given with that example, and the result was advantageous. I ventured to suggest to the Court of Directors that the plan was worthy of imitation; but, certainly, my suggestion was not very favourably received; and when, in addition, I suggested that the great object of England should be to make herself independent of America for the supply of cotton, and that India could furnish the largest portion of what was required—it being a matter of comparatively small importance whether it was found in the territories of our allies or in our own—I was met with a sneer. Within three weeks after I went to the Board of Control, in 1828, I addressed the Court of Directors upon the subject of the cultivation of cotton, and since that time I have felt the deepest interest in the endeavours which have been made to render our country independent of the United States for the supply of the raw material of our most important manufacture. My Lords, I fear that it is not to a present emergency only that we have to look. I confess that I cannot look forward with any degree of hope to the early re-establishment in the United States of a state of things which would enable us to calculate with confidence on drawing the same, or anything like the same, supply of cotton that we have hitherto obtained from that quarter. We must, I take it, be prepared for a state of things which will oblige us to depend mainly on India, but also on other countries, for that supply of cotton which is essential to the commerce of this Empire, and, therefore, I await with great anxiety to hear what the noble Earl the Under Secretary for India may tell us as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government on a subject of such national importance.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he entirely agreed in the opinion expressed by the noble Lord who had previously addressed the House, as to the great importance of this subject, and he also concurred in thanking the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Tweeddale) for the important remarks which his experience had suggested. It was impossible to over-estimate at the present moment the importance of any question connected with the supply of cotton to this country, and, therefore, it was not surprising that the noble Marquess should have introduced the matter. He was happy to be able to say that there was on the part of Her Majesty's Government a general concurrence with the views of the noble Marquess. He was not, however, able to agree entirely in what he understood to be the prayer of the petition. The noble Earl who had just sat down (the Earl of Ellenborough) had asked whether Her Majesty's Government were about to adopt any special measures for the purpose of meeting the emergency which had arisen in consequence of the lamentable state of things that existed at the present time in our great cotton market, the United States? but he did not gather the nature of the measure he wished, or in what direction he thought Her Majesty's Government ought to advance to meet the difficulty.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had proposed before, and he now suggested again, that there should be repeated by the Government everywhere where the Natives were employed in the cultivation of cotton the same teaching and example which he had just described as having been set by the enterpriso of a private gentleman at Allahabad.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he had not understood the noble Earl to refer to that instance as a special measure to be adopted in the present crisis; but he would notice that point presently. With respect to measures of a wider and a more extensive nature, he was glad to find from the speech of the noble Earl that he was not inclined to add the weight of his high authority to one part of the prayer of the petitioners which related to the question of the land tenure in India. On behalf of the Government, he had no hesitation in saying that the Government in this country and in India were anxious and willing to afford every means consistent with the safety of the great source of Indian revenue, and with a due respect to the rights of the present occupiers of land in that country for the acquirement and occupation by Europeans of land in India. His own individual opinion agreed with that of the noble Earl that the best course for capitalists to take to promote the cotton supply from India would not be to get large tracts of land into their own hands. At the same time, it must not be inferred that the Government were unwilling to see Englishmen settle in India, in order to cultivate cotton. On the contrary, as far as cotton could be grown profitably, the cultivation of it by Europeans would be a benefit both to the Natives and to this country. When, however, the Government was asked to give facilities for the purchase of the fee simple of land in India—he supposed it was meant that the land should be put up for sale at an upset price, and that when once purchased it should be for the future free from all charges of land revenue—it would be unbecoming for him to attempt to add anything to the remarks of the noble Baron (Lord Harris). Whatever fell from the noble Baron was entitled to the highest consideration from their Lordships, not only from his intimate knowledge of the Madras Presidency, but from the great attention he had paid to this particular subject, and the beneficial and important changes which had been introduced under his auspices. Nothing, therefore, which fell from him (Earl de Grey) could add to the force of the noble Baron's remarks. He (Earl de Grey) would only add that the Government were not prepared to take a course which they believed would endanger a great source of Indian revenue, and interfere with the just rights of the ryots, who were not the mere tenants-at-will of the Government. He would proceed to consider the measure suggested by the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough). The noble Earl, in speaking of the results which in certain districts had attended the actual cultivation of indigo—results which he believed did not exist in the indigo districts elsewhere—said that amongst other measures had been the establishment of a law for making contracts penally enforceable.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I said that such a law did once exist.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that that was so. The present Bill relating to the same subject had not yet passed. The second reading, as the noble Earl was, no doubt, aware, was suspended for the present. He then came to the consideration of the measure which had been suggested by the noble Earl, and he did not deny that it was most important to have in each cotton district the means of showing to the ryots what description of cotton would suit the English market, the best manner of cultivation, and the best mode of preparing it. But it appeared to him that upon all sound economical principles it was more desirable that such information should be conveyed to the ryots through the means of those who required the supply of cotton than by the establishment of Government model farms in every district in India. Such establishments could not be nearly so well conducted, or be so satisfactorily adapted to express the wants of the English market, as those which were established expressly by those who were directly interested. He must say it did appear to him one of the most important steps which could be taken at the present moment by those who were interested in the growth of cotton, that they should themselves send out agents to the country, who should go into the districts, communicate directly with the cultivators, and explain to them the requirements of the market in England, without the intervention of the present series of middle men, in the hands of every one of whom the crop was subject to deterioration. He trusted that steps of that kind were likely to be adopted; but those duties devolved properly on those who were purchasers of cotton. There were other things which required to be done. One of the most important of these, which had been adverted to by the noble Marquess, was the increased facility of communication with the interior. With regard to this point he had to state that, in spite of the financial difficulties in which India was now involved, it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to suspend the carrying out of those important branches of communication, the railways. It was thought necessary that those works should be brought as speedily as possible to completion. The noble Marquess, however, spoke not only of railways, but of another most important means of communication; he meant that which would be afforded by the river Godavery, if the navigation were improved and made available for the conveyance of cotton to the sea. Certain sums had been already voted by the Government of India for the carrying out of these works; and that very day a despatch had been received from the Madras Presidency stating that it was intended to apply, during the remaining portion of the then financial year, the whole of the sums that had been voted for the improvement of the Godavery. The petitioners suggested that Government should call for a loan to complete those great undertakings; but their Lordships must bear in mind the large demands that would be made this year upon the money market for the completion of railways in India. It was impossible for him then to enter into details, as the Secretary of State for India had given notice that on Monday he should make a statement upon that subject, and he would not anticipate him. He could only say that, however willing and anxious Her Majesty's Government might be to complete the scheme, it was very doubtful whether, looking at the sums which the right hon. Gentleman might have to obtain from the money market for the completion of railways, either by direct loans, or through the railways themselves, the Government would be able to raise an additional sum for that purpose. He understood from a casual observation that fell from the noble Marquess, that, besides land tenure in India and facilities of communication, one other point was alluded to by the petitioners—namely, the extension of civil courts, the improvement of procedure in India, and the enactment of some such law as that very measure which the noble Earl had condemned so strongly. With regard to the extension of civil courts in India, there was every disposition on the part of the Government to extend them whenever the case would justify such a measure; as the necessity arose they would be extended. With regard to procedure, undoubtedly there had been the very great evil of delay; but the code of civil procedure passed in 1859 had now come into operation, and from the reports received he believed it would be found that the results were most important and satisfactory. He trusted this would remove a large portion of the objections which had been urged by the petitioners, and which he believed applied more to the former than to the present state of things. He did not think there was any other point alluded to in the course of the debate on which it was necessary for him to offer any explanations. With regard to measures taken by the Government for dealing with this emergency he could only say that every effort would be made, consistently with the urgent demands of Indian finance, to open communications and increase facilities for bringing cotton from the cotton districts to the coast. But in dealing with questions affecting the finance of India they must not overlook what was due to that country from which the Indian revenues were raised; and it was their bounden duty to bring the finances of India at the earliest possible period into a sound and satisfactory position. He could at the same time assure the noble Marquess, and those in whose behalf he had presented this petition, that the Government were fully sensible of the vast importance of the question to which he had called the attention of their Lordships. The constant attention of his right hon. Friend was devoted to it, and whatever could be done, consistently with sound principles and with what was due to the Natives of India, would be done to facilitate the supply of cotton from India to this country.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH : The simple plan I suggested was this—to teach the people of India generally in the cotton districts how, by the same amount of labour, better applied, they may raise much cotton instead of little, and good instead of bad, and afford them the means of cleaning their cotton—as essential as their raising it. That measure, if adopted, possesses the advantage, which no other offers ; it affects the very next crop ; it may nearly double the quantity of usable cotton produced next season. I ask this as food for the people, and the noble Earl gives me a small piece of political economy. My Lords, I see, and I regret to see, in the speech of the noble Earl the proof that Her Majesty's Government do not comprehend the extent of the danger with which we are threatened, and that they are not prepared to meet, as they ought, the emergency that has arisen.

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

EXPLANATION.

MR. COWPER said, he wished to explain a remark that fell from him on Tuesday evening with respect to the Thames Embankment Bill. He had stated that the Bill was promoted by the London, Dover, and Chatham Railway Company. This he found was a mistake. The Company had working powers under the Act, and their terminus was one of the termini of the Embankment Bill. But the measure was promoted by a separate Company, quite independent of any Railway.

POST OFFICE GRIEVANCES.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Post Office Report will be laid before Parliament, and what Her Majesty's Government are prepared to do for the redress of grievances in the Post Office ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that not only one Report, but several Papers relating to the internal administration of the Metropolitan Post Office were now under the consideration of the Government, involving a great many details with regard to the different classes of persons in that Department and their relations to one another. With regard to laying these Papers before Parliament, he was unable to give any answer to the hon. and learned Baronet, but he hoped very shortly to be in a condition to make known to the House the decision to which Her Majesty's Government would come upon the subjects embraced in these Papers.

THE INDIAN NAVY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he would now beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, If any decision has been arrived at with regard to the future of the Indian Navy ; and if so, when it will be made known ? Has the Report of the Civil Finance Commission (recommending a wholesale reduction of the Indian Navy on economical grounds) been received by Government ; and if it is their intention to adopt the Report ? If a reduction or abolition of the Service is contemplated, what course is it the intention of Government to pursue with regard to the Officers ?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in answer to the question of the hon. Baronet, that he had only to state that no decision had been arrived at with regard to the future of the Indian Navy, and, therefore, he could not say when it would be made known. It was true that the Report of the Civil Finance Commission in India, or rather a despatch from the Governor General of India, recommending a large reduction of the Indian Navy on economical grounds had been received by the Government, and would be brought under the consideration of the Secretary of State for India in Council. He could not then state what the intention of the Government might be with regard to it.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to state what course the Government intended to pursue with regard to the Officers of the service.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, his hon. and learned Friend would understand, when he stated that the subject would be brought under his consideration as Secretary of State for India in Council, that it was impossible for him then to say what his determination ultimately might be.

FRESCOES IN THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the first Commissioner of Works, Whether he has been informed that the frescoes in the Houses of Parliament are showing symptoms of decay; and, if so, whether he will institute proper inquiries to ascertain the cause of such decay?

MR. COWPER said, that the frescoes both in the corridor of the House of Commons and the House of Lords were in a perfect condition; but any hon. Member who looked at the frescoes in the upper hall would see that there were upon those frescoes some symptoms of discoloration. In two of those frescoes, especially, there were some places where the colouring had faded, and others where it had come off in flakes. He had, however, no intention to institute any inquiry on the subject, because he thought it was very palpable what the cause of the decay arose from. It could not have arisen from the dampness of the wall, for there was a considerable interval between the plastering upon which the fresco was painted and the wall itself. But as those frescoes were the earliest painted in this country, and painted at a time when there was very little experience in the production of that sort of art, he thought it was evident that the failures that had occurred had arisen from a want of experience on the part of the painters as to the use of their colours, and as to their application of them. The defects, such as they were, were easily remedied, because frescoes had that advantage that it was very easy to get at any defective part, and insert new and fresh pieces.

NEW ZEALAND—NATIVE COUNCIL. QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Bill passed by the New Zealand Legislature for constituting a Native Council, differing in its relation to the Colonial Government, from the Bill of last Session, has received Her Majesty's assent and confirmation?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, his noble Friend the Colonial Secretary had announced in "another place" that he had invited Sir George Grey to place his services at the disposal of the Government as the Governor of New Zealand. His duty would be to bring to a conclusion, if possible, the unhappy war now raging, and, in the second place, to consider the whole question of native administration, putting it, if he could, upon a better footing for the future. Under these circumstances the Government, wishing to leave Sir George Grey free to deal with these questions, did not think it their duty at present to sanction the Bill alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, but would review the whole question when it was reported upon by Sir George Grey.

CHURCH ESTATES IN THE DIOCESE OF WORCESTER.—QUESTION.

MR. G. HARDY said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Kilmarnock, Why Lessces of Church Estates within the diocese of Worcester who had made contracts for the enfranchisement of their Leaseholds prior to the late avoidance of that see, and hold the money ready for that purpose, are delayed in the completion of those contracts for want of the usual Order in Council; whether the delay in issuing such order arises from any conflict of opinion upon the meaning of the existing Law; and, if so, whether any legislative measure is contemplated to relieve, as soon as possible, such Lessces from their difficulties?

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the Bishop of Worcester, who died a few months ago, was empowered under certain Acts of Parliament, with the consent of the Church Estates Commissioners, to enfranchise the leaseholds held under his see. Previous to his death some forty-five agreements for enfranchisement were entered into by him with the consent of the Commissioners, and property to the amount of £80,000 or £100,000 was thus waiting for the completion of the sale to the lessees. By an Act passed last year upon the death of the late Bishop his estates as Bishop were vested in the Church Commissioners, and it remained for them in the performance of their duty to complete the sale to the purchasers in all these cases. They accordingly prepared a scheme for an Order in Council empowering the Commissioners to sell the estates of the Bishop which were so vested in them. To that scheme, however, objection was taken in the Council Office on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown. He understood that they advised the President of the Council that a scheme for a general Order for the sale of all the estates of a See was contrary to law, and could not be sanctioned by the Queen in Council, and that the proceedings so far taken were useless and invalid. Now, he was told that upwards of 200 Orders in Council of this nature had been passed during the last twelve years for the sale of estates in bulk, thus enabling the Commissioners to sell the estates in parcels to the various lessees. Property to the amount of about £5,000,000 sterling had been sold under these Orders, and no objection had ever been taken to the validity of those Orders by the astute gentlemen the conveyancers of Lincoln's Inn, who had been consulted by the purchasers in these various cases. Now for the first time, however, this objection was taken, and the practical result would be that, as suggested by the Law Officers of the Crown, in every sale of the reversion of a church estate, were it small or great, a separate scheme must be submitted to the Privy Council for the sanction of the Queen in Council. One consequence of this was very important. Each scheme was submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, and on each a fee was charged by them. He was assured that if this view of the law had been taken in the first instance, and if this rule had been insisted upon with respect to the 200 Orders in Council which had been passed, affecting the sale of no fewer than 1,300 different estates, the Law Officers of the Crown within the last twelve years, for simply saying whether an Order in Council was in conformity with the Act of Parliament or not, would have received a sum of not less than £32,000. The Commissioners, he need hardly say, had no interest except to facilitate the purchase of the reversion by the lessees, and had been only anxious to discharge the duties cast upon them by the Act of Parliament. This objection, now started for the first time by the Law Officers, had brought the sale of these estates to a dead lock, and unless it were removed, or unless an Act of Parliament were passed, there would be really an end of the practical functions of the Church Commissioners with respect to the sale of the reversions of episcopal and capitular estates.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee of Supply read.

On Motion that the House do go into Committee of Supply—

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Committee of 1858 on the comparative merits of the Enfield and Whitworth rifles, and to ask whether any subsequent steps had been taken to determine the relative superiority of these two arms? Experiments were carried on during the years 1857 and 1858, and the Committee recommended that the inquiry should be pursued, in order that the country might know which was the best arm. The Committee made a Report in 1858, but almost every member who signed it appended to it a statement showing that differed from it in some important particulars. One member gave an opinion in favour of the Whitworth; another officer of equal intelligence and experience thought the Enfield the superior arm. In the meantime the House was called on to vote large sums of money annually for Enfield rifles without having any assurance that it was the best, and that they would not be called on at some future time to substitute for them some other and superior weapon. In the face of the contradictory statements of the officers of the Committee he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War would state to the House whether any further inquiry would be made on the subject?

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

EXPLANATION.

MR. ESMONDE: Sir, I rise to detain the House for a very few minutes on a matter in some degree personal to myself. In the course of the debate of last evening, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs alluded to a transaction which he said affected the honour and the character of the Government. At the time I was under the impression—and there were many Irish Members who agreed with me—that there was another class of persons whose character and honour were also affected, and I, therefore, communicated with my noble friend the Member for the town of Galway (Lord Dunkellin), who was one of the persons most prominently interested in the transaction; and, in common with many others of the Irish Members, I requested of him to rise for the purpose of removing the impression which must have remained upon the Committee. The noble Lord, however, was not sufficiently fortunate in catching the eye of Mr. Massey, and, therefore, the Committee went to a division very unfavourably impressed with reference to the Irish Members. At a subsequent period the noble Lord at the head of the Government gave an account of the transaction, which, when informed of it—for I was not present at the time—filled me with surprise. The noble Lord gave an account of the meeting which took place between himself and a reverend gentleman. Now, for my part, I rise to vindicate my personal honour, as well as the honour of several other Members for Ireland, who have requested me to do so, and to declare that the rev. gentleman was totally unauthorized to make the statement which he did. If any such a proposition as the noble Lord describes was made, I cannot find that he had any authority for it—it was a most unwarranted and impertinent interference. I shall not detain the House by dilating on these circumstances, but I am sure hon. Gentlemen can well imagine that our feelings must have been hurt by what has taken place; and I am sure the House is aware that there are gentlemen in Ireland as well as in England. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs said he alluded to the matter because it had been commented on by a paper that was universally read. It must be remembered, however, that that paper is not very friendly to Ireland; and this very day there is another insulting article in it on the subject. I am obliged to the House for allowing me to make this personal explanation, and I trust that for the future, though, of course, the noble Lord could only speak according to the information given to him, such accusations as these will not be believed without strict inquiry.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

AFFAIRS OF CHINA.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. DUNLOP said, he rose to move that an Address be presented to Her Majesty on the subject of the neutrality to be observed towards the two contending parties in China. He trusted hon. Gentlemen opposite would regard his Motion with favour, as it tended to the object, so often urged during the late debate on the Budget of cheapening tea to the lower classes, though, perhaps, in a different way from what they recommended. The House had lately received much valuable information on the subject to which he wished to direct the attention of the House, from the mercantile expedition that had proceeded with Admiral Hope up the Yang-tse-Kiang, that mighty river which ran into the heart of China; and from the reports of these merchants they might judge of the extent to which commerce could be carried on. But that river was occupied on both banks, from Chin-Kiang to near Han-Kow, by the insurgents; so that if we were to carry on a trade at all there, we must either be on friendly terms with them, or we must maintain a strong naval force at various points. All the information we had on the subject of the insurgents was derived from Mr. Oliphant's account and blue books, which were for the most part derived from the same sources, and he did not think that they furnished all the information which ought to be laid before the House. His confidence in blue books had not at all been strengthened by the lax manner in which, on the debate on the Affghan papers, the two noble Lords on the Treasury bench justified the liberties taken with public documents before they were produced to the House. There were strong proofs in this China blue book that the practices then justified had not been given up. In a despatch to the Earl of Malmesbury, dated November 5, 1858, the Earl of Elgin said—

“Your Lordship, perhaps, remembers that on the eve of the day on which the Treaty of Tientsin was signed I received a communication from the Chinese Commissioners to the effect that they would lose their heads if they agreed to allow British subjects to travel freely through the country for the purposes of trade.”

It was clear from the expression, “your Lordship perhaps remembers,” that the Earl of Elgin had informed the Earl of Malmesbury of the circumstance here referred to which indicated that these Commissioners had agreed to the stipulations in question that the treaty was concluded without the sanction of the Emperor, although on looking through the papers he could not find a word about such an important statement; and under these circumstances they could not rely with perfect confidence on the whole case being before them. But still there was enough to show that the professions of neutrality with respect to the rebels by our representatives in China were not maintained. The Taepings had waged war successfully with the Emperor of China for a long time, and were as much entitled to be recognized as belligerents as the Secession States of America. The Earl of Elgin, indeed, had ultimately given directions that while our vessels of war had occasion to approach the Taeping forts or cities they should give notice, but previously on two occasions in making an expedition up the Yangtso-Kiang, he himself, gave no notice to them, and when shots were fired to warn our ships we bombarded their forts, and assisted indirectly their enemies, the Imperialists. There might have been an excuse for our proceedings at Shanghai, in the protection demanded by our commercial interests, but the Earl of Elgin had abandoned that ground by claiming credit with the Emperor for acting hostilely to the Taepings. In point of fact, at the present moment a British force at Shanghai was doing service for the Imperial Government and receiving pay for it. Mr. Bruce stated, in one of his letters last year, that the cost of the garrisons would be defrayed by the Chinese authorities, and he added, "I think it well to assert firmly the principle that they shall pay for the assistance which we give them." We had maintained the great importance of keeping up our prestige in China; but here were British authorities by a voluntary act placing it in the power of the Emperor of China to point to our Queen as one of his vassals, providing troops for the defence of China, and receiving pay from him as if she were a vassal sovereign. Nothing, in his opinion, could be more inconsistent with the whole course of our policy or with the idea of our observing neutrality. There had, also, been civil as well as military violations of neutrality. By a notification dated in August, 1860, and issued by the British Consul at Shanghai, British subjects were warned not to hold any intercourse with the insurgents, and were told that to do so would be a violation of international law. The same principle had certainly not been applied to the Secession States of America, and British subjects had not been warned against holding intercourse with South Carolina. He did not ask that traders should be allowed to supply munitions of war to the Taepings or Imperialists. All he said was that they ought to be both treated alike. By the recent regulations, even which were much more favourable, in addition to the certificate of the Chinese Custom-house, a trader was obliged to procure a pass from the British Consul, which was granted only on the condition that the bearer should not visit any of the cities occupied by the insurgents. That, he held, was not neutrality, but a prohibition of all commerce on the part of British merchants with the insurgents. That state of things had been somewhat modified by later regulations, which at least implied that British vessels might visit insurgent ports, though conditions were still imposed calculated to restrict trade and to give rise to frequent differences and collisions. No British vessel was allowed to pass up the Yangtse-Kiang without having first cleared the Custom-house of the Emperor being obliged to enter a port in his possession for that purpose, and if it did not so clear it was declared liable to confiscation. Now, both Customs' duties and transit duties for internal traffic were included in the duties so paid, and if a British vessel sailed from this country or Hong Kong or Calcutta for Nankin it would first have to pay full duties to the Emperor, and then must pay over again to the Taepings on entering Nankin, or give occasion to a quarrel and collision with them by refusing; necessitating, of course, the keeping a British vessel of war at every port where our ships might enter for trade and where a collision was risked. He observed that the post of Chief Superintendent of the Chinese Customs had been offered to an officer in our service; but he did not know whether or not the offer had been accepted. He could not but regard it as very unfortunate that, under present circumstances, we should assume any charge over the Customs, or identify ourselves with the Imperial party. We ought to make an amicable arrangement with the insurgents, in order that we might not be obliged to keep a vessel of war in every port of the river where they had a post. The Taepings had shown throughout a most earnest desire to establish friendly relations with foreigners. He did not seek to justify any of the outrages of which they had been guilty, but he must say that nothing could be proved against them one-tenth so bad as the butcheries of Commissioner Yeh, or the atrocious treachery to which our unhappy officers were exposed at Peking, when they fell into the hands of the Tartars. It was only that day that he read in a Chinese newspaper that an Imperial regiment, when setting out—not on a war expedition, but merely to train some villagers in military exercises—sacrificed a human being at one of the gates of Shanghai, with every solemnity, in the presence of the district magistrate, and then smeared their colours with the blood of the victim. He trusted that the House would support his views, and treat both parties with impartiality. If he received from the noble Lord an assurance that a policy of non-intervention would be pursued in China he should be happy to withdraw his Motion. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

“To leave out from the word ‘That’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying, that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Representative in China, in the exercise of an impartial neutrality between the two contending parties in that Empire, to afford to British subjects equal facilities for commercial intercourse with both, and to seek to maintain a friendly understanding, for the purposes of trade, not only with the Imperial Government, but also with the de facto Rulers of Provinces which Her Majesty’s subjects have occasion to trade in, or to pass through, for commercial objects, so as to avoid all unnecessary risk of interruption of traffic or hostile collision,’”—instead thereof.

MR. BAXTER said, he rose to second the Motion. The state of our relations with China rendered the question of the highest importance, and, therefore, he was sorry to see so small an attendance of hon. Members. For his own part he held no strong opinions with regard to British policy in China; on the contrary, it had always appeared to him that there had been a little exaggeration on both sides as to the justice or the injustice of the course we had pursued in that country. But he must confess that after a calm and careful consideration of the papers which had been presented to the House, he had come to the conclusion that we were not pursuing a course of strict neutrality with regard to the contest which was going on in China; that there was a tendency on the part of some of our officials in that country to underrate and depreciate the power of the insurgents; and that, if that tendency were not checked by the noble Lord, there was great danger that we should speedily be engaged in another China war. The Taepings were commonly spoken of as mere robbers and freebooters, who roamed about the country committing murders and outrages, but who had no regular Government or settled position whatever. The real fact was that they occupied six of the richest and most productive provinces of China; and, as the noble Lord had recognized the belligerent rights of the Southern States of America, which had existed as a separate power only a few weeks, he did not see how he could refuse to recognize those of the Taepings, who had held a large portion of China for no less than eight years. Nor had the Taepings been guilty of any outrages so flagrant as those which had been committed by the Imperialists, who had murdered Captain Brabazon and Mr. De Norman, and had so shockingly ill-treated Mr. Parkes and Mr. Loch. The leaders of the insurgents had translated nearly the whole, if not the whole, of the Christian Scriptures into the vernacular, and urged an open war against idolatry; and, as a proof of the superiority of their character and their favourable disposition towards foreigners, an American missionary had stated that the Canton men when they joined the insurgents, instead of continuing to insult and despise foreigners as they had been accustomed to do, became most respectful and accommodating towards strangers. He was afraid that Mr. Bruce, instead of showing neutrality, had taken a side in this matter, and certainly the Proclamation issued by our Chargé d’Affaires at Shanghai, forbidding British merchants to have any intercourse with the Taepings, the protection of Imperial junks by British ships of war, and the saving of Shanghai by the French and English troops savoured much more of partizanship than of neutrality. In the letters and papers received from China by the last mail there were frequent allusions to the well-known fact that we were doing all we could to bolster up the Tartar power. The Overland Trade Report, dated the 31st of March, 1861, commented upon the unseemly spectacle which had been presented by a British Minister in time of war adopting measures to the detriment of British trade to replenish the exchequer of the enemy. The communication which he had received from them stated that about 100 French troops and a war steamer were stationed at one point to prevent an attack of the rebels, but the country people, instead of manifesting alarm, remained quite passive and went about as usual. Thus it was clear that the French and English had both departed from neutrality by preventing the progress of a rebellion as to the issue of which the people themselves were perfectly indifferent. In the admirable work published by Mr. Alcock no passages were more interesting than his description of the ascent and descent of the Yang-tze-Kiang. A brilliant account was given of the scene which occurred when the British ships in chorus returned the fire directed at them from the shore, in the course of which the author made the following remark :—

That might be very fine writing, but he put it to the House whether the policy adopted was one of strict neutrality. What were we doing in China? We were bolstering up an effete Tartar Power. He should like to know the opinions entertained of it by Russia, who was gradually extending her boundary. Our troops who went to Peking were convinced that the influence of the Government there was on the wane; and we were consequently in danger of having a war on our hands, not with the Tartar Power, but with the Chinese people living along the river, who detested the Government at Peking and resented our silly alliance with it. Had we left the people to themselves the war would long since have been put an end to; and his hon. Friend, if he could succeed in eliciting from the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary an assurance that by an alliance with the Tartar Government we should not be drawn into any act of hostility to the great party by which that Government was opposed, would have done something to promote the interests both of this country and of China.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I could have wished that my hon. Friend who made this Motion would have had the goodness to wait till some of the papers were laid on the table. My hon. Friend must have known very well that I had said when we received accounts from China they would be produced. We did receive papers some time ago stating that matters were in progress, but as they did not give distinct information I waited till more came, and I have since by command laid these papers upon the table. What I imagine is for the advantage of this House, of all persons engaged in trade, and for the interest of the country generally, is that we should know the actual state of affairs in China. The hon. Gentleman who made this Motion, and the hon. Member who seconded it, may be right or wrong as to what happened three years ago when the Earl of Elgin went up the Yang-tze-Kiang, but that is not the question now before the House. At present the state of things is totally different, and what is really interesting to us is to know their exact position. This is the case as it at present stands. The Earl of Elgin, having given directions that the part of the treaty which says that the River Yang-tze shall be opened for trade should be carried out, entered into a provisional arrangement with Prince Kung for that purpose; and Admiral Sir James Hope went up the river to Nankin and made an agreement with the Chief of the Taepings. The sixth article of the agreement says—

“ The Commander-in-Chief further expects that if your force has attacked any of the places at which British subjects may be settled or trading, British subjects will be unmolested both in person and property. On the other hand, the commanders of vessels stationed there will receive directions not to interfere in hostilities going on except for the purpose of protecting their countrymen, in case it should be necessary to do so.”

Is not that neutrality? The Commander-in-Chief states that the British arms will be used to protect British persons and property. Is that wrong? He says at the same time there is to be no interference with any conquests which the Taepings may make. That is what I call neutrality, and that is the present state of affairs. With regard to the communication which the hon. Gentleman has received, I may state that it is very often the custom for persons abroad, who do not know exactly what the authorities are doing, to write home letters containing their conjectures of what is going on, and almost always blaming the authorities for acts of which they have not a very competent knowledge. Surely the papers produced here under the authority of Sir James Hope and others ought to be the more correct narrative of events referred to by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend says, whatever faults or crimes the Taepings may be guilty of, the Imperialists are very much worse. Now, I am very much more neutral than the hon. Member. I never much admired the civilization, and still less the humanity of the Chinese. No doubt excesses and outrages against humanity are committed both by the Imperialists and the Taepings, and which is the worst I will not venture to say. Our business there certainly is to promote our own trade as much as possible, to endeavour to act a neutral part, and as far as our position admits to establish a friendly intercourse. The hon. Gentleman has spoken as if it was entirely the fault of British subjects and British agents that the civil war was not long ago put an end to. For my own part, I think a very large army would have been required for that purpose. These Taepings are a numerous body, and have got possession of several most important cities and provinces. In what way, then, is it possible for us to interfere so as either to put down the Tartar dynasty or to enable that dynasty to suppress this insurrection? I conceive that it is not our duty to do either one thing or the other. Sir James Hope observes—

“Although a large body of rebels are said to be and probably are overrunning the country in different directions it is very questionable whether they are strong enough to eject the Tartar Government and to effect a change of dynasty, while, on the other hand, no reasonable prospect exists of the Imperial Government being able to put down the rebellion.”

A civil war of indefinite duration seems, therefore, likely to continue, in the course of which the commercial towns of the empire will be destroyed and its most productive provinces laid waste. From all the accounts of the state of things, whatever may be said by the admirers of the Taepings or by the admirers of the Imperial dynasty, there are large bodies of men now carrying on a civil war. And many of the worst vagabonds and scoundrels in the country have joined one side or the other, not for the sake of the cause involved either way, but for the sake of plunder and what they can gain in the confusion. That is a great misfortune; but the course of the British authorities will be to preserve a neutral attitude, and endeavour to protect the persons and property of British subjects where they may be in danger. That is the course we have pursued in other countries, and I do not see why we should not pursue it in China. My hon. Friend seems to think that the Government might make some arrangement by which, when a ship comes to a Chinese port in the possession of the Imperialists, the duty should be paid in such a manner as that her owners should not afterwards be required to pay by the rebel forces, but that would be a very strong interference. The instructions given by Her Majesty's Government have been in all cases in approbation of the neutral course that has been taken. Attempts are being made to promote trade and intercourse, and the accounts we receive betoken an improvement in our relations with the interior of China and with the Taepings. I have read to-day a letter from Canton, which states that the Customs' duties are regularly paid, and that, if any difficulties arise, they are treated by the Chinese authorities with a disposition rather to remove obstructions than to cause them. Mr. Bruce has arrived at Peking: he did not wish to be received with anything like ostentation, so he entered the city privately; but every civility has been shown him, and there is every prospect of the intercourse with the Chinese Government being conducted on friendly terms. While there is no probability of the Chinese Government putting down the rebels, nor of the rebels overthrowing the Imperial Government, I think we should not take part either on one side or the other. It is a great misfortune that the country should be in such a state of civil war; but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the views of Her Majesty's Government will always be in favour of neutrality. I will not say but some of the local authorities may show some bias on one side or the other; but the Government at home, as well as the chief authorities in China, are desirous of observing a strict neutrality.

MR. BUCHANAN said, the House is indebted to the hon. Member for Greenock for bringing forward for discussion the present state of British relations with China. The subject is highly important, whether, as regards the commercial interests involved, the large revenue derived from tea, or the financial considerations necessarily suggested by the prospect of continued naval and military expenditure in that distant quarter of the world. It had been objected to the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he had taken credit for a portion of the Chinese indemnity. But no reason could be given why that payment was less likely to be made now than on a former occasion, when the money had been regularly remitted. If credit had been taken on one side of the national account for three-quarters of a million indemnity; on the other side there was an estimate of a million for expenses in China, besides increased naval and military estimates on the same account. But while there was no reason to fear that the indemnity would remain unpaid, it would be sanguine to predict that the balance of payments would be in favour of this country two or three years hence. A large force must be kept up in China, and, instead of receiving money we were more likely to send large sums there. Before going further he must disavow all intention of blaming the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary or his predecessors in office for anything that may be amiss in China. The course of events, their causes and consequences, were generally beyond official control, and it would be unjust to impute blame to those at the head of affairs for a course of policy which had not originated with, and probably been but little affected by, the instructions emanating from the Foreign Office. Still less could any fault be found with the noble Earl, who, twice over, had encountered the difficulties and responsibilities of the embassy to China. No one less endowed with prudence, ability, and administrative skill would have given satisfaction to the public. And, if the noble Earl had not succeeded in every particular, it was to be attributed more to the difficulties of the mission than to any want of ability in the ambassador. The important question is are our Chinese difficulties at an end? We have already had three Chinese wars, are we to have another? It is to be feared no basis of permanent peace has been established, and that elements of strife and ultimate war exist beyond any former example. A treaty has been made with an empire which has no power to carry out the stipulations which it has contracted. The Central Government is in a state of prostration and paralysis. It has long been well known that the administration of the distant provinces of China is delegated to the great mandarins, who exercise a power almost independent, their only indispensable act of allegiance being to remit to Peking an annual tribute. In other respects they do as they please, fleecing the helpless inhabitants by constant squeezes, to reimburse themselves for the price they have paid for their governorships. For, notwithstanding the competitive examinations, and the literary qualifications required for Chinese official life, it is well known that the chief offices in China are sold to the highest bidder. Such a system affords no security against maladministration, and in practice is found to dispense with control of any kind. To such an extent is this independence of central control carried that, it is said, the well-known Yeh, the Governor of Canton did not even communicate to head quarters the treaty which was extorted from him on the occupation of the city. This evil is further increased by the difficulty of keeping up intimate communications between the distant parts of so large an empire, embracing not only diverse races and dialects, but even conflicting interests. And now that Peking, the hitherto unapproachable centre of the empire, has been explored it has proved, like many other things in China, "a great sham," alike powerless for defence or attack. No doubt, the Tartar cavalry fought well at the Taku Forts, and surprised the allied troops by their gallant charges. But these are said to have been irregular troops, brought up for the emergency, and not available for regular warfare. This seems likely, when we consider that the Taeping rebellion has lasted for ten years, with scarcely a serious check from the regular Tartar army. Had there been such troops as the Tartar cavalry which fought at Taku and Tien-tsin available to the Emperor, the Taepings would long ago have been scattered to the winds. That rebellion, if it can be so called, is an evidence of the weakness and helplessness of the Manchow dynasty. Its history is one of the many wonders we find in China. Originating in the mountains of the south west, and, no doubt, at first consisting of bands of ordinary plunderers, it has been curiously mixed up with various elements. The doctrines of the Triad Societies, whatever these may be, were early adopted by the leaders of the movement. A still more extraordinary infusion of Christian doctrine, of a very degraded type, it is true, but still unmistakably of Christian origin subsequently appeared. And that nothing might be wanting in the cunning appeal made to popular sympathies, the Tien-Wong was declared to be the heir and representative of the ancient Ming dynasty, the last Imperial race of Chinese blood. But all these cunning appeals would have been in vain against the disciplined army of a powerful empire, and we must, therefore, conclude that no such army existed. In the meantime the Taepings spread throughout the provinces, increasing in numbers and importance, attracting followers, levying tribute, besieging cities and gaining battles, till at length they reached the banks of the great central river, and fixed their government in the ancient capital of Nankin. The Chief King, or Tien-Wong, has resided there for eight years, while ten sub-kings are engaged in various military expeditions, instigated, it is to be feared, principally by the love of plunder, and guilty in their latest proceedings of revolting atrocities. But whatever may be the ultimate objects of the Taepings, and whatever may be their hold on Chinese public opinion, without doubt, they have braved the whole power of the empire, and been for years a standing menace and defiance to the Tartars. It seems accepted as an undoubted truth, by those most competent to judge, that the Celestial Empire is passing away, that its central heart is powerless, and sends no action through its dislocated extremities. Nor are the Taepings the only rebels. Two other rebellions at present exist, independent of each other, and hitherto not connected with the Taepings — one of these of a very formidable character is in the north, in the province of Shansi; and another in the province of Quan-Tung, the original seat of the Taeping movement. Under these circumstances, the time has come to ask how would British interests be affected by the downfall of our Imperial allies? Would separate independent states not be better allies and better customers for us than the effete and corrupt central government which alone we now recognize? Would it not be in the interests of civilization and human progress that the great obstructive influence of China should be brought to an end? Whatever solution of the difficulties presented to us we might prefer, it assuredly is our best course to preserve a strict neutrality between all parties. Let us adopt the principle in China which we have announced in Europe and America, as the keystone of our policy, the principle of non-intervention. Why attach ourselves by needless engagements to a powerless state? We see the ancient empire falling to pieces, and new and vigorous powers and races rivalling each other in progress and civilization, and shall we attach ourselves to the weakest, the most corrupt, and the least enlightened of them all? Even the Taepings have acknowledged and accepted the influences of western civilization, and, whatever else we can object to their extraordinary career, this at least is certain, that they are not beyond the reach of new ideas, nor have entrenched themselves in the indifference and contempt of other nations, which distinguished the Mantchows. Our policy, as avowed, is not liable to objection. On many occasions we have proclaimed neutrality. In the papers laid before Parliament, there is abundant admission that the British representatives in China approve that principle. More recently it has received a practical illustration. The British naval commander has actually been in treaty with the Taepings, and has concluded with them a convention regulating the navigation and trade of the Yang-tze-Kiang. But, while in words, and perhaps intentions, we preserve neutrality, a little enquiry into our recent treaty obligations will show that we are in a false position, and in various ways have overstepped the line of neutrality in favour of the Imperial Government. The Treaty of Tien-tsin itself is a document from which by no forced interpretation it may be inferred that Britain recognized no power in China but the existing Government. And, if it is replied that we could only treat with a Government de facto, still, even admitting that to be true, it is not a sufficient answer; for various conditions of the treaty will be found to be framed in direct hostility, not only to those now opposed, but to those who shall hereafter be opposed, to the existing Government. In the first place, we have engaged to assist the Imperialists in the collection of their customs' revenue on foreign trade. Were the Taepings to ask British traders to settle at Nankin, and confer on some rival chief inspector of customs those high functions which Prince Kung has conferred on Mr. Lay, what would the "new board of commercial intercourse with all nations" recently established at Peking, say to it? Would they not remonstrate against a British subject collecting revenue to be handed over to rebels? But that is what Mr. Lay and his subordinates of the Chinese Custom-house are now doing as against the Taepings. But, besides, we have guaranteed the continuance of this system, at least until the indemnity which has been stipulated for by the allied forces shall have been paid. That payment, by the Treaty of Tien-tsin is to form a charge on the foreign customs. We are thus engaged in a course which it would be a mere perversion of language to call neutrality, and, if money is the sinews of war, we are engaged on the side of the Tartars. We have been, moreover, parties to arrangements, by which we have consented utterly to exclude friends and foes from all access by land to the territory of the Taepings, for the "licence to proceed to the interior," which the British Consul grants, must be countersigned by a Chinese official, who, of course, will take good care that there shall be no intercourse with rebels. The same applies to the "arms certificate," which is jointly furnished by a Foreign Consul and a Chinese officer, and thus involves a course of action to be regulated solely by Chinese interests. Any one who considers the bearings and working of these arrangements will admit that it is a mere pretence to speak of neutrality. To all intents and purposes we are engaged on the Imperial side. So matters stand now, but they cannot long remain as at present. Collisions of interest, and too probably of force, must arise. This system of assisting the Imperial revenue officers and clearing vessels at Imperial ports, which will again be called on to pay duties to the Taepings, at Nankin or elsewhere, the system of joint licences "for arms" or "travelling in the interior," must lead to disputes where it is too probable our pretensions to the character of neutrals will be forgotten. British or Chinese traders, who have paid duties on their goods at Shanghai or Chin-Kiang, when they trade with districts held by the rebels, will find they have to pay these duties again. They cannot expect that a pass granted by his rival will be acknowledged by the Tien-Wong. This alone will be a constant source of irritation and disputes. The Yang-tze is the great artery of trade from the most wealthy and populous provinces of China to the sea-board, but to Imperialist Junks, it leads through an enemy's country. Will these junks, or even foreign vessels, navigating the river, and provided with an "arms pass" granted by the Imperial Government, hesitate to use these arms when their interests require it? It seems inevitable that the great river will become the scene of piratical warfare, where the most desperate characters of all nations will be found engaged, and the interests of legitimate commerce will be disregarded. Under such circumstances is it likely we shall preserve our neutrality? Are we to stand by and see those trade advantages which we have purchased at the expence of so many millions rendered valueless, or are we prepared to throw our cannon into the scale of the Tartars, as we have already given them our moral support and the benefit of our fiscal skill? It will come at last to this, that we shall have to abandon our hollow pretence of neutrality and fight on the Tartar side. The only means of retaining neutrality is to retrace those steps by which we have identified ourselves with the old Government. And, among those entanglements, the very first to be abandoned should be the customs' inspectorate, as the most injurious to our interests, the most unjust, and in every sense the most impolitic. It is needless now to inquire into the origin of this system; like many other blunders it, no doubt, was a well-meant scheme to meet a temporary difficulty during the abeyance of the authority of the Chinese Custom-house at Shanghai. It was intended also to conciliate the Imperial Government, and, in so far, to purchase commercial privileges by a system which rendered the customs levied on foreign trade more largely and directly available to the Central Government. It has existed since 1856-7, and has been maintained under unprecedented circumstances. To such a length indeed has our courtesy to the Chinese Government gone, that, at the very time we were marching on Peking, we were collecting revenues for the benefit of our enemies. The port of Shanghai was for some years the only commercial entrepôt where this extraordinary system prevailed, but so enamoured of it are the ruling Anglo-Chinese authorities, and, as, indeed, need be no matter of surprise, so delighted is the Government with a system which produces such large revenues to the Imperial Exchequer that, according to the latest information we have received, Prince Kung has notified his intention of extending its operation. All the ports open to foreigners are to be divided into four superintendencies, each to be confided to a mandarin appointed by the "Board of Foreign Trade," instead of remaining, as at present, under the Hoppo, or local Tautai. Of these superintendencies the first embraces Tien-tsin, Tangchow, and Keuchang; the second, Shanghai, Ningpoo, and ports in the Yang-tze; the third, Foochow, Amoy, and Formosa; and, fourth, Swantow, Hainan, and Canton. In all these districts foreign inspectors are to be employed, and Mr. Lay has been appointed by Prince Kung Inspector General of all the Superintendencies, and is empowered "to exercise surveillance over all things pertaining to foreign trade." The system is thus developing itself, and will soon be in active operation over the whole seaboard of China. It is of the greatest importance to consider well what will be its results. One of the most important of these will be a general system of smuggling. No coast in the world is better suited for contraband trade than that of China, being everywhere intersected with bays and creeks and the mouths of large navigable rivers. The population, unfortunately, have been trained to smuggling, the trade in opium having been till lately of that description. The consequence of stringent Custom-house charges being levied at the duty ports, especially if these are aggravated by a continued exacting of their former irregular charges by the local mandarins, will be to drive much of the coasting trade from the present established emporiums. Foreign vessels will discharge their cargoes in roadsteads into native junks, in the same way as opium was formerly delivered, and these junks will run their cargoes into creeks and harbours in various parts of the coast. Sufficient indications of this course are already shown in the Canton Custom House since the inspectorate was established. The Canton river has four mouths, and is conveniently situated for trade with the free port of Hong Kong. The consequence has been that foreign merchandize of various kinds, but particularly duty-paid opium, has almost ceased to pass through the regular Custom-house. This is what will happen everywhere, and this inspectorate, which originated in the laudable desire to put down smuggling, will prove a powerful instrument to perpetuate and increase that system. It has been insinuated, upon what grounds I know not, that the foreign merchants in China are addicted to the irregular gains of contraband trade. If this refers to the trade in opium the charge has no point, for that case is totally exceptional; and if it is to be judged by a moral standard it would be difficult to say where to award the greatest share of blame—to the Bengal Government, which prepared the drug for the Chinese market, to the merchants who sold it on the coast, or to the mandarins who, for a bribe, connived at its introduction; all of whom are alike implicated. But, leaving out opium, there can be no ground for charging the Chinese mercantile community with the practice of smuggling. But is it quite certain that this good character will be maintained when so many strong inducements will exist to avoid the foreign Custom-houses? The system, as originally introduced at Shanghai, was sanctioned by the three treaty Powers, Britain, France, and America each being represented at the Custom-house by their assessors. It does not appear whether this system is to be extended to the ports now for the first time embraced by the arrangements of Prince Kung and the Inspector Generalship of Mr. Lay. But it may be assumed that commercial jealousy between the different Powers will make it necessary to continue the system as it was first introduced. The expence will thus be very great. There will be at least a dozen ports where three inspectors, with large salaries, will be established. It is easy to see that these expenses, as well as all others attending the establishment, will be levied on trade, and principally on British trade. Is it sound policy to join with France, which has little trade of any kind in China, and with America, which has a great deal less than ourselves, in a system which will expose British commerce, in all its minutest workings, to the inspection of rivals, who will report officially to their respective Governments every shape and form of our varied trade? It may be little-minded to indulge trade jealousies, but is it, therefore, wise to expose all our secrets with such confiding simplicity? Besides, jealousy may work in another way. What would a French inspector care for the over-valuation of British goods of which his own countrymen were not importers, and those who know how successfully we are rivalled in some of our staple cotton fabrics by the Americans will doubt the advantage to British interests of American valuations at the Custom-houses of China. But, leaving that out of the question, there cannot be a doubt that a class feeling will be produced in all these inspectors in favour of the revenue whose officers they are, and against the interests of the foreign merchants. Employés of all sorts are uniformly found advocating the system which they administer, and that this is the case in China we have already abundant proof. At Shanghai the merchants have had repeatedly occasion to appeal against the decision of the inspectors; and, as a matter of course, applied to the consul, the legally constituted judge in all controversies between foreign Custom-houses and British subjects. But here we have another anomaly, for we have no end of them in this extraordinary system. The British Envoy (Mr. Bruce) set aside the authority of the Consul (Mr. Meadows), and declared the inspectors to be irresponsible in questions of valuation. The policy of this course is questionable enough; but as to its being contrary both to usage and to law, there can be no question at all. Such are the inevitable difficulties which beset our course when we depart from admitted principles and interfere with the functions of foreign Governments. But no one doubts that all the expenses of this system will fall upon British trade. The Treaty of Tien-tsin has burdened the trade of this country with the indemnity for the expences of the war, which is to be paid from the foreign Customs, and which will make it imperative as regards our own interests to levy duties to the last dollar. But when the indemnity has been paid, we shall find that a system has been inaugurated to which we have ourselves been parties, and which in its consequences may not have been fully foreseen. The full amount of the Imperial Customs is to be remitted to Pekin; but how can the local mandarins exist without their share of the plunder? They have paid for their offices and must have compensation. No one who knows China doubts for a moment as to the course which will be adopted. In one way or another, and in such secret ways as cannot be discovered, additional duties will be charged for the benefit of the local officers. So long as those officers were administrators of the Customs' revenue their peculations affected the Imperial Exchequer; but now that they do not intromit with these collections which are remitted in full to Pekin, they must resort to other means of reimbursement. What these means are we learn from the circumstances which have recently transpired as to opium imported at Shanghai. So determined were the local mandarins that their fees should be paid, that they bribed the Coolies in the various foreign Hongs to ascertain where opium was delivered, and thus ensure the payment of their irregular demands; and in the prosecution of their object they exhibited not only consummate art, but have shown at once the extent of their power and their extortion. This was traced to the Tautai, or Governor of Shanghai. So will it be everywhere. Foreign trade will bear not only the duties fixed by treaty, but a second charge to satisfy the irregular fees of the mandarins. Over and above this, the expense of the foreign inspectorate will fall on foreign trade. But another objection to the system consists in its being most unpopular among the Chinese. They look on the foreign assessors as making these charges for their own benefit. They cannot understand a system which excludes the bargaining and beating down of duties to which they have been accustomed, and in their irritation they have transferred to the foreign officials the whole weight of their resentment. It is known how the installation of the system was received at Swatow, and the forcible resistance that was made to it. It has been asserted that if the troops were removed from Canton, the Customs'-house inspectorate could not last for a day. All this works most unfavourably for British interests. It must have been observed by those who have read the Chinese newspapers, that a loud complaint is made of the secrecy with which all the arrangements and working of this system have been carried out. No one can remonstrate, much less advise: for everything is wrapped in secrecy. It is impossible that the noble Lord can have any sympathy with concealments; but it is right he should know that this charge has been made against officials in China. It, no doubt, has been undesignedly; but, to a certain extent, the noble Lord followed the same course. The hon. Member for Aberdeen moved for a Return to show the numbers, the amount of salaries, and nature of the engagement of British subjects employed in Chinese Custom-houses; and there was also a Motion for Copies of Consul Meadows' Correspondence with Sir John Bowring, or others, as to the foreign inspectors. The noble Lord could not lay before the House any of these papers. I have no doubt he would have done so had it been in his power; but it is unfortunate any information on this subject should be withheld. It is said this system is on its trial, that Lord Elgin is not committed in its favour, and that the Government at home are not committed to it. Let, then, the merchants and the British public, who are much interested, assist at this trial. The more light that can be thrown on the subject, and the more its difficulties and anomalies are discussed, so much the better for all concerned. The course to adopt, in case the present system should be abandoned, is to revert to the old practice: let all exports be sold duty-paid, and, on the other hand, imports be sold at the short price, or without duty. To facilitate such arrangement bonded warehouses at the duty ports would afford great facilities. But above all it is desirable that free ports should be established in the North of China. It is surprising that, with the example of the success of free ports, as shown by the prosperity and great commercial development of Singapore and Hong Kong, such a system should not have suggested itself. One free port should be established somewhere in the neighbourhood of Shanghai. Perhaps the foreign location at Shanghai itself, if surrounded with walls, would afford an eligible site for a free port; and certainly another should be as far up the Yang-tze-Kiang as sea-going ships can navigate. No doubt the consent of the Chinese authorities would be required for such an arrangement; but there is no reason to think that such consent would be refused. Lord Elgin most properly said, on a late public occasion, that the interests of British commerce, as well as the character and usefulness of British subjects in these distant regions must depend on themselves—on their honour, integrity, and self-restraint. Doubtless, such sentiments will find acceptance everywhere, and under a proper system China will afford a field for their practical illustration.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he did not intend to follow the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down in the very extensive range of observations which he had taken, but would confine himself to the subject immediately before the House—the importance of preserving a strict neutrality between the contending parties in China. He thought it would have been better that the discussion should not have taken place until the House had had an opportunity of perusing the papers laid on the table that evening. His information was derived only from the Chinese journals and private correspondence, and might possibly be incorrect on some points. He held that the complaints of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Buchanan) that the Government had not observed a strict neutrality between the Chinese Government and the rebels, was in several respects quite unfounded. The hon. Gentleman asserted that the conclusion of a treaty with the de facto Government of China was a breach of neutrality.

MR. BUCHANAN explained that he said quite the reverse, and admitted that they could do nothing else than enter into such a treaty.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he had understood the hon. Gentleman to say that the very fact that we had entered into the Treaty of Tien-tsin was in itself a breach of neutrality. Having gone to war with the de facto Government of China, we had no other resource when we wished to make peace, than to form a treaty with the same authority. Again the hon. Gentleman said that we were guilty of another breach of neutrality in collecting the Customs' dues for the Chinese Government. The fact was that we did nothing of the kind. It was perfectly true that English subjects were employed by the Chinese Government in collecting the duties; but the English Government had no more to do with the collection of the Customs of China than of France. There were, however, two points to which he wished to draw the attention of the noble Lord. He was given to understand that British vessels proceeding to any of the open ports in possession of the rebels were compelled, not by the Chinese Government, but by the regulations of the British authorities, to proceed first to one of the open ports in the hands of the Imperial Government, and there pay the dues. That regulation involved a manifest injustice. On the one hand, our merchants would be most unfairly treated, if they had to pay the dues first to the Imperial Government at the port to which by the regulations they were compelled to go, and afterwards to the rebel authorities at the port where they landed. On the other hand, if we acted justly by the British merchants, and protected them against a second payment of the dues at the rebel port, it was perfectly clear that such an arrangement was one that must quickly bring us into collision with the rebel authorities. Had the Chinese Government enforced such a regulation there would have been no reason to complain; but he found fault with it as proceeding from the British authorities. Again the position which we occupied at Shanghai was very peculiar, very objectionable, and in his opinion very dangerous. If he was rightly informed, there were British troops at the present moment in Shanghai who, although receiving British pay, were in point of fact maintained at the expense of the Imperial Government for the protection of the port against a hostile attack from the rebels.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say that the troops were stationed at Shanghai merely for the protection of British subjects and property.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD observed that in that case it was very singular that the expense of the troops should be borne by the Imperial authorities. The fact, disguised as it might be, was that it was only a repetition in 1861 of what occurred not very long ago, when Shanghai was protected from the rebels by a British force. A more important subject could not be brought under the notice of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary than the absolute necessity of observing the strictest neutrality between the two parties in China. If we gave either party a right to complain of our conduct, there would be always a Chinese difficulty continued from year to year, and varied at intervals by an open war.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I think my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow has not sufficiently adverted to the statement made by my noble Friend in regard to the very satisfactory arrangement which has been come to between our Admiral and the Taepings for the observance of the strictest neutrality between the contending parties, because many of his remarks applied to a different state of things, and assumed that no such stipulations had been entered into. I think I may dismiss that part of the subject by repeating the assurance that we are now observing the strictest neutrality between the two parties, and have obtained from the Taepings securities that our commerce with those parts of the country which are occupied by them will be duly protected, and not subjected to any interruption. The proposition that we ought not to have entered into a treaty with the Emperor of China because there is a rebellion raging over a large portion of his dominions is quite untenable. When a sovereign reigns over a country, and when his authority is especially in force in those parts where our interests lie, we have no choice but either to make a treaty with him, or to leave the lives, property, and commerce of our countrymen wholly unsecured by any diplomatic stipulations. Had Her Majesty's Government pursued the latter alternative, and left British interests without that protection, we should have done that which was totally unjustifiable and without excuse. The Treaty of Tien-tsin was the result of an endeavour on our part to obtain redress, by hostile measures, for injuries which had been done to us by the Government of China. That treaty was not observed, and it was again deemed necessary to resort to hostilities. The Earl of Elgin, at a great sacrifice both of comfort and health, returned to China and negotiated another treaty, which gave full force and effect to all the provisions for the protection and extension of our commerce which the first treaty contained. So far from that being a proper subject for criticism, those of our countrymen who are connected with the Chinese trade ought to acknowledge the great evils which have been redressed, and the great advantage which must be conferred on British commerce by those two treaties. Therefore, it is totally unnecessary to enter into a justification of the Government for having entered into treaty engagements with the existing Imperial Government of China, or to maintain that in doing so they committed no breach of neutrality as between the two contending parties.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he must have expressed himself very ill indeed if his remarks could be construed into a complaint against the Government for having made a treaty with the Imperial party. He owned that the Imperial Government was the de facto Government, and the proper authority with whom to treat.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am very glad to accept the admission of my hon. Friend. On the one hand, then, we have shown that our policy is to maintain a strict bonâ fide neutrality; and, on the other, those who are disposed to find fault with other things are ready to admit that we were perfectly right in entering into a treaty with the de facto Government of China. That disposes of a good many of the observations which have been made in the course of this discussion. Great fault, however, has been found with the arrangement by which British subjects are employed by the Chinese Government for the collection of their Customs. I think that those objections are not well founded. In the first place, it has been stated by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. FitzGerald) that these British subjects are not acting under the authority of the British Government, but are lent to the Chinese Government, and are responsible to that Government for their conduct. My hon. Friend complains that they are not placed under the authority of the Consuls, and that Mr. Bruce has declared that any complaint against them must be made to him. I do not see anything wrong in that. Mr. Bruce is the highest authority representing the British Government in China, and it is proper that when complaint is made against persons who are performing duties such as those which have devolved upon those who are engaged in collecting the Customs' duties, that reference should be made to him. The decision of a consul might be swayed by local considerations, and if adverse to local complaints would not carry with it the weight which will attach to a decision pronounced by Mr. Bruce. Generally speaking it might be an unusual course that British subjects should be employed to collect the Customs due to the Chinese Government; but, as our indemnity is to be paid out of the produce of those Customs, we have a direct interest in seeing that they are fairly levied and completely paid. My hon. Friend said that this system has a tendency to encourage smuggling. Now it is a well-known saying that the best way of replying to an unanswerable argument is to affirm directly the contrary. My hon. Friend has followed that course, because, unless we are extremely misinformed, it has a direct tendency to check that practice, and it is not impossible that many of the complaints which are made against it in China owe their origin to the fact that it is putting an end to the system of collusion between the merchants of different countries and the Chinese Custom-house authorities which has unfortunately for some time prevailed. My hon. Friend says that the Chinese authorities pay for their appointments, and are, therefore, compelled to extract money from the persons who come within the scope of their authority in order to repay themselves, and I understood him to suggest that one effect of the operation might be by depriving these persons of their illegitimate fees to lead them to resort to still more improper proceedings. There can be no doubt that this system will tend to establish a regular and legal system of Customs, and I cannot believe that the establishment of such a system will lead British merchants to smuggle goods into places where Custom-houses are not established. My belief, on the contrary, is, that this system will establish a fair and equitable arrangement, according to which all parties will pay just what they ought to pay, neither more nor less, which will, no doubt, be advantageous to the Chinese Government by introducing order into a department which has hitherto been full of abuses, but which will be productive of great advantage to us, as it will secure the gradual payment of those indemnities which were stipulated for by the Treaties of Tien-tsin and Peking.

With regard to the point adverted to by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. S. Fitzgerald), I am not aware that we have any information as to the fact that vessels are compelled to go to ports where duties are paid to the Imperial Government, although they may be destined to ports which are in the hands of the rebels, but undoubtedly it is a matter deserving of inquiry and consideration. Then, as to Shanghai. Every one knows that that is our most important settlement in China, that a large extent of ground is there allotted to the foreign community, and that that place has largely superseded Canton as the great mart of British commerce. We have heard a great deal in praise of the Taepings, and I should be unwilling to say anything to their disparagement, but it is well known that towns which have unfortunately been occupied by them have, a fortnight afterwards, not presented the same appearance of wealth, of comfort, and of population, which they exhibited before the occupation. [An hon. MEMBER: Suchow.] I am speaking of Nankin and other places. I have been told that Nankin is a wilderness. I do not know whether that is an exaggeration, but, unhappily, the occupation of Shanghai by the rebels is not a thing which the community of that place would very much desire. The hon. Gentleman said that the troops there are now paid by the Chinese Government. I believe that my noble Friend does not altogether approve that arrangement, and it may probably be altered, but I believe that it is of great importance that there should be a British force at Shanghai to protect British property and British merchants in that town from the effects which must result from its occupation by the rebels. Nor is it desirable that the Chinese part of the town should be laid waste, which would be the natural consequence of its being taken by storm. To what extent our troops are protecting others besides British residents I am not informed, but I am sure that the House will feel that it is the duty of the British Government to take care that that most important and valuable British settlement should not encounter all the calamities which would result from its occupation by the rebels. My hon. Friend said that great advantage would arise from the establishment of several free towns at different places in the Chinese territory, up the Yang-tse-Kiang and in the north. If we were masters of China we might, no doubt, establish free towns in certain places, but the Chinese territory belongs either to the Emperor or to the rebels, certainly not to us, and, therefore, we have not power to make the arrangement which my hon. Friend thinks would be so advantageous. All we can do is to avail ourselves to the utmost of those privileges which treaties have given to us. Those treaties were made with the existing Government, and we have no right to assume that that Government has ceased to exist as long as it continues to rule a large and important portion of the empire, especially the seaport towns with which we carry on intercourse. All that we can, in my opinion, be expected to do is that which my noble Friend has shown that we are doing—giving neither party cause to complain, and, as far as hostilities are concerned, acting according to the principles of strict neutrality.

MR. WHITE, after repeating the statement that British vessels bound for ports which were in the hands of the rebels were compelled to call at Imperial ports and pay the Imperial duties, an arrangement which was similar to requiring ships bound to Charleston to go to New York and pay the Federal duties, said that the Taepings were a set of ruffians and scoundrels with whom not a single man of education, character, or discretion had associated himself. If it were not that such a course would be altogether opposed to the policy of England we should be glad if the British Government should take part in the dispute and rid the world of such a nest of vagabonds, for it was melancholy to reflect that a civil war would drag on for years and inflict endless misery and distress, which might be effectually put an end to by a single regiment and a few Armstrong guns. The hideous grotesqueness and blasphemy associated with the Taeping movement would be evident from the fact mentioned by a friend of his who had visited the adviser—the individual whose duty it was to interpolate the Scriptural element into their proceedings, who found him attended by four beautiful girls arrayed in yellow, and luxuriating in every magnificence which could be afforded by the plunder of the richest cities of China.

COLONEL SYKES said, the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had failed to satisfy him that the English Government had observed a policy of perfect neutrality. With regard to the Taepings, he would refer to an account written by the special correspondent of the Shanghai Herald, who had accompanied the British expedition, to show that in Nankin, which was in the hands of the Taepings, building was going on on all sides and trade was springing up, while at Chinkiang, which had been occupied by the Imperialists for four years since it was quited by the Taepings, there was only one house standing, in which the duties of the port were collected. It ought to be the great object of the Government of this country to conciliate the Taepings, who at present numbered a hundred millions of people, and had five millions of armed men among them. He contended that if the Customs' duties at the treaty ports were collected by European (not native) officers in the pay of the Tartar Government, but only responsible for their conduct to Mr. Bruce, the British representative, we were infringing the principle of neutrality, and became, in fact, active agents in favour of the Tartar Government. The very cost of the defence of Shanghai against the Taepings exceeded the amount of the indemnity which we received from China; and, if that military occupation were continued, it would be impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer next year to reduce the amount of the tea duties.

MR. DUNLOP said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

OUTRAGES AT GEASHILL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. M'MAHON said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which the Barony of Geashill, in the King's County, was obliged to pay £300 damages for the alleged malicious burning of an outhouse belonging to a Mr. Trench, and to the fact that a confidential report from the constabulary to the authorities of Dublin Castle, stating that the person who burned the outhouse was a party resident in Mr. Trench's house, was shown in a breach of confidence to Mr. Trench; and asked why no steps had since been taken to prosecute the offender? Under the late Lord Digby, who had granted leases to his tenants, Geashill was one of the quietest districts in Ireland. His successor took advantage of some technical defects to break the leases. A new agent was appointed in the person of a Mr. Trench, who was very unpopular; and Lord Digby did not come to see with his own eyes the misery into which the place was plunged. Outrages, genuine or fabricated, were the consequence, and as a specimen he might mention one:—A fire took place in the stables of Geashill Castle one night, though the gates were all closed and no one could get over the walls from the outside. Mr. Trench having alleged that the fire was the work of an incendiary outside, a policeman named Burke had carefully examined the grounds outside the walls for the purpose of ascertaining if the fire had been caused by persons unconnected with the castle; but no trace could be found, and everything which he saw led to the indubitable inference that the person who had fired the turf in the stables lived within the castle. The report sent by Burke to Dublin Castle charged the offence upon some person residing under Lord Digby's roof; and the authorities, in breach of confidence, communicated it to Mr. Trench, when, instead of having an inquiry instituted, he endeavoured to frighten Burke from discharging his duty, and ultimately he was put upon his trial for having been found drunk on two occasions, and for habitually frequenting public-houses. He thought it was as clear as the sun at noon-day that the outrage had been committed by one of the fabricators of outrages within the castle, and not by any of the tenantry residing outside the walls, and he trusted the Government would do their best to bring the offenders to justice.

MR. HENNESSY said, his hon. and learned Friend had made an attack in most unmeasured terms upon the conduct and character of Lord Digby. He would not examine into the motives of his hon. and learned Friend in so doing, but one thing was clear that he has not investigated the facts of the case. He could inform him, however, that the grand jury of the King's County, composed of twenty-three honourable men, not connected with the Barony of Lord Digby, after hearing evidence upon oath, had come to the conclusion that a malicious injury had been done to Lord Digby's property, and that he was entitled to receive the full amount of the damage. That was also the unanimous opinion of the ratepayers of the county. His Lordship was thought to be entitled to £500, but he would only take £250. Since Lord Digby came into possession of the property only three tenants had been evicted, and they owed respectively eleven years, fourteen years, and thirty years' rent. He hoped that this would be a lesson to his hon. and learned Friend to confine himself to the Woods and Forests and to the county he represented; but which he (Mr. Hennessy) feared his hon. Friend's present position showed was a little too hot for him. He hoped he would examine his facts before he dealt with them, or brought them before the House. A case so utterly fallacious had never been inflicted upon the House of Commons.

Mr. M'Mahon

MR. O'BRIEN said, he had been informed that a state of things existed in the King's County which ought not to be permitted to continue, but from his own knowledge he could not say whether that were so or not. The property of Lord Digby, in the neighbourhood of Geashill, appeared to him to be an improving one. With regard to the transaction under discussion it was stated that a report concerning it had been made to the Government, and placed in the hands of a magistrate of the county; but when he (Mr. O'Brien), as a magistrate of the county, applied for a copy of that report, it was refused to him. It was the duty of the Government to give them that report, or take measures, if they refused, to show who were the real offenders in the case. He trusted the Government would allay the excitement which existed in the district by furnishing all the information which was so much desired.

MR. BRADY said, he only wished to observe that the case made out by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) was very clear. The burning which had occurred would seem to have been caused by some one well acquainted with the position of the premises. There could be no doubt that similar outrages had occurred in many parts of Ireland, and the perpetrators of them ought to be brought to justice. He trusted the Government would take the question into their serious consideration, for it had done great injury to Ireland, and it tended to corrupt the people and to lower the standard of morality in that country.

LORD NAAS said, he must protest against the time of the House being taken up with the discussion of a matter beyond its control. It was unfair for an hon. Member to rise in his place and arraign the whole management of an estate for some years past, because charges were often made on imperfect evidence, and no proper opportunity was afforded for their refutation. It was only a few years ago Lord Digby came into possession of his property. Up to that time he had been almost entirely a resident in England. He appointed a gentleman to manage his estates, and so well had that person acted that they were considered the best managed property in the King's County. Not long ago Lord Digby summoned his tenants to a general meeting, at which he asked them whether they had any complaints to make as to the conduct of his agents. Not a complaint was ever uttered against him. It was true that when Lord Digby obtained possession of his estates he found that several of the tenants held leases which had been illegally granted. The result was that rather than subject his tenants to ruinous litigation he distributed amongst them about £30,000 by way of compensation. With regard to the report referred to if there was any reason to suppose that any person had been guilty of the outrage alleged, of course the Government would place the report in the hands of the law officers of the Crown, and the party would be prosecuted. He must protest against charges being made against owners of property who were endeavouring to discharge their duty conscientiously and with the utmost forbearance and consideration.

MR. CARDWELL said, that with regard to the first question—namely, under what circumstances the barony was called upon to pay compensation for the malicious injury to the burning of this outhouse—the circumstances were these: When an injury was committed, the law provided that the injured person should have the power of applying to the Presentment Sessions. That course had been taken in the present instance: the presentment was sent to the grand jury, was found by them, and the barony then, according to law, became liable to pay compensation. He understood that no fewer than eleven witnesses were examined. The second question presumed that a confidential report had been shown to Mr. Trench; but if that was so it had been without his knowledge, and he did not believe it. He was not, however, prepared to say anything which would fetter the discretion of Government or the responsible officers of the police in holding communications with injured parties, which might tend to the detection of crime already committed, or to prevent future injury being done. With regard to the third question—namely, why the offending person had not been the subject of prosecution—the answer was obvious. The Government were most anxious to pursue a prosecution in every case of the kind, and his hon. and learned Friend might rest assured that as soon as it appeared, in the discretion of the police authorities, fortified by the opinion of the legal advisers of the Crown, right to put any person on his trial for that crime, the Government would not fail to do so.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was of opinion that as Mr. Trench was the local magistrate of the district, the confidential report alluded to ought to have been shown to him. There was no accusation whatsoever against Mr. Trench. It was the duty, then, of the police to go to the local magistrate in a case of this kind. As to the Digby family, for some centuries that family had not resided in Ireland. In 1641 their castle had been burned down, since which period they had lived out of the country until a recent period.

THE ISLAND OF JERSEY.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will have any objection to lay on the Table of the House Copies of Correspondence with the Authorities of the Isle of Jersey on the subject of the Report of the Royal Commission? When the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Sergeant Pigott) moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the amendment of the constitution of the courts of Jersey, he (Mr. S. Estcourt) offered some observations on the subject, intimating a strong opinion that something was required for the amendment of the constitution of the Jersey courts beyond that which could be afforded by means from within. Inasmuch as the evils connected with the court were fatal to the interests of the islanders for years past, and that no attempt had been made in the island itself to reform it, it appeared to him that it was necessary something should be done by the British Parliament to improve it. He understood that the observations he had then made had given offence to some gentlemen in the island. He regretted that his remarks should have had such a result, because he had a high respect for the constitution of the island and the independent spirit of the inhabitants. With the highest respect, however, for the people of Jersey, to maintain their insular independence, and their old constitution and forms of procedure, he still thought that the course taken by the hon. Member for Reading was called for by the circumstances of the case. It was said on the part of the islanders that they were of themselves about to apply a remedy to the evils complained of without any pressure from without, and it was stated that communications to that effect had been sent to the Home Office, before the subject was introduced to the notice of that House. The communications were two in number, and one of them was dated, he was informed, on the 11th of March, and the other some day in the present month. He understood that the right Gentleman was willing to produce the correspondence, and in taking that course the right hon. Gentleman was acting a part worthy of a British Minister. Inasmuch as the question of Imperial authority over those islands was contested, and as it was known that the inhabitants were peculiarly sensitive on that point, it was desirable that the fullest information should be afforded, both to them as well as to the British public on the matter. It was urged on the part of the islanders that they did not dispute the authority of the Queen, but that they rejected the jurisdiction of the British Parliament. He repeated he did not wish to encroach on their liberties or their independence; but when it was alleged that in that part of Her Majesty's dominions there was a systematic departure from or a great delay of justice; that it was impossible for individuals committed to prison to obtain their discharge by any process of law for a long series of years, or certainly months, it was desirable, for the honour of the British name, and for the sake of justice, that a superior authority should interpose. Even if an Act of Parliament passed in the ordinary form should constitutionally be determined not to be the proper mode of dealing with the question, he still thought it ought to have been brought before the British Parliament, and that his hon. Friend the Member for Reading rendered good service in bringing it forward.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had no objection to lay before the House the correspondence to which the right hon. Gentleman had called attention, if he would move for it on a future day. When the correspondence was produced, it would appear that the States, upon the Report of the Commissioners being referred to them, had appointed a Committee to consider the Commissioners' recommendations. What had he meant to convey to the House on a former occasion was that the States had not passed any measure in consequence of the reference which had been made to them. He did not mean to convey to the House that the States had not considered the matter by the appointment of a Committee. The Committee, in fact, had held several meetings, and made several reports, in one of which they commented upon the remarks made in the House upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Sergeant Pigott). He was not sure whether it was in accordance with the rules of the House to lay on the Table public documents containing remarks upon speeches purporting to have been delivered in the House, but if there was no irregularity in doing so he should be quite ready to produce them. It appeared that the States of Jersey disputed the power of Parliament to legislate on the internal affairs of Jersey; but he entertained no doubt whatever as to the legal power of Parliament to legislate on the internal as well as the external affairs of the Channel Islands.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he considered it extremely desirable that the Report of the Commissioners should be adopted in the island. But he doubted the expediency of that House proceeding to deal authoritatively with the matter at a time when it appeared that the States were not indisposed to take up the subject. It should be remembered that the States, and, he believed, the inhabitants of the island generally, while admitting that they were subject to the British Crown, denied that they were subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament; and it seemed to him that it would have been more expedient, if the islanders did not themselves effect the desired reforms, to accomplish that object by means of an Order in Council rather than an act of the Imperial legislature.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE NAVIES OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE. OBSERVATION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I now rise to call attention to a subject the importance of which no one will deny. I have received information with respect to the progress of the French Government in building armour-covered ships, to which I think it my duty to call the attention of the House and of Her Majesty's Government without any loss of time. I bring this subject before the House with the advantage, not only of stating my facts on what I may call high authority, but also of stating what that authority is. Every one conversant with the state of the navy is aware of the high professional reputation of Admiral Elliot. It is only justice to him to say that there are few, if any, more able or distinguished officers in Her Majesty's service. I have the advantage of private friendship with him, and I am able to state that during the last three weeks he has visited all the French ports and arsenals with the exception of Toulon. He has given me permission to mention his name in connection with the statements which I am about to make to the House, but with a feeling which is honourable to himself, as he has lived on terms of friendship with many officers of the French navy, he is anxious that he should not be under the suspicion of having acted in any manner as a spy, or of having done anything unworthy of his high character as a British officer. I should, therefore, state that whatever information he has obtained was obtained in an open manner, and he visited the French dockyards with the advantage of having received the permission of the Minister of Marine. [Mr. LINDSAY: Hear, hear!] I understand the motive of that cheer, and it is only due to the French Government to state, on the part of the French Admiralty, that there has been nothing like any intention to conceal its preparations. But those preparations are of such a nature that after the communication I received from Admiral Elliot I could not delay calling the attention of the Government to them for a single day. During the last fortnight I have received two letters from the gallant Admiral, one of which was written from Brest, and the other from Rochefort. Yesterday morning he returned to this country, and in a long conversation with him I heard the facts that I am about to submit to the House. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) in his place; in the early part of this Session, on a Motion made by the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), the hon. Member for Sunderland spoke strongly on this subject. He stated to the House that he had had a communication with the French Minister of Marine; and he gave his impression with regard to the progress France was making in the completion of her navy; but what I particularly call attention of the House to is a letter the hon. Member told us he had received from M. Chevalier. That gentleman throughout the late negotiation with the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) was in frequent communication with him. I believe no one has taken more pains than M. Chevalier to impress on this country, and on those Englishmen with whom he has had communication, that it is the desire of the French Government to maintain pacific relations with this country, and that it was making no unusual efforts to increase its naval force. M. Chevalier wrote thus to the hon. Member for Sunderland—

“You have a full statement of our navy—you have it in a blue book—you are told officially by the Government and privately, in the most friendly and honest manner, by our Minister, that of iron-cased vessels France has only one fit for use, that in a short time we are to have a second, but that a full a year must elapse before we can get two more, and two years before we shall be in possession of six iron-cased vessels; and it is in the face of such a fact that England feels herself so dangerously menaced that she spends millions without number to get rid of the peril of an invader.”

[Mr. LINDSAY: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman cheers; but before I sit down I think he will be obliged to acknowledge one of two things—either that M. Chevalier was throwing dust in his eyes, though I have no reason for saying he did so—I know nothing that could justify the imputation—or, that M. Chevalier himself knew nothing of the subject of which he was speaking. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty also spoke on that evening; and, with perfect frankness, he said he had no desire to disguise or conceal from the House the real state of affairs with regard to the relative states of the navies of England and of France. The noble Lord stated what at the time was strictly correct, according to all the information he then possessed. He said that the French Admiralty had at that time built, or was building, six iron-cased frigates; two were large vessels of 52 guns; there were four others, sister ships of La Gloire. And, he added that exclusive of the old floating batteries of the Russian war, the French had built, or were building, five iron-cased gunboats, and four vessels of a formidable character, called floating batteries; altogether they had nine iron-covered gunboats or floating batteries, and six large iron-cased frigates, of which La Gloire is one. The noble Lord also gave the House what I think was a most important assurance, and to which I beg to call the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He told us—

“That if they found much more progress made over the water or among any other nation in building these ships, it would be the bounden duty of the Government to come down to the House and state frankly and fairly what was going on, with a view, if necessary, to extend the number of our iron-cased vessels.”—[3 Hansard, clxi. 1155.]

part of the noble Lord, and the fact that it proceeded from his lips makes me regret that the First Lord of the Admiralty is not in the House of Commons. Though I accept any such statement from the noble Lord, and believe it was made in the utmost good faith, and with the intention of fulfilling it, yet the noble Lord is not a Member of the Cabinet, and it is not unjust or disrespectful to him to say, that we cannot receive promises on his part as of the same weight and importance as if they proceeded from the First Lord of the Admiralty himself. Since this promise was made the state of things contemplated by the noble Lord has arisen; the position of the French navy with regard to iron-cased frigates is wholly different now from what it was when that promise was made; but the Government has not come down to Parliament and made the statement thus promised, or asked for the means of extending the number of our iron-cased ships. I must, however, make some exception to this assertion. On Thursday week there was another discussion on the state of our navy; and my noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty took that opportunity of informing the House that the French Government had been making very serious efforts to add to the number of its iron-cased ships since he had brought forward the Estimates in February last. I think he told us there was reason to believe that since that month the French Government had laid down no less than nine more of these iron-covered ships, and so far as the number is concerned this statement exactly tallies with the information I have received from Admiral Elliot. But that information does not exactly tally with other parts of the statement of the noble Lord. When I allude to these differences the House will bear in mind that what Admiral Elliot told me yesterday is what he has himself seen in the last fortnight, while my noble Friend could only speak from the information he had received from others. Admiral Elliot did not visit Toulon: he says nothing of the two or three ships building there; but at other ports he saw the following ships in various states of preparation; some were only lately laid down, others were in a forward state. Besides the La Gloire, to which as every one is aware that it is already finished, the gallant Admiral saw the Magenta and the Solferino, two large ships of 52 guns, to be launched in June; the Normandie, Flan- dres, Magnanime, Gauloise, Valeureuse, Couronne, Surveillante, Revanche, Heroine, and Quillaine. Here are 12 armour-plated ships in different states of preparation. Of the two at Toulon Admiral Elliot does not profess to speak, but of the other 10 every one is a larger ship than La Gloire, and is intended to be an improvement upon La Gloire, and all, excepting two which are of iron, are wooden ships covered with armour. There are thus, including La Gloire, 13 frigates, besides which there are the two frigates referred to in M. Chevalier's letter, where it was said, "twelve months must elapse before we can get two more," and referred to also by my noble Friend last February, and then described by him as being ships of large size, and carrying 52 guns. Now, instead of being frigates of large size and carrying 52 guns, they are line-of-battle ships, two-deckers, carrying two tiers of guns on each side. In tonnage they are very little short of our Warrior. The Warrior is a little more than 6,000 tons; these two ships are of 5,000 some hundred tons, and instead of being 52-gun ships, they are pierced for 100 guns each. In short, they are two ships such as the world has never heard of before, because while nearly equal in tonnage to the Warrior they will have 100 guns, out of which 52—26 on each side—are entirely covered with armour of full thickness, it being intended to cover all the rest of their guns with armour of a lighter character. I have now mentioned two line-of-battle ships of 100 guns each, and 13 of which 12 are heavier than La Gloire, making 15 armour-plated ships. The two line-of-battle ships, named the Solferino and the Magenta, which M. Chevalier said would be completed in a year hence, are both to be launched in the approaching month of June, on the anniversary of the battles the names of which they bear. These two powerful ships will, therefore, be added immediately to the strength of the French navy, and the 15 ships which I have enumerated will be in addition also to the nine of which I have no information beyond that furnished by my noble Friend—namely, the four formidable batteries and the five gunboats. The practical point we arrive at is that the French are rapidly preparing 15 powerful armour-plated ships to be added to nine of a different description, also covered with armour, giving them in the whole a force of 24 armour-covered ships, exclusive of the old batteries which were used during the Russian war. Now, what is the state of preparation in England? My noble Friend will correct me if I am wrong; but I am not aware of more than six ships of this description in England which are built or being built. We have the Warrior and the Black Prince, two ships superior in tonnage, and superior, I hope, in speed to any of the French ships, but very inferior in armament. The Warrior and Black Prince will not, I believe, carry 50 guns—[Lord CLARENCE PAGET: Forty guns]—while the two great French line-of-battle ships will carry 100 guns each. We have also the Defence and Resistance, one of which has lately been launched. I am afraid that those two ships must be considered as inferior to any one of the fifteen vessels I have mentioned—[Lord CLARENCE PAGET dissented]—though I hope my noble Friend is right in expressing an opposite opinion. Then we have two more ships in the course of building; these are of intermediate size between the Defence and the Warrior, and I know of nothing else except the iron-plated ship of the same size as the Warrior, which, as we have heard, the Admiralty intend to build at Chatham. I have thus laid before the House the comparative state of the two navies in this most important respect at the present moment. The French have fifteen frigates and line-of-battle ships, together with nine powerful ships of a different description: in England, so far as I know, we have six, or at the most, seven. Admiral Eliott assures me that not only are the French in advance of us to the extent I have now stated, but that in every one of the yards which he visited the utmost efforts are being made to press all those ships forward to completion. I have no wish to excite alarm by making this statement. I make it because I think it my duty to communicate to the Government and the House in this public manner information of so startling a character. Why are these preparations being made in France? I will not enter into the motives by which the French Government may be influenced in making such efforts. Every one is able to judge for himself for what ultimate end these preparations are intended. The point to which I invite attention is that whatever may be the motive of France, the practical result is that we are rapidly becoming the second maritime Power of Europe. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this statement. Is it true or is it not true? If it be true, what are the intentions of the Government? Such questions ought to be quite above any party considerations, and I will not, therefore, enter into any party matters; but I cannot help feeling that I am bringing this subject under the serious consideration of the House and of the country, at a moment when the Government are, as I think, needlessly throwing away a large amount of revenue. [Ironical cries of "Hear!"] That observation may not be acceptable to hon. Gentlemen opposite after the recent Parliamentary struggle in which we have been engaged, but I hope my tone will convince the House that I am not alluding to this matter with any party object. Let me add that no one believes more sincerely than I do that the noble Lord at the head of the Government is as anxious as any man to preserve the supremacy of England. There was recently paid to him one of the highest compliments that any public man could receive, coming as it did from a Member of this House who is himself of high position and character. The noble Lord was told that, in the opinion of that Gentleman, he has the heart of an Englishman and the head of a statesman. I beg to tell the noble Lord that no party differences shall prevent my saying that I subscribe to this eulogium. For myself, I hope I may lay claim to possessing the heart of an Englishman, and it is because I am full of anxiety as an Englishman at the information received by me from unexceptional authority that I now appeal to the noble Lord, both as an Englishman and as a statesman, and ask him whether he is content to allow this state of things to continue, and whether he is prepared to tell us what efforts he will make to prevent its continuance? He will not, I am sure, deny the gravity of the subject. He can hardly say that I am speaking on erroneous information. I cannot see the possibility of error in statements made as the result of personal inquiry by one of the most distinguished men in our navy. That officer gives me the account of what he has himself seen within a fortnight from this day, and he allows me to use his name. Looking at the nature of this information, I must say I am disappointed that the pledge given on the part of the Government in February has not been redeemed. The state of things then contemplated has arisen. Fresh efforts are being made across the water; no proportionate efforts are being made in England. I hope my object in making this statement will not be misunderstood, and I will merely add that with great anxiety I await the answer of the noble Lord. I hope he is not insensible to the gravity of this information, and that if, as I have reason to believe, he has received the same information, I trust he will be prepared to say that no financial considerations will prevent the Government from using every possible effort to maintain the naval supremacy of this country.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I have received the same information which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich has communicated to the House. As it is derived from an officer possessed of high professional qualifications and unquestionable judgment, it deserves and demands the most careful consideration at our hands. I feel quite convinced that a neighbouring country at this moment is in command of a most formidable number of armed-cased ships; within a short while they will increase it to a fleet of iron-sheathed vessels which will in the case of hostilities, prove perfectly irresistible, unless we take steps, pari passu, to place ourselves at least upon an equality of position and strength. I feel bound to say, as an act of justice towards Admiral Elliott, that he had previously had an interview with the First Lord of the Admiralty, and laid before him the important facts which have been now submitted to the House by the right hon. Baronet, leaving him, I presume, with full power to deal with them at his own discretion. It is the sacred duty of this House to provide that England shall equal every Foreign Power at sea, for if we are deprived of the supremacy of the ocean, her sun will have set for ever. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government has been lately taunted by an hon. Member below the gangway with making a "Rule Britannia" speech, but high as England may stand now, her safety does not consist in a vain-glorious security, but in a progressive maintenance of her strength, which it is a treason against her to weaken, for we owe it to our children no less than all we have received from our fathers, and the debt is the unsullied honour and undiminished welfare of this land.

MR. LINDSAY said, he was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have brought forward the subject on that occasion, when so much more favourable an opportunity would be presented when the House next week went into Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates. He was equally surprised that the right hon. Baronet, if he meant to challenge statements made by him at a former period should not have given him notice; for he could not be expected to carry a whole array of figures in his head. It was only at eight o'clock that he had heard from the right hon. Baronet that he intended to call these statements into question. Neither could he see what good was to be done by the right hon. Baronet's statement. If the information which he had received was so important, his proper course would have been to wait upon the noble Lord at the head of the Government and lay it before him privately. The only result of the course he had adopted would be to create unnecessary alarm. The right hon. Baronet had challenged the veracity of one of the most eminent statesmen in France, M. Chevalier.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: On the contrary, I stated distinctly that I had no right to make any imputation on the veracity of M. Chevalier.

MR. LINDSAY said, the statement of Admiral Elliott was entirely at variance with M. Chevalier's, and if that was not imputing his veracity he did not know what was. In his letter, written in the early part of February, M. Chevalier stated that France had then only one iron-cased ship ready, La Gloire, and that in a short time they were to have a second, but that a full year was necessary to get two more ready, and another year for two more. The right hon. Baronet would probably admit that on the 1st of February there was but one ship ready, and he had not stated that the second one was ready yet, so that M. Chevalier's statement was quite correct. As for M. Chevalier attempting to throw dust in his eyes, he certainly had had some experience of the world, and was not so easily deceived, but M. Chevalier did nothing of the sort, he simply referred him to the Minister of Marine. He saw the Minister of Marine, who handed him his own report of every ship in the navy—of the stages in which they were and where they were to be found, and he offered, if he would visit the dockyards for himself, and judge of the accuracy of the return, he would send a gentleman with him from his own office. Those statements were entirely at variance with the information of the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty on which he was basing his Estimates, and he wrote to his noble Friend from Paris suggesting that he should come over and see for himself, being sure that the Minister of Marine would grant the noble Lord the same facilities as he had so frankly offered to him. No doubt, pressing engagements had prevented the noble Lord from doing that, as they had prevented him from accepting the offer of the Minister of Marine; but so anxious was he to arrive at the truth that he consulted with his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto), and they sent over a competent engineer who visited the dockyards of France. That gentleman held opinions in regard to the intentions of the Emperor of the French very similar to those of the right hon. Baronet. He had the same idea which the right hon. Baronet appeared to have, that the French Emperor was getting together a vast navy with some remote view of invading England; but when he came back he confirmed, word for word, the statements made by M. Chevalier and the Minister of Marine. He mentioned the subject, too, to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) and the noble Lord the Member for Totness (the Earl of Gifford), who had been members of the recent Commission, and they had visited the principal dockyards, and would be able to say whether the information he had received was correct. Besides that he had analyzed the expenditure of the French navy, and he had shown to the House—as clearly as figures could show—that so far from overrunning the Votes—as it was said that money was voted for one purpose and applied to another—for a series of ten years the expenditure had not exceeded the Votes more than our own expenditure exceeded our Votes. The vote for the French navy last year was £4,900,000, and he had no doubt that the expenditure this year would only slightly exceed that sum. But we were spending upwards of £12,000,000 on our navy. If France was only spending £5,000,000, and if we were spending £12,000,000, what reason was there to fear the power of France? Either we must be managing our business very badly, or France must be managing her business exceedingly well, if France could produce for £5,000,000 that which cost us £12,000,000. He wanted to know why the right hon. Baronet who had held the Office of First Lord of the Admiralty should ask the Government to spend more money on the navy? What would be the effect of the discussion in France? The story would go about that, on the recommendation of one who had held high office at the Admiralty, England was about to vote more money for the building of ships. There were many people in France who seriously entertained the idea that we intended to invade France. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh, but he laughed at those who thought that France intended to invade England, and he had far better reason to laugh at them than hon. Gentlemen had to laugh at those Gentlemen in France who thought that England intended to invade France. If they looked at history, they would find that France had never invaded England; but the flag of England had waved over the palaces of France, and the armies of England had marched into its capital. France had never invaded England, but we had invaded France. Therefore, when a vast English fleet was cruising in the Channel it was not so ludicrous to assume that England intended to invade her again as it seemed to hon. Gentlemen opposite. It would go forth that, not content with spending £12,000,000 on our navy, we were about to spend more money. The people in France would bring pressure to bear on their representatives in the Chamber of Deputies. The Chamber of Deputies would bring pressure to bear on the Throne. More money would be spent on the navy of France, and we should have to spend more money on the navy of England. There was some rumour of nine or ten iron-cased ships being about to be built in France. The gentleman who was sent across was told to inquire particularly into the matter, and he did not see the smallest preparation. He did not mean to say that in time France would not build more iron ships, because five years ago the Emperor had determined on building nothing but iron ships; and the Emperor would, no doubt, steadily carry out his intentions, but the gentleman who was sent to France could find no trace of them, and dust was not thrown in his eyes, for he was allowed to visit the dockyards. Now Admiral Elliott's statement was that he had seen nine or ten in course of building, at which he must say he was very much surprised, for iron vessels could not be built with great rapidity without England knowing all about it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Fifteen in different states of progress, and excepting the ships at Toulon.

MR. LINDSAY said, he thought it very remarkable that Admiral Elliot should see so many ships in preparation, when only a fortnight before the gentleman who was sent over could find no trace of the nine iron-cased ships. He believed that what Admiral Elliott saw were not the nine large ships which it was rumoured were in course of construction. He was as anxious as any man that England should maintain her maritime supremacy. Not one word had ever fallen from his lips in that House to lead any one to suppose that he desired to see any power superior to England on the ocean. On the contrary, he had said over and over again that, on account of our vast possessions and our enormous wealth always afloat, England ought to be equal to France and any other naval Power in Europe combined. But he had shown to the House that in efficient ships of war—steamships—England possessed more than all the nations in Europe. He said that we possessed 20 line-of-battle ships, and his noble Friend, the Secretary to the Admiralty, admitted that we possessed 17 line-of-battle ships more than all the other nations put together. Setting aside the vessels which Admiral Elliott said he had seen within the last fortnight, and of which no trace was to be found a month ago, France had built and building six iron-cased vessels, mounting from 36 to 52 guns each. The two terrible vessels with which the right hon. Baronet had frightened the House were, no doubt, the Magenta and the Solferino. They were line-of-battle ships cut down and cased with iron. [Admiral WALCOTT: Not cut down.] Well, then, not cut down. The right hon. Baronet said they mounted 26 guns on each side.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: What I said was that they were pierced to carry 100 guns each. But they had 26 guns on each side under armour of the full thickness.

MR. LINDSAY said, that was no new information, and the right hon. Baronet must know that those two vessels were not at all to be compared with the Warrior and Black Prince. Altogether France had built and building six iron-cased vessels, two of a large size, three mounting 36 guns, and one mounting 40 guns. We had seven iron-cased vessels built and building. If they took either the La Gloire, or the Invincible, or La Normandie, and compared them with the Black Prince and Warrior, why the Warrior was double the size of La Gloire, and would carry double the weight of metal. It was the same with the Black Prince. These vessels were double the size, so that, in fact, in iron-cased vessels we had more of superior size and power than France now possessed. France, again, had four batteries, but they were merely for the protection of the harbours. She also had five gunboats, mounting two guns each; but, surely, there was nothing in that force to create alarm, or to justify the right hon. Baronet in asking the House to spend more money. The right hon. Baronet, however, came down and made a statement which must excite unnecessary alarm in the minds of the people, and was likely to lead us into trouble with the Emperor of the French, which he was sure the right hon. Gentleman was as anxious as any man to avoid. The right hon. Baronet should bear in mind that, while it was necessary to have a sufficient naval force, which we now had, to maintain our position as the first maritime nation in the world, if we built more ships than were necessary, France would go on building more, and then we must go on building more ships, thus entailing on the people of both countries unnecessary alarm and an unnecessary amount of taxation.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the statements of the right hon. Baronet were more alarming when they reflected that the Government, in the face of information to the same effect, had been voting away money which, before the end of the Session, they would be obliged, in one way or other, to replace. The House must bear in mind that they were dealing, not with mere suppositions, but with fact. A British Admiral of the highest standing in the service had visited some of the French dockyards, and had made a report which ought justly to alarm the Government and the people of this country. Evidence had been given that day before a Select Committee of which he was a member—[“Order!”] On the 4th of May, 1858, the keel of the first iron ship was laid in France, and Admiral Elliott told them that there were now 13 frigates and 2 line-of-battle ships in a forward state of construction. His hon. Friend who had spoken last seemed to hold them line-of-battle ships cheap, but the two-deckships would prove most formidable antagonists for any frigate, more especially as they could carry ordnance of the same calibre, and had the advantage of being able to deliver a double broadside at once. The lower part was cased in 4½-inch iron plates, and the upper in plates sufficiently thick to break a shell but not to resist a cannon ball. It behoved the Government to look into this matter at once, as it was his belief that the Government, from private information, could corroborate every word of Admiral Elliott's report. A committee of scientific men should sit at once to determine the question of iron ships. At the present moment there was such a committee investigating the tensile power of iron, and its capability of resistance as applied to shipbuilding, and he would suggest that certain other scientific men possessed of a competent knowledge of metallurgy and ordnance, should be associated with them to investigate the whole question, in order that we might be placed upon a par with France. It was always to be borne in mind that it was not we who had first commenced this plan of encasing vessels; on the contrary, it took its rise from the invention of the Emperor himself of certain iron-cased batteries. Now that was a very important matter, and he called on Her Majesty's Government not only to state if their information did not bear out what Admiral Elliott stated, but whether they were not prepared to turn their attention to the question, and to take steps to put the navy of the country in a satisfactory position as compared with the navy of France.

MR. DALGLISH said, that the dockyards of France were by no means in the state of activity which had been described that night when he visited them lately. He deprecated the continuance of such discussions as that they were engaged in, and he would suggest that the Government had better send a Committee over to inquire into the state of the French navy. He was sure the French Government would afford every facility for the investigation, and had no doubt that the Committee would make a report very different to that which had been conveyed to the House in the speech of the right hon. Baronet.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, I cannot but agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow, that these periodical discussions on the armaments of France are very undesirable. It is perfectly true that the French are making considerable progress in regard to iron-cased ships. Within the last few months they have either laid down or have prepared to lay down nine iron ships. I do not suppose that my right hon. Friend desires to create unnecessary alarm; but he spoke of these ships, as the hon. Member for Sunderland observed, as if they were growing up like mushrooms. The French are not really making, as far we are aware, any unusual exertions at present in their dockyards. They pay, undoubtedly, great attention to their navy; they have vast dockyards and a large establishment of artificers, and they are constantly building ships. Of late years they have bestowed undivided attention on this new class of very powerful vessels. But we have no reason to suppose that we are going to be suddenly overwhelmed with a great fleet of these iron ships, although I daresay that in two or three years they will have made great progress. I have no doubt that my Friend (Admiral Elliott) whose great merits as an officer I gladly acknowledge, has made a faithful report of what he saw across the Channel. I think, however, that my right hon. Friend has somewhat misunderstood Admiral Elliott's views in regard to these iron ships. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Not at all.] I also had a conversation with that officer on the subject. Now, it is perfectly true that the Magenta and Solferino are pierced with 100 ports; but it does not follow that either will mount 100 guns. Indeed, I cannot conceive it possible that either can do so. They have not sufficient flotation for anything like that quantity of ordnance. The Warrior is termed a 40-gun ship, but if we were to put guns in all her ports fore and aft she would number nearly double as many. I doubt, however, whether it would be possible, and I am sure it would be very unwise, to arm those ships with more guns than they can carry with safety. The Magenta and Solferino carry 52 guns a piece, while the Warrior carries only 40; but then our ships are intended to mount 100lb. Armstrong guns. I do not believe that the French ships are calculated to carry those guns, for they are not so large or powerful as our own. I would rather avoid at this moment entering into too great details as to our shipbuilding operations. I purposed making a statement of the intentions of the Government on that head when I again brought forward the Navy Estimates. I may, however, say now that the Government have been watching with considerable interest the proceedings of other countries in this matter, and have determined to build five additional iron-cased wooden ships in our dockyards. We have not made any addition to the Estimates on that account. We have frames of timber cut out for line-of-battle ships, and by giving them additional flotation and length we shall render them capable of carrying a powerful armament. When cased with iron these vessels will be of a formidable character. With respect to what fell from the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) I have no doubt we may expect to derive from the labours of the Committee to which he has referred some very interesting results as to the best means of making iron-cased ships. I will not now further enter into the subject, but will simply say that very shortly we may expect some results from recent experiments which will be of great advantage to us in considering the mode of construction of iron-cased ships. I think the House will excuse me for entering further into detail upon the present occasion.

APPOINTMENTS OF COLONELS.

QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, before the Motion was put, he wished to take that opportunity of putting a question, in reference to a subject which had excited much public attention of late—namely, the appointment of colonels of regiments. He wished to avoid instancing particular cases or mentioning particular names, but if promotion by selection was to be the system, it ought to be done on the grounds only of the service rendered by the individual appointed. He could not conceive a greater responsibility than the appointment of naval and military officers, and on the question of colonels great dissatisfaction had been created. It was a question that ought, perhaps, it would be said, to be raised by persons in the service, but it was difficult for a professional man to come before the public and make statements on a subject of this kind. He would not refer to any particular case, but would ask the hon. Under Secretary for War, What was the principle upon which those appointments were made, and why, in the last appointment that had taken place, the services rendered by several officers had apparently been overlooked by the authorities at the Horse Guards?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the Government had had no notice of the question, but he would endeavour to answer it. It would have been far more satisfactory if the hon. Gentleman had mentioned the name of the Gentleman to whose appointment he referred. [Mr. CONINGHAM: General Eden.] He thought that even without notice he could satisfy the House that the observations made in respect of this Gentleman were not justified by facts. It had, he believed, been said that General Eden was a guardsman, that he had seen no foreign service, and that he had been appointed out of due order. Those statements were incorrect. General Eden rose to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel in the Line. He had served in the West Indies in command of his regiment, and so far from being appointed out of his turn, he had been several times passed over as colonel by officers who were his juniors, but who had the good fortune of seeing more service than he had. That appointment was, therefore, perfectly justifiable. The appointments to the colonelcies of regiments were made upon the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief. It was assumed that officers of good service, although they might not have seen distinguished service, should not be passed over, but that officers of very distinguished service should be selected for those appointments before officers who had not the same opportunities for distinguishing themselves. It would be found that in recommending officers for those appointments, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had acted with strict justice to the profession—neither in that nor in any other case could just ground for complaint be shown. On the contrary, he believed that the opinion of the service was that the appointment of General Eden had been made with strict justice and impartiality.

EXCESS OF MILITARY EXPENDITURE. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners of Audit of the Army Expenditure for 1859-60, and to the large difference between the amount voted and the amount expended. For clothing and necessaries the amount expended was £715,000, and the amount voted was only £450,000. Under the head of miscellaneous charges the sum expended was £823,000, whilst £562,000 only was voted. There were a great number of smaller votes of the same kind. From the Audit Report of the expenditure for the year 1859-60, which was only just delivered to the House, it appeared that upwards of £860,000 was expended on the army more than the amount voted by the House. The excess was met by taking £2,000 from the Vote for extraordinary expenses of the Russian war, £500,000 from the Vote for extraordinary expenses of the Chinese war, and £4,000 from the Vote for Civil Contingen-oies. The balance in excess was chargeable against the Vote of Credit for the China war of £312,394. Thus there had been an expenditure of £850,000 upon the army without the authority of that House. He hoped the reasons for such a proceeding would be given, and a promise made that no such surreptitious application of money should occur in future.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he hoped, as the hon. Under Secretary had now told them that the principle on which Generals were selected for appointments to regiments was not alone for distinguished services in the field, but that the War Minister admitted the claims of officers who, unfortunate in not having opportunities to serve their country in the field, had yet served abroad in unhealthy climates and in our Colonies; and as he had stated that General Eden had been in the West Indies, he would be prepared also when the question was next raised to state how long he had been in the West Indies, how long he had served in regiments of the Line, and what were the services of those officers senior to him who had not received the honour of a regiment. He thought it much better to look to seniority where an officer was competent than selection, but a statement of facts such as he had indicated would enable the House to judge of the value of the principle of selections made by the War Department, he thought it obvious that officers serving in parts of the world distant from where war happened to break out should not on that account be deprived of all chances of promotion, but when an officer who had no field-service was promoted over the heads of men not only seniors to him who had seen a great deal. The Minister should give the special reasons which induced him to make such selections, and such it was asserted was the present case. With reference to what had been stated by the hon. Member for Lambeth, it would be in the recollection of the House that when the Estimates were moved last year the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) told them the £500,000 taken for the war in China would not be sufficient. The account partially audited of the expense of the different branches of the military service now showed that in five Votes that right hon. and gallant Gentleman's prophecy had been verified.

COLONEL NORTH said, he was glad that an opportunity had arisen for correcting the impressions which the comments of the public press were likely to convey with regard to the claims of General Eden to promotion. He (Colonel North) had great pleasure in bearing testimony to the merits of General Eden, whom he had known at Sandhurst, and with whom he joined the army in the same year. His gallant Friend was not a Guard's officer. He had served in the West Indies, and had buried half the 56th regiment at Bermuda. If officers only were to be promoted who had been under fire it was difficult to say what could be done. The gallant General, like others, was obliged to serve where his regiment was ordered. Why the House was annually to be treated to the question of the Guards he could not comprehend. On all occasions the Guards had upheld the honour and glory of the country, and he was utterly at a loss to understand why the Guards were to be talked about as a sort of condemned corps. He thought the appointment of General Eden reflected great credit on His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. When appointed he left another appointment by which he was the loser of £3,000. It had not been the good fortune of the gallant officer to be sent out to the Crimea, but if he had he would have distinguished himself as well as other officers. The reason of his exchanging into the Guards was that his health had been shattered in the West Indies.

GENERAL UPTON said, he too, wished to bear his testimony to the professional worth of General Eden. He entertained a high opinion of General Eden as an officer in command of a regiment of the Line. He considered that in all his selections of officers to be placed in command of regiments His Royal Highness had exercised the most anxious discrimination, weighing in the most difficult circumstances the claims of one officer with those of another, both in regard to seniority and the nature of their service, and he felt quite sure that the House might entirely rely on every appointment that was made.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee;

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,200,581, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Warlike Stores for Land and Sea Service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862, inclusive."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he would repeat the question he had asked in the earlier part of the evening, as to the appointment of a Committee further to test the merits of the Enfield and Whitworth rifles. The Committee which sat in 1858 on the subject, strongly recommended that its investigation should be continued, and the majority of the Committee were of opinion that greater accuracy was to be attained with the Whitworth rifle than with the Enfield, and also greater penetration into substances fired at. With reference to the Vote he had to complain that the items were too large, and that it did not furnish the House with sufficiently detailed information as to the mode of procuring and the cost of stores. As instances, he particularly referred to the charges for the repairs and purchase of small arms, £524,000; iron ordnance, shot, and shell, £424,483; gunpowder, saltpetre, charcoal, and sulphur, and miscellaneous stores, £790,000, all of which ought, in his opinion, to have been divided. He also desired to know why the charge for experiments amounted this year to £20,000, against £12,000 last year?

MR. T. G. BARING, after expressing his regret that he was not in the House when the hon. and gallant Gentleman originally asked his question with reference to the trial of the Enfield and Whitworth rifles, said, that there would shortly be a new trial of an Enfield musket of a reduced bore and a Whitworth rifle made of similar materials. He would admit that it would, in a future year, be desirable to divide the item for miscellaneous stores, but at the same time he must suggest that detailed information, although frequently useful, did not always facilitate discussion. The reason why the charge for experiments for the year was higher than it was during the last, was, that very expensive experiments had to be made with the Armstrong guns and with iron plates. With respect to the number of small arms, he hoped that at the end of the financial year the stock of small arms would be in a very satisfactory state, and that they might be enabled to reduce the expenditure next year under that head.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the large amount of the Vote—£2,200,000, and asked if the House was to go on increasing in extravagance every year?

COLONEL DICKSON said, he could not understand why this Vote should exceed the similar Vote for last year by £112,473, and he, therefore, should move its reduction by that amount.

CAPTAIN JERVIS observed, that it was most important that we should keep up our stocks of warlike stores. When the Crimean war occurred we had so small a store of gunpowder that we had to draw away every pound that we had in our Colonies; and when the Volunteers were first organized the Government was unable to supply them with arms. Speaking of the Enfield rifle, the fact was often lost sight of, that the weapon did not originate in that manufactory, but merely took its name from the Committee appointed to inquire into the subject having sat at that place. In the trials between the Whitworth and Enfield rifles, Mr. Whitworth found that it was only by reducing the bore that an increased range could be obtained; and he accordingly had the credit of bringing under the notice of Government the fact that great perfection of rifling and sighting could be produced with a small bore. Whether that size would be equally effective in the field as at a target should be left to military authorities to decide; and if they determined in its favour it could be manufactured equally well at Enfield. He, therefore, trusted the hon. and gallant Member for Limerick would not press his Motion to a division.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he was never disposed to grudge money for experiments really beneficial in their tendency; but those which had taken place with regard to iron-plated ships were not calculated to inspire confidence in Government experiments. The Enfield rifle was now acknowledged to be inferior to the Whitworth, although it seemed to be the object of the Committee to establish the superiority of the Government weapon.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, it was Mr. Whitworth who had given to the Enfield rifle the excellent position which it had now attained. In 1843 Lord Hardinge, being struck with the inferior quality of the weapon in the hands of the soldiers, called the gunmakers together, and they made what was then called the Enfield rifle. Mr. Whitworth was sent to America, and, having reported that the manufacture of guns there was very superior, upon his return Lord Hardinge gave him a Commission to make the best rifle that it was in his power to produce. He set about the task with all that skill and judgment which he was known to possess, and produce a very superior weapon. The Committee to whom it was referred to have its powers tested reported that they should like to reduce the Enfield rifle to the same size, and that was accordingly done, but by the alterations which they introduced, borrowing two parts in three of the turn of Mr. Whitworth's barrel, they made the short Enfield a very superior weapon to the long Enfield. Finally, the Committee made no report whatever, but General Hay, who was at the head of the science of artillery in England, and who was undoubtedly the highest authority on the subject in this kingdom, recommended the Government to have the Whitworth rifle extensively manufactured. Lord Herbert, when a Member of that House, had over and over again stated that the Whitworth was a much better rifle, but that the cost, amounting to about £10 each, acted as a prohibition on its manufacture. Necessarily, when made on the same scale as that produced at the request of Lord Hardinge, which was to be the best that could be got for money, they must be expensive weapons, but Mr. Whitworth had stated that if manufactured in quantities, and without any essential difference in quality, they could be turned out for the same price as those now made at Enfield. The question remained in that position at the close of last year, and now the hon. Under Secretary for War informed the House that another trial was about to take place, with what ultimate intention he was of course unable to say. As regarded the Vote, though he declared himself perfectly unable to understand the accounts submitted, he thought it much better to trust to Government for the accuracy of the different items than to acquiesce in proposals for sweeping reductions.

COLONEL DICKSON stated that the increase of which he complained occurred on the item of miscellaneous stores, which had nothing whatever to do with the real defence of the country.

COLONEL SYKES suggested that in future the Estimates should be accompanied by a report containing the details and results of experiments, for the information of that House and of manufacturers of arms.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH pointed out that the sum actually expended in 1860 for warlike stores was £1,126,000, and that consequently the present Estimates showed an increase of upwards of £1,000,000.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH inquired whether the items referring to guns referred stores for guns or to guns themselves? He hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not press his Motion to a division.

COLONEL DUNNE remarked that the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith) must be labouring under some mistake as to the sum expended last year. He recommended the Committee not to reduce the Estimates, but to hold the Government responsible for the expenditure. The House of Commons was not the proper place for discussing the relative merits of guns and rifles. All that they ought to require was that the experiments should be fairly made, and that the Government should select the best weapon.

MR. T. G. BARING said, the accounts for the year 1859-60 would be discussed when the Supplemental Estimate was moved for making up a deficiency of £200,000 in that year. The expenditure for warlike stores had been greatly increased since the introduction of the Armstrong gun. It was a fact that the sum placed at the disposal of the Secretary of State for warlike stores last year was considerably larger than that now asked for. The Vote last year was £2,358,088, while this year it was only £2,200,510. The item of miscellaneous stores included all the materials used in all the Government factories for the production of every kind of ammunition, excepting gunpowder, and was, therefore, intimately connected with the defence of the country. He attributed the increase on the item to the additional expenditure required for the manufacture of ammunition for the Armstrong gun. That gun was more expensive than the old ones, and its ammunition was also more costly. For the first few years, therefore, there must necessarily be a large expenditure.

MR. LIDDELL said, of course England could not afford to remain behind other nations with regard to the adoption of new inventions of war; but the expense of the experiments on new weapons of offence and defence ought to be seriously considered, and he hoped the experiments would be certified by scientific men as proper to be made.

GENERAL UPTON said, he wished to ask if there were any outstanding debts for arms due to America?

MR. T. G. BARING said, he was not quite certain that there were not certain outstanding claims for arms in the case of America.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,088,108 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Warlike Stores for Land and Sea Service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862, inclusive."

EXCISE AND STAMPS BILL. COMMITTEE.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he intended to reprint the Bill after Amendments had been made.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Licensed Dealers in spirits taking out an additional Licence may retail and send out Foreign or British Spirits in less Quantities than Two Gallons),

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he had to present several numerous signed petitions from persons who either began business or increased it last year in consequence of the provisions of the Bill then passed with regard to refreshment houses, by undertaking the sale of wine. He had inquired what kind of wine they sold, expecting that it would turn out to be light wines, but he found, to his astonishment, that the wine was strong wine used for medicinal purposes. They stated that a pint bottle was convenient for the pocket, while the quart bottle was not. He would, therefore, move to substitute "pint" for "quart." The Government had vindicated themselves very successfully from any entanglement with regard to the Galway contract, and he hoped they would clear themselves from any suspicion with regard to being influenced by the in-keepers.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his sympathy was with the hon. Gentleman; but having agreed that a single quart bottle should be the smallest quantity saleable by the wholesale dealers, he could not agree that the clause should be altered to the word "pint." He felt quite sure that the kindly and genial nature of the hon. Gentleman would assist him out of his entanglement with the supporters of a contract on the other side of the water.

MR. CONINGHAM said, the quart bottle referred to in the clause would in fact be no more than a pint in measure.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would not press his Amendment.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he proposed to add a proviso to the clause, empowering retailers of spirituous liquors to recover for any amount of spirituous liquors supplied by them, and not consumed on their premises. His object was to prevent dishonesty; for many persons, having procured spirits, not for the purposes of tippling, yet, to avoid payment, pleaded the Tippling Act.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he doubted whether the proviso was within the scope of the Bill, which altered the Excise duties, while the Amendment referred to the Tippling Act.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that the point raised by the proviso was not a fiscal one, but an important question of law, very fitting for the House to consider on a proper occasion. He confessed that his own prepossessions were in favour of the proposition; but, as it was not strictly germane to the present Bill, perhaps the hon. Member had better withdraw it.

Proviso, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD FERMOY said, he would move, as an Amendment, to add to the end of Clause 2—

"That, notwithstanding any provision hereinafter contained, all penalties to be incurred or recoverable under this section, or in relation thereto, may be sued for by any superintendent or inspector of police, upon information and summons, before the police-court or Justice having jurisdiction in the place where the offence is committed, but the appropriation of the penalty shall be the same as is hereinafter specified."

He asked the Committee to take proper means to see that the law was properly carried out by giving the police the duty of seeing that the rights of the Licensed Victuallers were carried out on the one hand and the law on the other.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not object to the introduction of these words, though he would not be responsible for the form of the proviso, which, however, he believed was sound in principle.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Any Person may take out a Licence for the Sale of Table Beer by retail not to be consumed on the premises),

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the extension of the beer-house system in the country had been most prejudicial, and he was afraid the clause would be only extending the evil of which so much complaint was made. The houses for the sale of small beer ought to be subjected to the same supervision as the beer-houses. Without such supervision he looked forward with much alarm to the proposed 5s. licence. The houses would spring up all over the country, and he believed that a great risk would be run by licensing the house in the way proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the object of the clause was not to create any new houses for the sale of liquor. The houses already existed, and the purpose of the clause was simply to legalize a practice which prevailed throughout the country to the comfort and advantage of the people. The 5s. licence was only applicable to liquor of the weakest description, and which was not to be consumed on the premises.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 4 to 10 inclusive.

Clause 11 (Who shall be deemed House Agents and require to be licensed as such),

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would withdraw the clause, which compelled every person who had anything to do with the letting of a house to take out a two guinea licence. The object seemed to be to protect those who were called "legitimate" house agents by making every person who undertook the letting of a house, say at a watering place, take out a licence. The clause was conceived in the very spirit of protection and reactionary legislation, and he hoped it would be omitted altogether.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets mistook both the objects and origin of the proposal, and immensely exaggerated the inconveniences which he said would arise from the duty. His arguments applied only to the very limited class of places similar to that from which he had received the communication he had read—namely, the watering-places. The agreements by which furnished houses were taken were already liable to a stamp duty, and it was only following out what was already the usual practice in legislation, first to reduce a duty which was unreasonable in amount to a moderate sum, and, secondly, to bring the persons on whom the payment of the stamp duty depended, under the view of the Board of Inland Revenue by means of a licence so as to ensure its collection. The present proposal was merely to apply that general principle to a particular case, and was not suggested by house agents. The only reason Mr. Ayrton had given for supposing that it was so suggested, was a letter from a house agent, approving, not the tax now produced, but one of a much larger amount. The only sense in which this measure was protective was that it tended to protect the revenue.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he concurred in objecting to that sort of interference, which was accustoming the people of the country to the interference of the police in their private affairs. It was a vexatious interference with trade; and though he was a strong supporter of the general policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he thought that [right hon. Gentleman made himself obnoxious by his constant petty interferences, his penny stamps and licences.

MR. AYRTON said, he must be permitted to observe that there was no such principle as was alleged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No person was licensed because he used stamps. Persons were licensed to bring them under the purview of the Excise; but then there was a power to take away the licence if they sought to defraud the Exchequer. There was no such provision in the Bill. The measure, if carried would give a colour to an agitation against class legislation. It was a monstrous proposition, and he should divide the Committee on it then, and, if necessary, in a larger House.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS thought that the clause was neither more nor less than an attempt to throw the whole letting of lodgings into the hands of the auctioneers.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he wished to know whether the tax would apply to persons in the habit of collecting rents? He had received a letter from a constituent who collected rents for a friend at a distance, and he wanted to know at what point the operation of the law would begin and end?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied in the negative.

MR. G. W. HOPE asked if it would apply to the letting of farm-houses?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was entirely confined to the letting of furnished houses; and the 14th Clause would make an exception in favour of all persons whose duty it was to act as agents for landed estates.

MR. PULLER said, it would be a considerable innovation to put a penalty on all who made agreements not on stamped paper, as many made agreements by letter, and would be much inconvenienced if restricted from doing so.

Motion made, and Question put "That Clause 11 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 24: Majority 11.

Clauses, 12, 13, and 14 agreed to.

Clause 15 (The Stamp on the Lease of a furnished House may be adhesive; the same to be cancelled).

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask whether the adhesive stamp would not in some cases be too small for all the parties to an agreement to sign their names on?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must admit the defect, but it would be very inconvenient to change the law that applied to other adhesive stamps.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 16.

House resumed; Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 154.]

ATLANTIC ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY—THE GALWAY PACKET CONTRACT.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY having presented a Petition from Town Commissioners and Inhabitants of Ballymoney

against the withdrawal of the Postal Subsidy to this Company, proceeded to move an Address for, Copies of the Correspondence between His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Her Majesty's Government on the Subject of the Contract with the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. The noble Marquess said he postponed his Motion the other evening because there was business upon the paper which was likely to occupy considerable time, and he was also influenced by a hope that he should be able to introduce the subject to their Lordships' notice freed from any circumstances of temporary irritation. The subject of the relations between the local Government in Ireland and the Imperial Government was one of great importance, and would best be considered apart; and he regretted that a Minister of the Crown in "another place" had thought fit to introduce into the discussion a topic which it was impossible to pass over without notice. An attempt had been made to prejudice the consideration of the question to which he was about to call their Lordships' attention by insinuating that there was a connection between a supposed negotiation for a corrupt object and the votes of certain Irish Members upon a recent occasion. That allegation was made by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who justified it by its great notoriety, it having been publicly stated in the principal public organ of this country; and the noble Lord evidently desired that his belief in the statement should receive an equally wide circulation with the allegation itself. It was the duty of any one who sought to introduce this subject to their consideration to take the earliest opportunity of stating that the allegation was totally unfounded, and that there never had been any intention on the part of any one of entering into such an arrangement as that described by the noble Lord, that the Irish Members would give their support to the Budget upon the express understanding that the Galway contract should be renewed for six months. The noble Lord, with unnecessary indignation, had disclaimed any participation in such an understanding; but he must have known at that time that the Irish Members had never solicited any such favour from the Prime Minister, because that noble Viscount distinctly stated that he considered the person who waited upon him had no authority in the matter. And yet, in the face of that declaration, the noble Lord the Member for London stated that an interview had been requested of his noble Friend at the head of the Government on behalf of the Irish Members by a person who seemed to have a right to ask it. It could not have been from the head of the Government that the noble Lord learnt that. The Irish Members would, no doubt, defend themselves; but he (the Marquess of Normanby) thought twenty-four hours ought not to be allowed to pass without protesting against the acceptance as a proved fact of the noble Lord's assertion, which really never had any reliable foundation.

The particular subject to which he now wished to call their Lordships' attention was the statement of the Lord Lieutenant in relation to the Galway contract. It was necessary to bear in mind that the only connection which existed between the decision upon the Galway contract and the vote upon the Budget arose from their juxtaposition in point of time. But whose fault was that? Clearly not that of the Company, nor of the Irish Members, but of the Government, who chose such an inappropriate moment for action. It would be supposed from the insinuation that had been made that the feelings of the Irish people towards the present Government were so cordial that a hostile vote could only have been caused by a desire to exercise an influence upon the question of the Galway contract. But did facts really show that the people of Ireland were friendly towards the present Government? Had the law officers of the Crown in Ireland been able to find seats in the other House? Without entering into particulars of the causes, he might observe that with respect to the noble Lord the Member for London the Irish people regarded him as actuated by different feelings towards them since the memorable epoch of the Durham letter. Whether justly or not, it was said that the general feeling of the Irish Roman Catholics was that the noble Lord in all his communications with them had not treated them with that consideration which his former career entitled them to expect from him. In that state of things a deputation waited upon the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a few days since, when that distinguished nobleman gave expression to his personal feelings in very consolatory terms, but it appeared that he had not the power to give the assurances which persons in his situation might be expected to have the power of giving. He did not intend to cast the least reflection upon the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for he was convinced that the last shred of popularity which the present Government possessed in that country arose from the personal character of the noble Lord. In answer to the deputation the Lord Lieutenant said—

"I beg to assure you that I have not waited until now to express my sympathy with the views and wishes which you have laid before me. I should most sincerely regret the final disappointment of the hopes which gave birth to the contract of the Government with the Royal Atlantic Mail Steam Packet Company. It is only fair, while I perceive the force of many of the considerations set forth in your memorial, that I should mention that I have not been made acquainted accurately, or in detail, with the arguments that are alleged on the other side of the question. I shall not fail to transmit your views for the earnest consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and to entreat for them the most favourable reception which they can find it consistent with their duty to bestow."

Whether that statement was to be regarded as an avowal or a complaint, it was one of the most extraordinary declarations ever made upon an important subject by a high functionary administering the Government of that country. But the terms of the noble Lord's reply proved that at that time he thought the question was still open for consideration. One of the strongest reasons why the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, ought not to have thrown out the imputation he did against those gentlemen, that they had endeavoured to enter into some negotiation of which he complained, was that at that very time he held in his hand a statement on the part of the Company, and a memorial signed by fifty Members of Parliament of all sides—mostly Irishmen, but some English Members, such as Mr. Leatham, Member for a manufacturing town in the north. These fifty names were appended to a very temperate document, declaring that they considered the proposal of the Company a reasonable one, and begging to recommend it to the favourable consideration of the Postmaster General. So that, in point of fact, not only had the Irish Members no idea of resorting to any indirect and corrupt means, but they had actually taken this course of representing the matter in a fair and moderate tone, which they thought might be effective to the Postmaster General. This contract, as their Lordships were aware, had been originally entered into under the Administration of his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Derby), under the auspices of his noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Eglinton). He would not, in his noble Friend's presence, say what every one knew of his eminent qualities to fill that office; but he would say this, that he had the good fortune—which he himself knew to be the greatest requisite for the effective discharge of its high duties—to be in intimate communication with the Prime Minister of England. That fact, which was well known, gave the greatest weight to the position which his noble Friend sustained as Lord Lieutenant. He knew this from his own experience, because, during the four years he was in Ireland, he had been in weekly, he might almost say daily, communication on subjects both local and imperial with the then Prime Minister, his late Friend, Lord Melbourne. Being known to be in possession of the views and feelings of the Prime Minister did give to the decisions and acts of the Lord Lieutenant a force which nothing else could supply. That being the case, he was sorry to say that during the last two years this contract had been uniformly viewed by the Government in a harsh and captious spirit towards a Company which was fairly endeavouring under extraordinary difficulties to carry out the duties they had undertaken. He hoped that some one better acquainted with the details than he could pretend to be would explain to their Lordships the whole facts of the case, but he could not help remarking on the extraordinary moment and the extraordinary manner in which the contract had been annulled by a letter which he did not take to be the production of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley of Alderley)—it was the act of the Government, for it was founded on and accompanied by a Treasury Minute. For sixteen months after the contract had been entered into there was a Committee sitting on the subject in the other House of Parliament, by which the Company was kept in suspense, and they had reason to suppose that the decision of the Committee would be against them until the Government intimated to them that the contract was to be carried out. Therefore, it was not fair to consider the contract commenced until after the termination of those sixteen months—namely, in August last. The reason for immediately determining the contract was connected with the Company's sending a particular vessel across the Atlantic. He would not pretend to say what might be the result, but he should not be much surprised if that vessel made a peculiarly short passage. But at any rate the Government ought not under the circumstances to have behaved in so harsh a manner. Throughout the length and breadth of Ireland there was for the first time, independently of all party feeling, a universal desire that this contract, which was believed to be well calculated to conduce to the welfare of that country, should be restored. He did not mean to say that it ought not to be carefully watched; that Government were bound to do; but, at the same time, not in a harsh and capricious spirit. His firm belief was, although the contract might for a time be stopped, the parties could not fail to obtain that to which their local position gave them overpowering claims, a fair share of the Atlantic communication, which was likely to be more and more enlarged. No other port could at all compete with the western coast of Ireland in offering facilities for short and speedy communication with America; and he felt perfectly assured that sooner or later—he hoped sooner rather than later—the object of these petitioners would be attained. The noble Marquess concluded by moving the address.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Marquess has imported into the discussion of the subject of which he has given notice a variety of questions raised in the House of Commons the other day with respect to the conduct of the Irish Members. He has referred to certain rumours which, he says, were first mentioned publicly by the noble Lord the Member for London, and which had no foundation. Now, I think it is not only improper but highly inconvenient to discuss here debates which take place in the other House, and I think it is still more inconvenient that this should be done in a manner which, as far as my recollection goes, is not quite accurate. The noble Marquess has not stated the facts with the correctness which is desirable in such a matter. I do not believe that it was the noble Lord the Member for London who first alluded to the rumours to which the noble Marquess has referred. It was an independent Member who first made allusion to them; he was followed by the leader of the Opposition, who also referred to them, stating his belief that they were not true; and all that the noble Lord the Member for London said was that if any such request had been made by the Irish Members, or if any such concession had been made by the Government, it would have been disgraceful to the parties concerned. I think his words were that "it would be better that ten Governments should fall in consequence of not making such a concession than that one should be kept on its legs through following another course." If that is a correct description, as I believe it is, of what fell from my noble Friend, then I must say that his declaration was one which your Lordships on both sides will feel to be straightforward and honourable. The rumours to which the noble Marquess referred seemed to have originated from Father Daly, a gentleman who has taken an active interest in this matter, having taken upon himself to speak for the Irish Members, they subsequently declaring that he had no authority for so doing. I am not quite sure, judging from what has fallen from the noble Marquess, whether he has authority to speak for the Irish Members; and, until I have received certain information upon that point, I think it will be better for me not to follow the noble Marquess into all the details which he has brought before your Lordships. All I can say is that if the question of the Galway contract did influence the votes of individual Members on a recent occasion, I have no doubt those Gentlemen were not animated by any feelings of a selfish character, but were actuated simply by considerations involving the advantage of that portion of the country with which they are more particularly connected. The noble Marquess has indulged, not for the first time, in an attack upon the noble Lord the Member for London, and, repeating what he said elsewhere, has charged him with a change of political opinion. I have some difficulty in answering the noble Marquess upon that point. There are few public men who, during a long life, have not changed their opinions, even on some important question, and they are right to avow such changes. I must say, however, having watched the career of the noble Lord the Member for London, that he is less open to any imputation of that sort than at least most public men. But I must frankly confess that upon the subject of changes of political opinion the noble Marquess can speak with infinitely more knowledge and experience than myself. Turning to the merits of the Galway contract case, I have no doubt that my noble

Friend the Postmaster General will be ready to go into them if necessary. My own individual opinion is that my noble Friend having acted in concert with his colleagues in every step he has taken in the matter, he is more open to the charge of having shown undue leniency to the Galway Packet Company than to that of having treated them with undue severity; but the present is not a convenient time for discussing that question. Certain papers have been presented to Parliament, but others have still to be produced; and I think your Lordships will be in a better position for eliciting the truth when you are in possession of all the documents relating to the case. Meanwhile I shall merely say that some years ago I had the honour to preside over a Commission appointed to consider the advantages of having a packet station in Ireland, and the relative merits of different ports. Upon the latter point—the advantages and disadvantages of different ports—we gave no decided opinion, but we showed in what way the voyage might be accelerated, and how this would tend to the benefit of the whole country. It is quite clear, indeed, that if any proposal were made from Galway or elsewhere to establish a packet communication with America, the Government would be bound—as every Government would be bound—to give it a full, fair, and impartial consideration. As regarded the Motion of the noble Marquess, he had to state that there had been no official correspondence between the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Her Majesty's Government on the subject, and, therefore, there was none to produce.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON said, he did not rise for the purpose of defending the noble Marquess from the attack which had been made upon him by the noble Earl—the noble Marquess was quite able to defend himself—but he might be permitted to say the taunts of the noble Earl were cheered by some who were at least as open to animadversion as the noble Marquess. His object in rising was to make a few remarks on the question of the Galway contract—and he knew of no question on which so much misstatement had gone abroad, or on which there had been so much unfair writing and speaking. Charges of the grossest kind had been brought against the late Government—accusations of their having purchased political support and of having attempted to make political capital in Ireland by means of the Galway contract. He was obliged to the noble Marquess for giving him an opportunity of contradicting in the most emphatic manner these monstrous accusations. Let their Lordships suppose for a moment that the Galway contract was a mistake, a blunder, a bad investment of the public money—let them even suppose that it was entered into partly with the view of influencing the feelings of the Irish people before a general election, and of rendering the Government popular—nevertheless, he appealed to their Lordships whether that would be half so bad a case as throwing away £1,300,000 of indirect taxation, and repealing a comparatively inoffensive and increasing tax, very much for the purpose of conciliating a certain powerful demagogue who had embarked in the speculation of a penny newspaper, and that small party who own him as their leader. Now the real facts of the case of the Galway contract were as different as possible from that to which he had just referred. He had no hesitation in avowing himself guilty of this delinquency of the Galway contract, if a delinquency it had been. He avowed himself to be the great delinquent in the matter. He had no hesitation in saying he was the originator of the Galway contract; that he approved of it, and was answerable for it. He would state the reason which induced him to favour the contract. When he was first in office in Ireland he found that a strong national feeling had long existed in favour of the establishment of a steam communication between North America and some Irish port. It did not require much penetration to see that if such a scheme were successfully carried out it would be advantageous to Ireland, and he accordingly lent a willing ear to it, though he saw the difficulties in the way. The claims of various harbours were brought before him—those of Galway especially were recommended as the port from which the shortest voyage could be effected between the United Kingdom and America; but he felt that, however grateful he might be to the people of Galway for the almost royal reception they had given him, and however much he might desire to restore the prosperity of that interesting old city, his duty was to submit the case of Ireland generally to the Government as to the place at which a mail packet station might be most beneficially established in connection with America. He induced the Government to appoint a Commission to investigate the claims of the different Irish ports for this transatlantic communication. The Commission reported in favour of establishing a steam communication between Ireland and America, and they named Galway and Foynes as the harbours best suited for the purpose, giving the preference rather to Foynes. On his return to Ireland in 1858, to his surprise and pleasure, he found a company established at Galway for steam communication with America; that large ships had been placed on the station, and that it only required the countenance of the Government to make the enterprise permanent and successful. He had only to look at the map to see it was the shortest route to America, and it was shown to him that the voyage could be done in less than five days; he had, moreover, every reason to believe from the inquiries that he had made that the company was perfectly solvent. So long, he might add, as it was an open question which of the Irish ports would form the best station for the purposes of Transatlantic communication he had felt to some extent debarred from making a recommendation in support of any one of them in particular. When, however, he found what he believed to be a powerful company had selected for themselves the route in question, which had been favourably reported upon by a Royal Commission, he no longer hesitated to urge upon his noble Friend who was then at the head of the Government the expediency of assisting by means of a subsidy, or in some other shape, an enterprise which had been so auspiciously and unexpectedly set on foot, and which appeared to open to Ireland the prospect of increased commercial advantages without, in his opinion, being at all likely to operate to the detriment of any other part of the United Kingdom. He felt, he might add, more particularly justified in taking this course, because he found they were already successfully carrying out the mail service with Newfoundland. So constantly, indeed, had he pressed the subject on the attention of his noble Friend that he had no doubt he began to detest the very name of Galway, as was now very probably the case with noble Lords opposite and their colleagues in both Houses of Parliament. Be that, however, as it might the subsidy was at last granted—a subsidy, be it remembered, not for the payment of a large sum of money on the mere chance of the Company performing their engagement, but a sum paid for each trip for work absolutely performed, and withheld for work not done, and that under the most stringent regulations, as the Company had since found to its cost. Such, so far as he was aware, was the history of the Galway contract; and he could most truly and solemnly declare that in the part which he took in the matter he was actuated solely by a desire to benefit a country which had been committed to his charge, feeling, as he did, that he might do so without any disadvantage to the rest of the United Kingdom. He was influenced throughout the whole transaction by no desire of making political capital, or obtaining a stray Irish vote for the Government of which he was a member. Not only would he have scorned to recommend the granting of the subsidy on that ground, but he had no idea that such an effect as that to which he alluded would result from the course which he pursued. If, indeed, any idea of that kind had crossed his mind at all, he could have hardly failed to perceive that the benefit conferred upon Galway would be likely to give rise to a feeling of jealousy, which it actually did in Limerick and other parts of Ireland, while he would have looked upon Galway itself as too hopelessly hostile to the party to which he belonged to hope that it would derive any accession of strength from that quarter. That opinion would, no doubt, have been falsified by facts, for a Gentleman who supported the Conservative party had since been returned for Galway; but in the division by which the Government of his noble Friend near him was turned out of office he believed the question of the contract did not make the slightest difference, except, perhaps, so far as the vote of the Gentleman to which he had just referred was concerned. Having said thus much he should not enter further into the subject—which he had felt it to be his duty to enter upon at greater length than other noble Lords—beyond saying that he thought the Company had been somewhat hardly treated. It appeared to him that the Company went into the contract with great vigour, and that their energies had been continuous from the first, though they had been dealt with in a most hostile spirit. Scant justice appeared to have been for some time past dealt out to them, and he could not help expressing a hope that for such a state of things a remedy might be afforded.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, as one interested in the locality to which the discussion related, wished to bear testimony to the importance of the question at issue. That question the noble Lord the President of the Council seemed to intimate was one which, so far as the Government were concerned, he considered as still open?

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say, in explanation, that what he had intended to convey to the House was that the general question of the expediency of establishing communications between Ireland and America was one on which the Government had pronounced no decision.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: Well, passing over that point, and referring for a moment to the remarks of the noble Marquess who had brought forward the subject, with respect to the alleged attempts at corruption made in the present instance by the Irish Members, and their endeavour to seduce the noble Lord at the head of the Government into the adoption of a particular course, by the threat that they would desert him at a critical moment if he did not accede to their wishes, he must be permitted to say that he did not believe a word of the story. He knew that noble Lord too well not to be perfectly satisfied that no man who was acquainted with his character and general public conduct would be fool enough—to put the matter on no higher footing—to make to him such an intimation. While, however, he placed no faith in the statement to which he was alluding, he could tell their Lordships, of his own knowledge that the Irish Members might have told the noble Lord with justice that since the days of the Volunteers of '82 no feeling so unanimous in opposition to a particular measure had manifested itself in Ireland as that which prevailed in the case of the annulling of the Galway contract. In Belfast and Ballymena, in Drogheda and Dublin, the state of feeling on the subject was precisely the same; while Waterford and—to her honour be it said—Limerick had spoken out their opinions in favour of Galway Packets. That a very strong feeling on the subject should have been created was, indeed, to be expected; and he felt perfectly astonished that no communication was made to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland before taking a step which involved consequences of the utmost importance to Ireland. As to the utility of the office of Lord Lieutenant different persons entertained different opinions; but no one could deny that so long as the office existed, the individual filling that position was not only the instrument of the Government in Ireland, but the person to whom they ought to apply for information on all questions affecting the interests of that part of Her Majesty's dominions. Petitions, memorials, the expression of public opinion furnished by meetings and through the press all tended to show that the present was a question which was regarded in Ireland to be of the utmost importance; and great as might be the mistake of a Government which had evoked the feeling which now existed in that country with respect to the withdrawal of the Galway contract, there remained behind the equally grave question whether that feeling was or was not justified by the occasion? That was a question which for his own part he was prepared to answer in the affirmative. But in endeavouring to prove the justice of that view, he did not propose now to enter at any length into the details of the contract as entered into in April, 1859, or of the manner in which the Atlantic Company had carried out its engagements; but it was necessary briefly to refer to the origin of the contract. The subject, of Irish American Packets, he might observe, was by no means a new one. With the application of steam to Atlantic voyages, the subject, of course, became more interesting, and was more forcibly brought before the public; and in 1858 certain persons, who had already steam-boat enterprises in the west of Ireland, seriously turned their attention to the question of establishing a communication between Ireland and America, and, in concert with persons of capital in England, determined to get up a Company for that purpose. Application was made to the then Government for assistance, and he must say that they were prompt but not hasty in giving that assistance. They well considered the matter, and at last assistance was given—he might almost say reluctantly—and he believed that never was more undeserved abuse cast on any set of Ministers than that attempted to be thrown upon the Government of the noble Earl opposite in respect of this matter, because the Ministers fairly considered whether Ireland had not a right to be assisted in developing the full advantages of her geographical position when combined with the interests of the whole commercial world. The noble Marquess here quoted from the Life of Pitt by Lord Stanhope—who, he stated, was entitled to take a high rank among historical writers—a passage describing Pitt as saying that there were two ways of dealing with countries situated like Great Britain and Ireland—either to make the smaller country subordinate to the greater, and a mere instrument for the advantage of the latter, or to make it the participator in a community of benefits and a system of equality and fairness which would aggrandize the interest of both. He believed the last view was a fair description of the policy which the noble Earl opposite intended to adopt when he entertained this question of establishing a steam communication between America and Ireland. At the election in 1859 not a word was uttered at the hustings in disapproval of the noble Earl's policy in this respect; nor when Parliament met was one word said against it. Circumstances had occurred which made the question of packet and telegraphic contracts one of great interest, and a Committee was appointed to inquire into the subject, but the new Ministry never hinted to the Atlantic Company that they had the slightest disposition to cancel the contract. He had said that he would not go into details with respect to the manner in which the Company performed the contract, which was a great deal too stringent in its provisions as regarded the Company. He was ready to admit that there had been many failures, and the noble Lord at the head of the Post Office was welcome to that admission; but the noble Lord was not welcome, and would not be permitted, to treat Ireland in an unfair spirit and to take from her together with the pound of flesh what she considered her heart's blood. This was not an affair to be treated lightly, for it was a serious matter to provoke the opposition of a whole country, and it behoved those who had to administer the affairs of the kingdom to consider the effect of such a course, both at home and abroad. As to the manner in which the contract had been performed, if the Government had come with deliberation to the determination that the Company was not in a condition to carry on the great work they had undertaken, the Government might have given fair notice to that effect, and then the result would have been a surprise to no one. They might have acted in that way in the course of last year. But what did the Government do? He believed that they were exceedingly indulgent on some occasions to this Company, but at last the Post Office decided not to send out the mails on the 7th of May by the Parana, because she only went on her trial between eleven and twelve knots an hour; and a few days afterwards Government put an end to the contract, and to direct communication between Ireland and America. He thought that not a statesmanlike course of proceeding, and it justified the great warmth of feeling which still continued on the subject. He asked their Lordships whether they considered the ground stated in a Parliamentary paper for stopping the mails from going by the Parana to be sufficient for terminating the contract? The Parana was surveyed on the 3rd of May, and the surveyor reported that her average speed was only between eleven and twelve knots an hour, and, therefore, that he did not think that sufficient to secure her passage to St. John's in six days. The whole question turned on this point. The Parana had on a former occasion reached Boston one day and some hours under the contract time, yet the Postmaster General had stopped the mails of the United Kingdom and of Europe upon an unfounded suspicion on the part of the surveyor that the Parana could not make the voyage within time. The whole case for breaking the contract turned upon the efficiency or inefficiency of this vessel, for if the vessel when tried at Southampton had been found to have a speed of twelve to thirteen knots instead of eleven to twelve the contract would have stood to this day. His noble Friend at the head of the Post Office thereupon wrote to say—

“The failure of the Company to provide an efficient steamvessel for the conveyance of the American mails of the 7th of May has rendered it necessary that the Postmaster General should again consider the obligations of the Company under their contract, the manner in which those obligations have been fulfilled, and the means possessed by the Company for continuing the mail service.”

Thus the question whether the Government were justified in breaking the contract rested solely on the speed of the Parana. He doubted whether, if the matter were one that could be brought before a Court of Equity, the Postmaster General would be held to have had any legal right to refuse the Parana. There was, therefore, the more reason why his noble Friend should have carefully considered the whole case, and have shown to the people of Ireland, to Parliament, and the commercial public, that he and the Government had provided the best substitute in their power for the Galway contract. There had been some talk of economy, but the Post Office would have saved money by sending their letters by the Parana under the contract. An impression had gone abroad, which appeared to be entertained by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that if this contract had been suspended for six months the Company would have received £36,000 during those months. But his noble Friend (Lord John Russell) did the Postmaster General a great injustice if he thought he had been paying at that rate for the services actually performed by the Company. Since the commencement of the contract in June last how much did their Lordships suppose the Company had received? They had made during the whole year six complete voyages both ways and one voyage out besides those not in accordance with the terms of the contract, yet so many fines and penalties had been imposed that the whole payment from the Government to the Company had only amounted to between £15,000 and £16,000. What had been the result of the abrupt determination of the contract? Why, the benefit of early intelligence to British property during the last month might have been more than the value of the whole contract. What were the chief topics of interest in the news from the United States at the present moment? The effectiveness or otherwise of the blockade of the Southern ports, and the views of the American Government on the right of search, and the principles of international law. Our underwriters and ship-owners were deeply interested in obtaining the speediest news on these points, and yet this was the moment chosen by the Government, for the sake of making a small saving, of putting an end to the quickest communication with the United States. He believed that if the Post Office had allowed the Company to continue the service the latest news received from the United States would have been anticipated by at least five days. The decision of the Government, it was clear, had been hastily adopted; and if the Irish Members withdrew their support from the Government it was not they but the Ministry that had been guilty of inconsistency, because the Government had held out the assurance that they would carry out the policy of their predecessors in maintaining this communication by Irish packets with the United States. He trusted that the final decision of the Government would yet be in favour of renewing this contract. Whether the recent evident change in the opinion of the Government had been caused by the representations of the Lord Lieutenant or by the manifestations of popular feeling, it was a perfectly legitimate course for his noble Friend at the head of the Government to win the confidence of the people of Ireland, aye, and of the commercial public of this country, by doing that which would promote their interests, and at the same time secure for the Government a great and deserved popularity in Ireland.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY:—My Lords, the Government are anxious to promote postal communication with America, and there is no objection on principle to establishing such a communication between Galway and America, and the chief objection to the contract with the Galway Company was not that the contract was made for the benefit of Ireland, but that, contrary to the universal practice, as stated by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Sir Charles Trevelyan, it was given without competition, and without any notice to any of the great public companies, or to the mercantile community, that might have enabled them to enter into a competition for giving the service on the terms most advantageous to the country. The question itself is divided into two distinct parts. The first is whether the contract has been properly performed by the parties who have entered into it? If a contract is not fulfilled by one party, I have never heard that it could be made a just charge against the other party that it put an end to it. But I will go further; I will admit, if we had pushed the conditions to an extreme, and terminated the agreement on the very first omission to fulfil its terms, we should not have acted with a fair liberality. But a very short history of the proceedings under the contract will, I hope, satisfy your Lordships that so far from having treated the Company with severity it has been shown more than usual indulgence. We have from time to time met every application the Company has made to us. It has from the first moment been allowed on many different occasions to employ vessels that did not answer the conditions of the contract; it was allowed temporarily to alter the voyages from once a fortnight to once a month. Then the Company, not having a single vessel fit for the service, made another application to be allowed to postpone the service for four months to the 12th of March. That was also conceded. But under these circumstances it is quite clear that it was competent to the Government to terminate the contract without any imputation of harshness. The Government, however, said we will suspend the contract for the time you yourselves name, but solely and entirely on this condition, that if at the end of that time you are not ready with proper vessels, under the terms of the contract, it will be terminated. It is very inconvenient to the public service that a contract should be changed, mutilated, or imperfectly executed; and that there should be no certainty of the Company having proper vessels ready to perform the duty, particularly in this service, of which speed is such an important element. It is most necessary that the vessels should possess the power and speed that would enable them to perform the voyages within the time stipulated; but only once has the voyage from Galway to St. John's been performed in six days since the commencement of the service. In every case except one the Cunard boats have made as short or shorter voyages from Queenstown to Boston and New York than the steamers from Galway. It, therefore, comes to this, that as far as a direct communication between Ireland and the United States is concerned, no advantage has been gained by the establishment of the Galway line of packets; equal advantage has been derived from the Cunard steamers and Liverpool line touching at Queenstown, and from the other lines of steamers that run from Liverpool, calling at Londonderry, without receiving one sixpence of subsidy. The Company had certainly a right to require from the Government full and due notice that in the event of certain circumstances occurring the contract would be put an end to. My Lords, I can refer to the correspondence to show that not once only, but repeatedly, the Company has had such notice. The suspension of the service from October to March was only granted on the clear understanding that if the Company had not, at the end of that period, proper vessels for the recommencement and continuance of the service, the contract would be terminated. And what was its condition at the end of the term? On the 26th of March the Company had not a single qualified vessel to go to sea. I am obliged to say that under these circumstances I felt it extremely difficult to avoid carrying into execution the declaration made when the extension of time was granted; but on very urgent representations being made to me of an accident that had occurred to the Hibernia, the Company was allowed to forego a voyage on payment of a fine; but it was declared to them that they were not to be allowed to resume the service unless they had efficient vessels. On the 7th of May a vessel was offered for acceptance by the Government. It was the Adriatic. This steamer fulfilled the conditions of the contract, and has performed the service admirably. Had all the vessels been equal to the Adriatic no question would have been raised. The next vessel, the Columbia, had been so strained that she was obliged to go into dock at Liverpool to be repaired, and would probably be retained there four months; and the Hibernia, even on her way from Southampton to Galway, was so injured, that it was stated she would not be fit to go to sea for three months. The Company, therefore, has not a single efficient vessel but the Adriatic, and the Adriatic was still on her American voyage. The Company, therefore, had not a single vessel ready for the next voyage. Under these circumstances the Company offered the Parana. The Government agreed to accept the Parana if the Admiralty surveyor, whom they were bound to consult, reported her fit for the service; but the report the Government received was that the Parana had not speed enough to perform the service she was bound to perform under the contract, and that he could not recommend her. Under these circumstances I ask my noble Friend, had he been Postmaster General, could he, with such a report in his hand, have consented to send out the Parana? It really is of vital importance to a service of which speed is such an essential that the vessels should be sufficiently fast for the purpose; it is speed alone that makes the service valuable. I admit that the communication with Newfoundland is a most important one, and I should be sorry to see it dropped; but to effect it with advantage the vessels must have speed enough, according to the contract, to perform the voyage within six days. If they take a longer time than that the communication is of comparatively little advantage. No advantage has been gained by the substitution of Galway for Queenstown. I must, therefore, contend that there is no ground for charging the Government with unduly pressing on a particular Company, or with a want of feeling for the interests of Ireland. It is not possible that the Company could have been treated with more consideration. And what would have been said if the Company had been allowed to continue the contract when they notoriously had not performed it? The Government is already open to the strongest representations from the mercantile community generally against the policy of subsidies to lines of steamers running to ports of the United States to which communication already exists, while any assistance is refused in aid of the Canadian line of communication direct between England, Ireland, and the St. Lawrence. Under these circumstances it would have been impossible for us to continue any lax indulgence to the Galway Company after the ample notice it had received. Is it possible, then, after all that has passed, to accuse the Government of having acted harshly or unjustly towards the Company? I can say with the utmost sincerity that Her Majesty's Government and all those with whom I am politically connected have never shown any indifference to the feelings or the interests of the Irish people. The noble Marquess who introduced this Motion (the Marquess of Normanby) when he accused my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of having changed his political opinions, should, I think, have recollected from what party he received support and from what party he encountered opposition when he was himself pursuing a truly liberal policy in Ireland; and I am, therefore, surprised that he should have ventured to come forward and in a similar spirit endorse the accusations which have been made against the Government on this subject. I propose shortly to lay on your Lordships' table the whole of the papers connected with this matter. I do not wish to withhold one single letter or iota of the correspondence. Your Lordships and the other House of Parliament will be able, after reading those papers, to form your own judgment on the conduct of the Government, and, however much we may regret the feeling which prevails in Ireland, I think, upon calm consideration, it will be found that it would not be just to visit us with condemnation for the course we have adopted. No man can be more anxious than I am at this moment to see an early opportunity offer for promoting direct and immediate communication between that country and America, and my only desire is to see it established on the best and soundest foundation.

LORD BROUGHAM said, it was impossible to deny the fact that this moderately important question had excited a more universal and intense feeling throughout the whole of the sister kingdom than any other question, great or small, within their memory. Men of every party and sect, and of every class, and whether employed in agriculture or trade, had united together with unexampled unanimity upon this local question. He, therefore, hoped it would be yet found possible, notwithstanding what had passed, for the Government to excuse this Company to a certain extent for the non-performance of their contract, and to renew this contract with the Galway Company, provided the Government had reasonable grounds for supposing that the Company would for the future be able to perform their part of it. He could not sit down without adverting to a point referred to by the noble Marquess in reference to this subject—namely, the rumours, or rather positive statements, as he (Lord Brougham) would call them, that, upon the authority of a Cabinet Minister, an attempt had been made on the part of certain Irish Members of the other House of Parliament, to obtain by threats of voting, on a totally different question, adversely to the Government, a promise from the head of that Government that this contract, or subvention, would be continued to the Galway Company. As the noble Marquess stated men must be extremely unwise and exceedingly foolish if they could suppose that any such threats could influence his noble Friend at the head of the Government to betray his duty. It had, however, been shown by his noble Friend near him, that action was actually taken—that was the expression—by the body of Members in question long before the time when this proceeding was alleged to have taken place. Now all that went to show that the charge itself was wholly unfounded. He (Lord Brougham) should, however, like to have a better rebuttal of the charge, and that could only be given by Father Daly himself. That gentleman might either deny that any Irish Members had authorized him to go to the First Lord of the Treasury with their threat and their offers, or he might show that no Irish Member connected with the Galway contract had given him any authority to take that step. It was obvious that if any hon. Member sent a message to a Minister, "If you do not put money in a certain place," which was the old form of a threatening letter, "I will vote against you," or that if the Minister did not give the Member the assistance he asked he would not support him upon a great question which had no possible connection with the subject matter of the application—that a more corrupt proceeding, or a more direct act of offering to be bribed, could not well be imagined. It was in vain for the other House of Parliament to challenge the respect of the community if they allowed such a charge to be made without taking means to rebut it by a thorough investigation. With what justice could they order a poor voter in some borough who had accepted a bribe of £5 to be prosecuted if they were to connive at Members of their own House of Commons offering to sell their votes for a bribe of so many thousands? The facts of the case should be ascertained at once. If Father Daly were examined at the bar of the House of Commons he would declare whether any Member or Members of the other House of Parliament had authorized him to go to Lord Palmerston with that joint menace and promise. If he said he was so authorized, then let him declare who those Members were, and then let it be seen whether or not such Gentlemen shared directly or indirectly in the Galway contract—which circumstance would have the effect of converting this message into an offer to receive a bribe. If Father Daly, however, chose to say that he had no authority from hon. Members to make this statement to Lord Palmerston—if he said that he had merely intermeddled in the matter from over zeal in the good cause—then, of course, there could be no charge made against any Members in reference to the matter. But so long as this statement remained uncontradicted by proof, or untracted by Father Daly, men would not hesitate to believe that there was good foundation for the report.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that Father Daly had called upon him before going to Lord Palmerston, and asked him to accompany him. Father Daly, however, did not say a word to him about the propositions which he was represented to have made at his interview with the Prime Minister. Having declined to accompany the rev. gentleman he could not tell what passed at the interview with the noble Viscount. He could only state that Father Daly said he was going, as he believed he actually did go, straight from his house to Lord Palmerston, but he much doubted whether the rev. gentleman said that he had any authority from any Member of Parliament. Father Daly showed him a paper signed by forty-eight Members of the House of Commons of different shades of politics, who were all in favour of the Galway contract, but he did not say a word to him about the Irish Members voting.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, there was a strong feeling engendered in the people of Ireland that they were not being justly treated—that everything was to be taken from them and nothing given to them. It was of very little consequence for them to be told in a case like this that such and such persons had acted improperly. The question with them was whether their country was still to be commercially crippled and depressed, or whether she was to be permitted to rise to the rank of a great mercantile and prosperous community? With regard to the conduct of Father Daly, he had no acquaintance with that person; but he knew the rev. gentleman had taken great interest in the social improvement of Ireland, and, regarding this question, no doubt, as one of vital importance in a commercial point of view, he had been induced to seek an interview with the Prime Minister upon it. There were strong rumours that the Galway Company had met with most unfair treatment from the English Government, and that there was a determination to prevent Ireland from taking the position she ought to occupy as one of the first commercial countries in the world; and if ground was given for these feelings, he feared that most disastrous results would follow. He appealed to the Government to take the matter into their very serious consideration, and would prove that these suspicions were not well founded by establishing—without reference to this particular Company—a communication between the west coast of Ireland and America.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY thought the noble Earl the President of the Council must have been misinformed when he stated that no correspondence had passed between the Government and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on this subject, inasmuch as the Lord Lieutenant had certainly conveyed an impression of an opposite character in his recent observations upon the subject of the Galway contract.

He (the Earl of Clancarty) should certainly hear with satisfaction that the Government considered Ireland the most desirable part of the United Kingdom for the establishment of steam communication with America. Galway was undoubtedly the most convenient port for this Transatlantic communication. At the same time, he could not but think that the proposal to throw open the question at a moment when all classes in Ireland had agreed that Galway was the best port for a packet station was a device to cast among them an apple of discord, and to create differences which had not hitherto existed among them. He thought that the general public had obtained a great advantage from the policy pursued by his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Eglinton) when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, particularly in having initiated the postal steam communication between Ireland and America.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE supposed that after the statement of the noble Earl, the President of the Council, he was justified in believing that the Government was willing to consider the question of a postal communication between Ireland and America?

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Government admitted the desirability of such a communication, and, if the matter were thrown open to public competition, they would consider what proposition would be most for the advantage of the public generally.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he would have been satisfied with the statement had it not been for the observations which were made by the Postmaster General to the effect that the Galway contract interfered with a line already subsidized between Liverpool and Canada. The advantage of the Galway line was that St. John's, Newfoundland, could be reached within six days, and thence there was telegraphic communication with Canada and the United States. But even a line of packets stopping at St. John's, would be exposed to the same hostility as the present Galway line. This was not a mere local question, but affected Imperial interests, and he hoped the Government would regard it in that light. He thought no time should be lost on the part of the Government in establishing steam communication between a port in the west of Ireland and America.

that whatever objections might have been entertained to the contract originally, the contract having been given, and the Company having received a large subsidy, the conditions of the contract were not carried out, and that the contract should not be continued unless these conditions were performed.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, in reply, expressed a hope that the Government would follow the advice of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham), which would meet all the real justice of the case, by showing some indulgence to this Company, provided they could satisfy them of their power to carry on the contract. This would prevent delay at a time when rapid communication with America was most important. He did not think that in the House of Commons or elsewhere there had been any accusation that Mr. Daly had stated that he was authorized to enter into any terms with the Government for the support of the Irish Members; on the contrary, he asked—he would not say whether he did so in the most judicious manner or in the way most likely to carry his point with Lord Palmerston—that was a different question—but what he asked was, that the Premier should see the Irish Members. And what he accused the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary of was that he had stated that this person who had asked that interview of the Prime Minister seemed entitled to speak on the subject. That was entirely inconsistent with what had been stated by the Prime Minister himself, and it would have been better if the noble Lord the Member for the City of London had not used the phrase, “that this rev. gentleman appeared entitled to speak on behalf of the Irish Members,” which, no doubt, misled the House and was not founded in fact. The noble Earl the President of the Council had asked whether he was authorized to speak on this subject in the name of the Irish Members? He certainly had no aggregate authority; but he could state from those he had seen, that no such representations as had been made were founded on any authority from them. Besides, the hon. Members for the Queen’s County and Roscommon stated on Thursday evening, in the House of Commons, that Mr. Daly had no authority to represent the Irish Members, and that they had told Mr. Daly so themselves. He had been told that he ought not to accuse others of inconsistency, being so open to that charge himself. He should be glad to know on what single subject he had shown inconsistency. All the measures he was connected with as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had been long since disposed of, and those which Her Majesty’s Ministers were now foisting on the House of Commons did not exist at that time. There was not a single Member of their Lordships’ House on the Bench opposite who was ever a colleague of his, and the reason why he had stated that he had no confidence in the present Government was that he shared the opinion of the Prime Minister, expressed by Lord John Russell, and on which that noble Lord had acted. If on any question connected with Ireland any change of opinion existed, it was on the part of Lord John Russell, not on his part. The only true judge upon this point must be the Irish people. He repeated, he was not open to any charge of inconsistency in not supporting noble Lords opposite, whom he saw collected from all points of the political compass. As his noble Friend had stated that there was no public Correspondence on this subject, he could not persist in his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MARRIAGE LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE moved that the following clause for the registration of buildings for Roman Catholic worship be added to the Bill:—

“Every Chief Constable of Police shall, within One Month from the passing of this Act, deliver to each Registrar within his District a Certificate signed by him in duplicate, of all Buildings set apart for the public Celebration of Divine Service according to the Rites and Ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Religion, within the District of such Registrar; and from Time to Time thereafter similar Certificates of any other Building which may be so set apart, and such Certificates shall be for such Buildings the Certificates required by the Twenty-seventh Section of the recited Act for Buildings to be licensed for the Solemnization of Marriages, and shall be acted upon accordingly for the Purpose of licensing the same for the Solemnization of Marriages under this Act only; provided always, that the Issue of the Certificate of the Registry on Vellum or Parchment mentioned in the said Section shall not be necessary, and that the Registrar shall be entitled to the sum of One Pound only, to be paid from the Police Rate, on the Delivery of any such Certificate, although more than One Building may be returned therein.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was glad of this opportunity of correcting a mis-

apprehension which had gone abroad, that he had consented to the two clauses of his noble Friend being added to the Bill. He had consented to certain Amendments moved by the noble Lord, which he thought unnecessary but harmless, being introduced with the most laudable object of preventing clandestinity, and to preserve the evidence of marriage; but the other two clauses he had strongly condemned, and, instead of carrying them out, he said he would rather abandon the Bill altogether. The clause was condemned in Ireland, not only by Roman Catholic priests, but by persons of all religious persuasions.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN AND CONNOR said, the clause was most objectionable in its character, and would have a very injurious effect.

Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> to-morrow.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

3<sup>o</sup> Customs and Inland Revenue.

DUBLIN CORPORATION WATER BILL. THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, the people of Dublin doubted whether, even supposing the money which it was proposed by the Bill to lay out were spent, they would be able to get the water. Nor had the details of the Bill been sufficiently considered, and, under all the circumstances attending the progress of the Bill through the Committee, he would move that it should be read a third time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. BROWN-WESTHEAD said, that as a Member of the Committee he was surprised that the hon. Gentleman should pursue this course after every facility had been given for opposing the Bill in Committee. He contended that there was no good ground for undoing the work of the Committee, which had given their best consideration to the whole matter. Fifty-four out of sixty members of the corporation supported the Bill; a Royal Commissioner and an eminent engineer had reported that the proposed supply would be ample and of the best quality. He, therefore, trusted the House would support the decision of the Committee.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, the Bill was opposed to the opinions of the great majority of the ratepayers of Dublin, who were most anxious that it should go before a fresh Committee.

MR. DAWSON concluded that the Bill would operate as a measure of confiscation, to the extent of depreciating a large mass of house property at least 25 per cent.

MR. MASSEY said, that the Bill had already been amply discussed on a previous stage; it had also been before the Select Committee upwards of three weeks, and he trusted the House would negative the Amendment.

MR. BLAKE said, he was surprised at the opposition which had been raised by the hon. Member for Dublin. He had watched the progress of the measure through Committee, and he was satisfied that every reasonable concession had been made to its opponents, and that the Bill ought to pass into law.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that after the long and patient investigation of the Bill by the Committee, he was astonished at the opposition offered to it by the hon. Members for Dublin.

MR. GEORGE said, he was quite aware of the inutility of opposing the Bill, but he protested against the retention in it of such dangerous and mischievous clauses. A very large proportion of the most respectable inhabitants of Dublin were heart and soul opposed to the measure; and although it might receive the sanction of that House he trusted it would be ignominiously defeated in "another place."

MR. O'BRIEN said, he should support the decision of the Committee.

MR. MAGUIRE strongly urged the House to pass the Bill, as the water supply of Dublin was at present in a most scandalous state.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he should oppose the Bill in the interest of the taxpayers of Dublin.

MR. M'CANN remarked that it was the duty of the House to see that the poorer classes in every large town had a supply of good water, and he should, therefore, support the Bill. He had often occasion to be in Dublin, and he was, therefore, able to say that the water was at some seasons of the year utterly unfit for human consumption. He had never been able to drink a pint of it, not even when mixed with spirits.

MR. VANCE said, the Committee had refused to hear the ratepayers of Dublin against the Bill, which they considered as one of confiscation. The Bill would im-great additional burdens upon the ratepayers, and as an instance of this, he stated that under its provisions his water rate would be increased from 30s. to £10 a year. So far as the character of the water at present supplied in Dublin was concerned, it was very good, and he pledged his honour to the fact that neither himself nor any member of his family, nor any visitors, ever drank anything but the pipe-water now supplied in Dublin.

MR. COGAN said, he was sorry to hear that the hon. Gentleman gave his friends such very bad entertainment. The hon. Gentleman did not represent the property of Dublin. The majority of those who paid taxes voted against him, and the hon. Member was only returned by the votes of the freemen who paid no taxes.

The House divided:—Ayes 169; Noes 93: Majority 76.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup>, and passed.

CHURCH RATE ABOLITION BILL. QUESTION.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that he wished for the convenience of the House to put a question to the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock in regard to the Business of the House for Wednesday next, for which day the third reading of the Church Rate Abolition Bill was fixed. He wished to ask him Whether, in consequence of, and in deference to, the strong desire expressed in the House at the last stage of the Bill for some measure of compromise, and in order to give hon. Gentlemen who, in consequence of that desire, had been engaged for the last month in endeavouring to devise the terms of such compromise, and who, he might say, had made considerable progress, he would not consider it consistent with his public duty to postpone the third reading for a fortnight, in order to give an opportunity of completing a Bill to effect the object in view? If the hon. Member assented to that course he (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) would undertake that in the course of that fortnight he would bring forward a Bill, agreed upon by those Gentlemen, and the particulars of which should be communicated to him. The hon. Baronet could then take whatever course he might think proper respecting it.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that he considered that any question coming from the right hon. Gentleman on such an occasion was entitled to consideration on the part of the House. There was undoubtedly a large body of Gentlemen in that House who considered, perhaps erroneously, that it was possible to carry out some compromise on that question. He was not sanguine about that being done, but at the same time he thought it right, out of respect to those hon. Gentlemen, that they should have time to consider every plan which they thought desirable to introduce. Under these circumstances he should take upon himself the responsibility, though he might be blamed for so doing, of assenting to the request of the right hon. Member, though he begged it to be understood that he did so purely out of deference to the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends.

EAST INDIA LOAN.—QUESTION.

MR. VANSITTART said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India, Whether he is going to proceed with the East India Loan that evening? An important statement had been made by Mr. Laing on the 27th of April, a report of which had arrived only that day, and it was desirable that Members should have time to peruse it.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he intended to proceed with the measure that night. When he had made his statement the hon. Member would see that, whatever Mr. Laing had said, it was quite necessary that the measure should not be delayed.

METROPOLITAN TOLL GATES. QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What progress has been made towards the abolition of the Toll Gates round London; if the Metropolis Roads Commissioners have held any special meeting to effect that object, or whether they have been summoned for the purpose at all; if they have met, what was done, and out of the forty-one Commissioners, how many were present; and if Her Majesty's Government intend to present any specific proposition for abolishing Toll Gates, and when?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS regretted to say that he had no hope of being able to prepare a measure for the abolition of toll gates in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis. That was a question which would admit of very simple solution if the respective parishes were willing that the toll gates should be abolished, and that the expense of maintaining the roads within their limits should be defrayed out of the parish rates. But it was clear that any settlement of the question would involve the abolition of the present system of turnpike tolls, and the transfer of the charge to the rates either of each parish or of some larger district; and in order to effect such a change the consent of the persons at present interested in those roads must be obtained.

PROPOSED AGRICULTURAL SHOW IN REGENT'S PARK.—QUESTION.

LORD FERMOY said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there is any truth in the report that he has granted permission to the Royal Agricultural Society of England to hold their annual Show in the Regent's Park; and if so, whether he has restricted them either as to the space which they are to occupy, or the time during which it is to be so occupied for the erecting and taking down the sheds and other fittings?

MR. COWPER said, he had no doubt that the general opinion of the Metropolis was in favour of giving facilities for holding the Agricultural Show next year in London, and that great dissatisfaction would be created if the offer of the Agricultural Society upon that subject were refused. Proper sites were provided and subscriptions were raised in every provincial town in which those shows were held for the purpose of ensuring their satisfactory progress; and he thought it would be derogatory to the intelligence and liberality of the Metropolis if the facilities given in other towns were refused in London. The Agricultural Society found that the north-western portion of the Regent's Park would be very convenient for their purpose, and he did not know any central place in the Metropolis where the holding of the show would be more acceptable to the public at large. A space of twenty-six acres was available in that quarter, without encroaching on the public convenience. The show would occupy a week, and the Society would be required to make the necessary preparations in the shortest possible time.

CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask the Solicitor General, When he intends to proceed with the Criminal Laws Consolidation Bills?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was sorry to say that in the present state of the public business it was not possible for him to name a day—certainly not an early day—for proceeding with those Bills. But after the careful consideration they had received from a Select Committee of the other House last Session, and of a Select Committee of the House of Commons in the present Session, he hoped that no great time would be required for their consideration. He should bring them forward on as early a day as the state of the public business would permit.

THE EVICTIONS IN DONEGAL. QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Can he assist to fix some early day for discussing the recent Evictions from the lands of Derryveagh, in the county of Donegal, as a matter of appalling interest to the remaining Inhabitants of Ireland? He hoped it would meet the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland that he should bring the subject under the notice of the House on Monday next.

MR. CARDWELL said, he could not give his hon. and learned Friend any assistance in securing a day for the discussion of that subject; but if he brought it forward on a Committee of Supply night he could stand upon his own right.

PARISH SCHOOLMASTERS OF SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether it be his intention to introduce a Bill this Session to increase the salaries and to improve the position of the Parish Schoolmasters of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he proposed to bring in a Bill that evening for increasing the salaries and improving the position of Parish Schoolmasters in Scotland.

UNITED STATES.—THE CIVIL WAR.—
PRIVATEERING.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will exercise the discretion which by the Law of Nations they possess to prevent privateers sailing under the as yet unrecognized flag of the so-called Southern Confederacy from bringing their prizes into any port of Her Majesty's Dominions? He did not ask this question with regard to privateers sailing under the flag of the United States, simply because he had no expectation that any Letters of Marque would be issued by the United States' Government.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, my answer must be rather wider in extent than the question which the hon. Member has put to me. The whole matter has been considered by Her Majesty's Government, and it has been determined, after consulting the Law Officers of the Crown, that orders should be given to interdict the ships of war and privateers of both parties from entering the ports and harbours of the United Kingdom, or of the Colonies and Dependencies of Her Majesty, with prizes. In order to make the matter more clear the House will perhaps allow me to read an extract from the despatch which has been sent to the India Office and to the Governors of the Colonies—

"Her Majesty's Government are, as you are aware, desirous of observing the strictest neutrality in the contest between the United States and the so-styled Confederate States of North America. With the view more thoroughly to carry out that principle we purpose to interdict the armed ships, and also the privateers, of both parties from carrying prizes made by them into the ports, harbours, roadsteads, or waters of the United Kingdom or any of Her Majesty's Colonies or Possessions abroad."

The orders went out to the colonies on Saturday last, and they have gone to India to-day. I may also state that we have during the past week been in communication with the French Government upon this subject. I stated to the French Ambassador the view taken by Her Majesty's Government, and asked him what course the Government of France intended to pursue with regard to this subject. The French Ambassador has informed me that the French Government propose to act in conformity with the existing law of France. That existing law is founded upon an ordinance passed in the year 1681; and the rule is that in case of a war in which France is neutral, no privateers are allowed to bring their prizes into the ports or harbours of France or its dependencies for a longer period than twenty-four hours. They are not allowed to sell the cargoes, or in any way to dispose of the prizes which they have taken; and after the twenty-four hours have expired they are obliged to leave the port. Therefore, the course pursued by France is not very different from that which we intend to adopt.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in reference to a statement which he saw in the newspapers of the day. It was said that the Government of the United States had expressed their intention of recognising the declaration in reference to privateering made at the period of the adoption of the Treaty of Paris in 1856. He wished, therefore, to ask the noble Lord, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any intimation to that effect from the Government of the United States; and, if so, whether he can state what effect it will have on the policy which Her Majesty's Government have announced with regard to the belligerent rights of the Southern States?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, the only answer which I can give to the right hon. Gentleman is that propositions have been sent to America founded upon the Declaration of the Treaty of Paris. Those propositions were made in concert with the French Government, and are restricted in concert with that Government. We have not as yet received any answer to those propositions. They have been gone, I should think, a fortnight, and I expect soon to receive some reply to them. Until that answer is received I cannot pledge the Government as to the course which they will pursue.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask the noble Lord whether the course now proposed to be adopted of prohibiting the vessels of war and privateers of both parties from bringing prizes into the ports of the United Kingdom was not different from that which had in former times been pursued by this country?

Mr. HENLEY said, he wished to know whether the law of France, as stated by the noble Lord, applies to the vessels of States, or is confined to privateers?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I stated that that law is applicable to privateers only.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he asked what measures have been taken by the Government to inform British seamen who are at present at sea that it is their policy to observe a strict neutrality between the parties to this contest. Unless a notice was affixed to the mainmast of every British trader ["Order, order!"]

Mr. SPEAKER said, he must inform the hon. Baronet that he was not in order in entering into an argument.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: A Proclamation has been issued by Her Majesty, declaring her neutrality in this contest, and of that proclamation, which has appeared in the Gazette and in all the newspapers, the crews of vessels calling at ports would receive intelligence.

Mr. E. P. BOUVERIE: Will the noble Lord lay upon the Table a copy of the despatch from which he has read an extract?

AFFAIRS OF SYRIA.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Members of the International Commission appointed to settle the affairs of Syria have since their arrival at Constantinople agreed to the appointment of a Maronite Governor for the Lebanon, who should be independent of the provincial Government of Syria; and if so, whether Her Majesty's Commissioner has been a consenting party to that agreement?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, the representatives of the great Powers at Constantinople have had two meetings, the second with the assistance of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Porte, but they have not agreed to the arrangement which the hon. Baronet has mentioned. The whole matter has been discussed, but we have not yet heard that any proposition has been agreed to, and certainly Her Majesty's Ambassador is not empowered to consent, that there should be a Maronite Governor in the Lebanon. I hope that before the end of the week I shall be able to state at what decision the representatives have arrived.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the third reading of this Bill.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he was prepared to sanction every precaution which might be requisite to prevent evasions of the payment of income tax, and for that purpose he would be willing, if necessary, to give increased powers to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he felt it his duty to bring under the notice of the House the system of quarterly collections as a departure from the original method. Suddenly and unexpectedly in the course of last winter the tax collector demanded from persons in receipt of fluctuating and precarious incomes that the tax upon them should be paid quarterly instead of half-yearly, as heretofore. To the end of 1860 the entire taxation of the country had been collected half-yearly; all the national payments were made upon the same principle. Interest on permanent investments and even on the great debt of the State was only paid twice a year, and it was impossible for any Government or any Chancellor of the Exchequer to forestall the period when the tax upon this account could be levied. An amount of capital nearly equalling the National Debt was invested in various securities, such as railways, mines, and mortgages, which were locked up in the same way from quarterly payments of income tax; and it seemed a great hardship that those in receipt of precarious incomes, on whom the tax already fell heaviest, should be the very persons subjected to the additional pressure arising from a quarterly collection. They all admitted that the tax pressed with great weight upon a variety of interests, and one would have imagined that the Government would have done all in their power to equalize and make it more generally bearable, instead of which greater anomalies were created than were already created by the income tax. This new arrangement had fallen in the most oppressive manner upon agriculturists, who had been prevented by the continuance of bad weather from sending anything to market. The change operated harshly enough on landlords with estates in their own hands; but in the case of tenants, contrary to previous law and custom, they were obliged to pay the collector three months before they had any settlement with their landlords. The Chancellor of the Exchequer professed surprise at the view which he entertained, and contended that if carried out it would deprive the country of an entire quarter's revenue during the year. Considering, however, that the tax on a very large portion of investment would still be paid in the old way, the right hon. Gentleman had hardly stated the case with accuracy. But, however that might be, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he entertained no such intention; but he must say, in turn, that he had been greatly surprised at the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said he had information which satisfied him that these quarterly payments were not only agreeable but convenient to many persons. That statement had filled him with astonishment, and led him to think that Chancellors of the Exchequer must, like other brilliant luminaries, be surrounded by some nubilous atmosphere which did not allow the truth to penetrate into their sphere. It would only be necessary for the right hon. Gentleman to travel with him to the first market town to learn that the new arrangement had increased the dislike to the tax, and had very much diminished the public faith in his clever financial arrangements as well as damaged the popularity of his Government. Therefore, both on the grounds of justice and expediency, he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the Government of which he was a Member, not to persist in this mode of collecting the tax.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, the question had been repeatedly asked why hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House continued so pertinaciously to oppose the remission of an Excise duty? No doubt it seemed an ungracious act to oppose the remission of duties which pressed upon any portion of the community but the reason was obvious. Many hon. Members occupying seats on those benches believed that the estimated surplus of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was calculated on insufficient grounds to justify the expectation that it could be applied to any satisfactory purpose; while it was avowed by hon. Gentlemen opposite that they supported the measure rather as one that was necessary than as a wise financial change. In the interests of the country he protested against the doctrine laid down by his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, that because the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared that he had a surplus, Members were bound to assume its existence, even though such a declaration was contrary to the evidence of their own senses. He felt it his duty, as the Bill was about to pass, to state his belief that even if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a surplus, that surplus had been already disposed of. The right hon. Gentleman said that £408,000 was his estimated surplus; but a few evenings since he admitted that there had come in a charge of £150,000 which would have to be paid as compensation for the Stade Dues. There had lately been published a despatch from the Governor General of India, in which there was a financial letter, dated Fort William, March 3, 1861. In that letter it was stated that the amount of the advances which would be recoverable from England in the years 1861-2, on account of expeditions to China and other charges, was £1,250,000. For that item the right hon. Gentleman had only taken £1,000,000. The additional sum of £250,000, with the £150,000, made £400,000; in addition to which there was £25,000 which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted to be the increased sum which would have to be paid on Exchequer bills. There was also an addition of £30,000, the amount of the dower of the Princess Alice, which two sums would make £55,000, and, therefore, they had a total of additional charges amounting to £455,000; that was to say, about £50,000 more than the estimated surplus. Again, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had estimated the year's Customs and Excise at the same amount as that of last, without taking into account the disturbing causes in the United States of America. A circumstance had been related to him which showed what was likely to take place in that country. A large ship arrived in Cork the other day with a cargo of cotton; she was bound to Liverpool, but when she called at Cork she received orders immediately to return to New York. It was perfectly clear from that circumstance that the people of New York anticipated they would receive a short supply of cotton from the Southern States. Indeed, it was natural to suppose that the Northern States would have little chance of receiving any cotton from the Southern; and, on the other hand, the Northern had taken good care that we should receive none, for they had declared through their Minister their intention to enforce a strict blockade of the Southern ports. It might be said that we had got our supply of cotton for the present year—that was to say that we had the cotton of last year's growth; but the cotton of this year should commence to arrive in this country in the months of October and November next. He had an opportunity lately of speaking on the subject to one of the greatest cotton buyers in the United Kingdom—a very intelligent gentleman. That gentleman had stopped him in the lobby and informed him that the manufacturers in the north were in the greatest possible state of alarm, for they firmly believed that the blockade of the Southern States would be carried out, and that the consequence would be that we should have no cotton during the coming year. He further observed that, instead of it being a question of 20,000 people starving, as in Coventry last year, it would be a question of 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 people starving in the manufacturing districts. He stated to the gentleman that possibly he might be representing an exaggerated state of things, for he thought it possible that we could obtain a large quantity from India; but he informed him that that was not the case—that the staple of the Indian cotton would not suit the manufacturing districts, except to a very limited extent; that there was more of it in the market last year than the manufacturers could use; and that, unless they could get the people of India to grow long-staple cotton, their produce could not be used in the manufacturing districts. He asked the gentleman what steps the manufacturers had taken to get long staple cotton grown in India. He replied that at the commencement of this year, anticipating what would happen, the buyers held a large meeting, formed societies, and subscribed their money to send out agents with American cotton seed to India, in order to distribute it to the natives, and, if necessary, to advance them money for its cultivation. The whole of that scheme had been knocked on the head by the conduct of the Indian Government. Hon. Members had heard something of the conduct of that Government with reference to the indigo planters. The speculation of these planters was carried on in the way in which it was proposed to carry out the scheme to which he had just referred. The planters advanced their capital to the cultivators, and entered into contracts to be supplied with their produce; but it appeared that the Indian Government either fancied or believed that the people were screwed too much by these planters. However that might have been, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal issued a Proclamation declaring that the people were not bound by the contracts. The result was that those who had engaged in the speculation had nothing but ruin staring them in the face, and the gentleman to whom he referred informed him that when that news arrived in the manufacturing districts those who had interested themselves in the cotton scheme put an end to it, and resolved that so long as the present Government of India remained in power they would neither send agents nor cotton seed to that country. There was, therefore, the prospect before us of getting no cotton from India, and the probability was that we should get none from the United States; so that the right hon. Gentleman drew rather largely on the credulity of the House when he asked them to believe that we should have the same amount from Customs and Excise this year as we had last. He had been accused by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade of inconsistency on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman stated that on a former occasion he voted for an abstract Resolution for a remission of the paper duty. His answer to that charge was very simple. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the remission of a duty was not always a question of principle. It was sometimes a question of expediency, and the course which any one ought to pursue in reference to such matters was that which he believed would be most conducive to the interests of the country. He did not think he would have discharged his duty if he had not said those few words on the third reading of this Bill.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adhere to the system of quarterly collections of the property and income tax. It might suit the richer class of the community to pay the tax half-yearly, but it was much more convenient for the poorer class of payers to do so quarterly. Parochial assessments were generally paid quarterly from a similar reason. It was not every taxpayer who kept a banker's account. There was great irregularity, however, in the mode of collecting the income tax. In some parts of the country, and with respect to particular classes of persons, the half-yearly mode of collection was followed, but he could not see why any such distinction should exist.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not follow the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. H. Baillie), into anything like a full discussion of the surplus, at which he seemed determined to have what might be called a parting kick. The prophecies of Ministers of Finance were, no doubt, like those of other persons, liable to fail; but there was this difference between his prophecies and those of private persons, that he usually followed the advice of very competent persons, and that when he did make an erroneous estimate of coming income and expenditure he was very properly called upon to explain, and had to submit to all manner of criticism; whereas, when private Members made erroneous calculations and prophecies, it was not within the province of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to call them to account; and no notice was ever taken of the wonderful miscalculations they might have made. For example, in 1853 he, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, prophesied that £2,000,000 would be derived from the succession duty; and when his prophecy failed he was subjected to very severe criticism, while those private Members who said that as much as £3,000,000, £4,000,000, or £5,000,000 would be derived from the tax, and who had remonstrated with him for not fixing his estimate higher than £2,000,000, were left unnoticed, and allowed to remain under the shelter of a comfortable security. His hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire said, new charges to the amount of £455,000 had come up since the Budget had been presented. His hon. Friend was far from accurate in that statement. He had referred to a letter written by the Governor General of India with reference to a claim from India; but the Governor General when he sent that letter did not know enough of the state of the account to be able to tell what demands would be made upon Imperial resources to reimburse the Indian Exchequer for payments it had made, and for this reason, that he did not know what payments he had made on account. If it was true, as stated by his hon. Friend, that new charges to the amount of £455,000 had come up since the Budget was presented, how glad ought he to have been that the Motion on the tea duties, by which £285,000 more than the estimated surplus would be taken from the revenue. His hon. Friend said he had been charged with inconsistency in not giving the same vote for the abolition of the paper duties as he had given some years ago. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would not charge his hon. Friend with inconsistency as to the paper duties; but he charged him with another inconsistency, that of questioning the surplus, and yet of voting that £285,000 more than the surplus should be taken from the revenue, when there was an occasion of voting against the Government. But even if it were true, which he did not admit, that £455,000 of new charges had arisen, a still larger sum than that had already been derived from increased revenue. There had been an actual increase in the revenue under the heads of Excise, Customs, and Stamps during the first eight weeks of the present year, as compared with the first eight weeks of last year, of £500,000.

With regard to the collection of the income tax, his right hon. Friend (Sir William Jolliffe) was in error on two points. He was in error when he said that the quarterly mode of collection was a mere administrative arrangement. The arrangement was one distinctly made by law. The principle of income tax collection had always been quarterly, but practically it had been carried out till the Act of 23 & 24 Vict, c. 14, was passed. His hon. Friend was also in error when he made a comparison between the modes of collecting fixed and precarious incomes. There was no difference in the modes of collecting fixed and precarious incomes, except such as unavoidably arose from the different ways in which the income of individuals was derived. There was a peculiarity in the quarterly collection of last year that would not occur again; for, being the first of these collections, the effect was to throw three months more of payment within the year than ought to have been, and virtually to make the drain from the taxpayer nearly as much money as if an income tax of 14d. had been imposed. The quarterly mode of collection was attended with political advantage. The income tax was defective in this respect—that its collection was long in arrear of its imposition by Parliament. In 1842 Sir Robert Peel found a deficiency. He proposed an income tax, and the calculation was that next year he would have a surplus. But at the end of the year he had still a deficiency, no account having been taken of the circumstance that the collection of the income tax would be half a year behind. In 1854, at the time of the Russian war, they doubled the income tax; but, in consequence of the half-yearly system of collection, they were obliged to anticipate the tax by borrowing. The political advantage of the quarterly mode would, therefore, be very great, for it would increase the control of Parliament over revenue, and would put the tax in hand, not at the end of six, but of three months. He had never stated that that mode of collection had been found convenient to the taxpayer, but that when it was recommended to him by the practical officers who had charge of this department they expressed their opinion that it would be found more convenient to the taxpayer, and he had received no evidence whatever to shake that opinion. He did not, however, pretend to be in possession of conclusive information on the subject. It was a question most proper for examination by the House or by the Committee now sitting on the subject of the income tax, for he quite admitted that the convenience of the taxpayer must be a material element in deciding upon a half-yearly or a quarterly collection. For his own part he confessed that, along with his hon. Friend (Alderman Sydney), he thought that with respect to those classes of persons who had not a banker's account, it would be more convenient for them to pay by small dribblets than to be expected to accumulate larger sums in order to meet those demands. As to the inequality which was said to exist in different parts of the country in the payment of the income tax, he would remind the House that the responsibility of the Government for the collection of the tax was a very qualified one. He wished the Government had a more effective control over the collection. He did not desire to uproot the admirable system, peculiar, he believed, to this country, by which the collection of the direct taxes was mainly conducted by the valuable aid of local commissioners. But a system by which both the assessment and the collection of the tax was left in the hands of local officers might, he thought, in some important particulars be amended, one of its consequences being, as had been pointed out, that there was great inequality in the efficiency of the machinery in various parts of the country. Any proposals which were made on this subject might be viewed with jealousy in the country, and must be made in conformity with the sense of the country. At the same time he thought there was room for important improvements in the system, and he should be glad to see a state of opinion which would allow the Government to propose these improvements to Parliament.

MR. BENTINCK said, the right hon. Gentleman had a summary manner of disposing of the objections of hon. Members, by telling them that he had superior means of information over those who thought differently from him. His right hon. Friend (Sir William Jolliffe) near him said he looked upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a planet surrounded by a nebulous atmosphere, and it seemed to him (Mr. Bentinck) that the satellites upon whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer depended for his information were also surrounded by an equally nebulous atmosphere. At any rate, he (Mr. Bentinck) was not disposed to place the same confidence in them as the right hon. Gentleman did. Upon that occasion the right hon. Gentleman had, he thought, exercised a wise discretion in not attempting to answer the remarks of his hon. Friend as to the surplus; because it was perfectly impossible to controvert the short and clear statement his hon. Friend had made. He wished to take up one point referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, who had a habit of putting his own construction on the views and language of others, and commenting on that construction. The right hon. Gentleman accused him and some of his Friends of inconsistency in disputing the existence of a surplus, and then voting for a large remission of taxation. Now, that was not a fair statement of the case. He still, as formerly, denied the existence of any surplus; but he had said that if the House resolved to maintain that there was a surplus, they ought at least to repeal a tax which might be reimposed, and not one which when repealed was lost by the revenue for ever. He denied that there was any inconsistency in that view of the case. His hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) had referred to the probable diminution in the revenue upon Customs and Excise, in consequence of the present state of things in America. He (Mr. Bentinck) had twice called attention to the same subject, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government had anticipated that he was going to renew the question fortnightly. He would not say how often he might feel it his duty to renew the question, but he feared the arrival of the time when the noble Lord would not be able to answer that question as he had done on the two previous occasions. He had heard accounts similar to those received by his hon. Friend, and, in his opinion, the supply of cotton must be inevitably very short; it was impossible to find a supply from any other quarter of the globe than the United States, and the result would be a diminution in the revenue derived from the Customs and Excise. He believed the time would come when the Government would stand convicted of great imprudence in blinding themselves to these considerations, and that the noble Lord would be compelled to admit that which he now so steadily denied.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he only wished to remark it was an axiom in taxation to avoid making the duties on commerce a fluctuating charge, and, therefore, he disputed the expediency of reducing the tea duties in the belief which the hon. Member seemed to entertain that those duties might be increased again immediately afterwards without injury.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the argument just used by the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) formed one of the strongest points in the case of the Opposition, who, instead of renewing the tea duties from year to year, thus keeping the tea trade in a state of suspense as to whether the war duties would be repealed, wished at once to terminate that uncertainty. Like the hon. Member (Mr. Bentinck), he also would complain of the injustice of the taunt thrown out from the Treasury bench against the Opposition, who were said, after disputing the existence of any surplus, to have, nevertheless, supported a proposal for taking £200,000 or £300,000 more out of the Exchequer. But the Opposition declared that the sacrifice of revenue upon the reduction of the tea duties would be not greater, but smaller, than that entailed by the repeal of the paper duties. Their calculations had been disputed, but that was the ground on which they voted, and they were not, therefore, amenable to the charge of inconsistency when they supported a smaller remission of taxation than that proposed by the Government. The point was not to be looked at with reference to this year only, but in regard to future years. The total annual sacrifice by the repeal of the paper duty would be £1,300,000; by the reduction of the tea duty to 1s. 5d. per lb. the sacrifice would be £1,600,000 at the most; but there would certainly be a recovery of one-fourth, which would bring it down to £1,200,000. Hon. Genlemen on that side of the House made allowance for the fact that the deficiency caused by the reduction of the tea duty would be gradual, and would cure itself, not in consequence of the tax being put on again, but of a gradual increase of consumption; and, on the other hand, they looked on the loss to be incurred by the repeal of the paper duty as an increasing loss, inasmuch as the duty at the time of its repeal was increasing and improving. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said their calculations were inaccurate, but he never gave them credit for the increase which would follow in the consumption of sugar, which would be considerable. He denied, therefore, that there was any inconsistency in denying a surplus and supporting a reduction of the tea duties.

MR. BROWN WESTHEAD said, that his constituents had been anxious for the repeal of the paper duty. As soon as they heard that it was the intention of the hon. Member for Liverpool to move for the reduction of the tea duties in lieu of the repeal of the paper duties, they immediately set about getting up a petition in favour of the repeal of the duty on paper, and within twenty-four hours that petition was signed by upwards of 700 of the citizens of York. He was neither a paper manufacturer nor a newspaper proprietor, but he paid a large amount for paper duty, which from his own experience he could say pressed heavily upon the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country. The mercantile firm with which he was connected paid an amount for duty on paper equal to an income tax of 9d. in the pound upon an income of £15,800 per annum. He had obtained from his partners a statement of the amount of duty paid by them on paper. It appeared they paid for paper in one year £2,416, and for duty in one year £595 17s. 6d. He thought he might fairly ask why they should be made to pay so extravagant an amount towards the taxation of the country? In respect of this tax alone, he would venture to say that he paid a larger amount of duty to the revenue than was paid on the average by Members of that House in respect of the income tax. It was said that the cry against the paper duty was kept up by noisy agitators, but that could not apply to him, as this was the first occasion publicly upon which he had opened his lips on the subject. The repeal of the paper duty would have a most beneficial effect upon the manufactures of the country and upon the industry of the working classes, and it would enable them to compete with the Germans, who were able to export their manufactures in which paper was used to the United States at a great advantage over the English manufacturers, who were burdened in some cases with duties of 25 per cent by reason of the paper duty. The Germans had no paper duty to pay, and the consequence was that they could send their goods to America, and drive the English manufacturers out of the market. This was only one instance. Many others might be given of the way in which the manufacturers of the country were suffering from the incidence of the paper duty. He believed that if the question had not been made one of politics, hon. Gentlemen opposite would have thought the paper duty one of the first taxes which ought to be repealed. Very much had been said about the desirability of repealing war taxes. On that ground the paper duty had a claim for immediate repeal, for it was originally a war tax. In 1711 the 10th of Queen Anne an Act was passed for the raising of large supplies for the purposes of war, and it imposed duties on soap, paper, silk, calicoes, linens, stuffs, and other articles. The duties on soap, silk, calicoes, linens, and stuffs had been repealed, and surely there was no inconsistency in asking the House to assent to the repeal of the paper duty.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished for a moment to refer to the denial which had been given by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) during the debate on Thursday evening to his statement that the price of Irish butter had fallen off since the reduction in the duty. Since the debate he had referred to the figures of the prices current, and he found that while on the 5th of March, 1860, the price of butter in Cork market was £6 10s. per cwt. for the first quality, and £5 15s. for the third quality; on the day before the hon. Member spoke it was £4 18s. first quality, and £4 3s. third quality, a falling off of 60 per cent. In a Cork paper he found it stated that the fall in price was principally owing to the fall in price of foreign and Irish butter in the London market.

MR. HENLEY said, he was glad to hear the answer which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Petersfield (Sir William Jolliffe) because, if he understood it aright, the right hon. Gentleman was disposed to watch closely the pressure of the particular mode of collecting taxes. No doubt it was difficult to form a judgment on the working of the plan in the first year, because it was a very severe pressure to have to pay five quarters' income tax in one year. He (Mr. Henley) had had many complaints respecting it. Whether those would continue when they came to the regular course of payment he did not know. With regard to taxes on land where rent was paid half-yearly, payment of the tax quarterly was a payment in advance for the tenant. However, the right hon. Gentleman spoke as if he were disposed to inquire into the matter, and if he found on the balance that there was more inconvenience than convenience he was disposed to consider the subject. He (Mr. Henley) had no intention of entering on the vexed question—tea or paper—more than saying that the hon. Member for York had opened a new page in the chapter of discussion upon taxes on knowledge, which it was a pity the House had not had an opportunity of profiting by before. He (Mr. Henley) thought it showed something of the nature of the original agitation on the subject.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he had no intention to make any imputation on the hon. Member for the King's County, who usually took great pains and afforded considerable information to the House. Perhaps he said too much when he said the price of butter had almost doubled, but there had been a considerable increase in price all through the south of Ireland. The hon. Member ought to have taken the average price since the reduction, instead of the exceptional price which prevailed in a particular year or at a particular time of the year. Every one knew that the price of butter at the opening of the market in March was very different from the price in May or June.

EAST INDIA LOAN.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR CHARLES WOOD: It is not my intention, Sir, on the present occasion to go at any length into the general question of Indian finance. It will be my duty to do so later in the Session, but at present we have not that information which it is indispensable to possess, in order to do so with advantage. The finance accounts for 1859-60 are on the table of the House, but they are not printed or in the hands of hon. Members. Those accounts differ certainly very considerably from the last Estimates sent home by the Government of India. Both the revenue and the expenditure are considerably higher than we were led to expect; but the despatches explanatory of the difference have not yet reached us, and, of course, in the absence of those documents, it would be impossible to go into the question of past expenditure. In like manner, although we know by telegram that Mr. Laing has made his financial statement for the year 1861-2, we are not in possession of that statement. Although we know, from private letters and from the telegram, that the statement is satisfactory, we do not know what it is, and it would be premature to attempt to enter into the details of future expenditure. One fact we know, that Mr. Laing has felt himself to be in a position to reduce the duties on yarn and twist from 10 to 5 per cent, and, therefore, that circumstances must have justified that reduction of duty. It is, however, necessary to make some statement on the financial prospects of India. I am anxious to make it as short and clear as I can. I have been accused of being at one time too gloomy and at other times too sanguine. I hope to be able to satisfy the Committee that I have spoken accurately as far as the information which I possessed at the time enabled me to be accurate. The Committee will see that the only sources of information which I can have are the despatches from India, and every hon. Member of the House can test my judgment, because they have now in their possession all the despatches in reference to the general finances of India received from or sent to India since the last Session of Parliament. The first of those papers is a despatch addressed to the Government of India in August last, and those who have paid attention to the subject will find in it the most complete view which we were able to form of Indian finance. I allude to it because I think the form adopted is the best for affording full information. The other despatches are those which have been received from or addressed to India up to February last. Those despatches will show the grounds upon which I made a statement early in the Session, which is supposed to have been more sanguine than I was justified in making. The actual deficit for the present year at the commencement was £5,500,000, and I anticipated that if no unforeseen circumstances occurred we might look forward to no deficit in the course of this year, and, therefore, no necessity for a loan. That statement was founded upon an anticipation of an increase of taxation to the extent of £2,500,000. The original estimate by the Indian Government of the whole increase was £3,500,000, of which £1,000,000 was realized; and it followed that if the estimate were correct there would be an additional £2,500,000 to be received in the course of the present year. I find on reference to these despatches that even at a later period, when the Government of India took a more gloomy view of their finances, they estimated the increase at £2,200,000. In March they anticipated it would be not much less than what I stated in the preceding February. That reduced the deficit to £3,000,000, and I anticipated a reduction of expenditure to the extent of £3,000,000. Every letter which I have received since assures me that the reduction will, at least, amount to that, and, therefore, the Committee will see that it was not without satisfactory grounds that I made the statement which is thought to have been too sanguine. An unforeseen circumstance of considerable importance, has, however, occurred since I made that statement. I refer to the famine in the North-West Provinces, which will necessarily cause some loss of revenue. The Lieutenant Governor of those Provinces expects that the deficiency will fall almost entirely upon the year 1861-2; and, of course, the expenditure for the relief of sufferers from the dearth will also fall, chiefly, upon the early part of this year. Should any deficiency occur it will, therefore, be owing to an event which I had no reason to anticipate when I made my statement to the House. In the despatches from India we find very different estimates of income and expenditure. In the first series of despatches the apprehension is expressed that increased taxation will be only sufficient to make up for the falling off in revenue, while in the subsequent series it is said that an increase of about £1,000,000 is to be anticipated in the revenue of 1861, but the ultimate result of both seems to point to a deficiency which will certainly be under £2,000,000. That, however, is the worst view which can possibly be presented. Even if there should be a deficiency, I do not think we shall have any reason to complain, considering the enormous expenditure on account of the mutiny which has just been wound up. We have never ceased to urge upon the Government in India a reduction of that great source of expenditure—the Native army of India. A large body of armed men cannot, however, be suddenly disbanded without causing great dissatisfaction; and an immediate reduction would, therefore, be exceedingly dangerous. The Native troops must be quietly and gradually absorbed into the population. I have received information from Mr. Laing which shows that the Government of India is entering on a new career. Mr. Laing states that the balance in the Indian Treasury, which he had estimated at £11,500,000, will, in all probability, amount to £12,500,000 on the 30th of April. The inference, therefore, is either that the expenditure must have been diminished or that the revenue has increased considerably. Mr. Laing hopes that by the 1st of January, at the latest, he will be able to bring the income and expenditure to an equilibrium. A telegram which is published in to-day's papers reports Mr. Laing's satisfactory announcement that he anticipates no deficiency at all on the present year.

Apart, however, from the necessity of providing against a possible deficiency, the loan is required on various grounds. Whatever may be the condition of the Indian finances towards the close of the year, it is quite certain that there will be a pressure for money in the early part of the year. As I have stated, the diminution of revenue and the heavy expenditure on account of the famine will fall on the summer months. And further, it is usual for a reduction to the amount of about £3,000,000 to take place in the balances in the Indian Exchequer during the first six months of the year, which is recovered during the six months following. Looking to the pressure which must arise from providing relief for the sufferers by the famine, and carrying on the railways and other works which we had ordered not to be stopped, I felt it to be my duty to purchase £1,000,000 of silver in this country, part of which has already been sent to India. Even if I could draw money from India at the close of the financial year, on the 30th of April, I should be sorry to do so, on account of the great public works which we are carrying on. At any rate, it is impossible for me to draw any money from India now, and yet money must be provided for the payments I shall be called on to make in this country in the early part of the year. The resources to which I look for that money are the payments from the railway companies, or, in default of these, a loan. As hon. Members are, no doubt aware, the expenditure for railways in India is paid by advances from the India Treasury, while the expenses of the Home Government are defrayed from the sums paid by the railway companies into the Treasury in England. Indian finance is so much mixed up with payments on account of railroads, that in a general statement it is almost impossible to disentangle them. In the early days of the railway companies they paid in large sums to the Home Treasury, and the expenditure on account of them was comparatively small. The consequence was, that there were considerable balances of railway money in the Treasury in England. We have always held it desirable to have about three months expenditure in hand at the end of the year. Up to the present year, indeed, we have generally been in possession of more than that amount. All, however, who are versed in railway matters, know that towards the conclusion of such undertakings there is generally some difficulty in raising funds. That has been the case in regard to these Indian lines. In the beginning of the year 1860-1 we expected that about £7,000,000 would be paid into the Home Treasury on account of the Indian railways. The anticipated expenditure amounted to £7,000,000, or rather more. In point of fact, the expenditure in India has been upwards of £8,000,000, and the payments into the Home Treasury less than £6,000,000. During the last few years the balances of railroad money in the hands of the Home Government at the end of the financial year have been as follows:—1856, £3,265,000; 1857, £3,136,000; 1858, £2,750,000; 1859, £3,846,000; 1860, £2,220,000; and this year, according to a statement which is partly estimate, it is only £370,000. Therefore the House will see that I have not an overwhelming amount of money from which to meet any demands upon the Home Treasury. Further than that, the state of the money market at home, and especially the raising the rate of discount by the Bank of England a day or two before the payments were to be made, have prevented my receiving the sums which I anticipated from the railway companies. It will be remembered also that—as I have already stated—I sent £1,000,000 to India, to enable the Government there to meet the demands likely to be made upon them in the early part of the year, and that has further diminished the means at my command to meet the demands upon the Home Treasury. Under these circumstances I have no alternative but to appeal to this House for power to raise money; and the only question really is, what sum I should borrow. Hon. Gentlemen will see from the despatches that the estimated expenditure in England on Indian account,—i.e., for the interest of debt, payments for stores chargeable to Indian account, and the service funds—will amount to £9,500,000. There is also to be paid on account of railroads about £1,800,000; making together, to be provided for payments in this country in the course of the year, £11,300,000. The mode in which that amount will be provided is as follows:—The probable expenditure on account of the railroads in India during the year will be at least £7,500,000, and, as some little balance must be provided, I may state the expenditure in the course of the year 1861-2 at £8,000,000. Of that sum about £530,000 has been raised, and there are available calls upon shares to the extent of £1,300,000, so that £1,830,000 may be considered as more or less provided for, and the balance of rather more than £6,000,000 is what must be raised by the railroad companies in the London money-market between now and April next. Speaking in round numbers, £6,000,000 will be required for expenditure in India, and £2,000,000 in this country. The amount required to be expended in India is the measure of the sum available for the Home Treasury, because, come what will, the Indian Treasuries will provide this £6,000,000 for the railway expenditure in that country. Deducting that, therefore, from the £9,500,000, which is the amount due from the Home Treasury for various purposes, there remains to be raised £3,500,000. I may probably in the course of the year obtain the repayment of the advances made in India on account of the China expenditure, which are estimated at about £1,000,000; but at the same time I cannot be quite sure that the railway companies will provide all the money which they ought during the year, and, therefore, I propose to borrow a sum of £4,000,000. What it may hereafter be necessary for me to do I am not at present in a position to state. If the railway companies raise in the course of the year a sum sufficient to meet the expenditure in India it will not be necessary for me to borrow a shilling more. If, on the other hand, they cannot pay in the amount required to meet the expenditure on railway account in England and India, I may have, as I did last year, to ask Parliament for power to raise money for railway purposes. This is a subject of such vast importance, and it is in my opinion so desirable that the country should know what is the full extent of the demand which may be made upon it, that I will with the permission of the Committee state the general position of railroad finance in India.

Previous to the breaking out of the mutiny several large and extensive railways were sanctioned. Without going into details, I may state that according to the Indian estimate the amount required to construct railways already sanctioned is £56,000,000; according to the English estimate it is £54,600,000; but, judging from past experience, I am disposed to think that the Indian estimate is the more correct of the two. There has been guaranteed up to the present moment £36,556,000; there has been paid up £32,190,000; and, according to the last account from India, which is not of very recent date, there had been expended £30,802,000. It follows that there will have to be raised before the railways are completed a sum of about £25,000,000 more. I have no doubt that, had things gone on as prosperously as they were before the mutiny, there might have been no difficulty in raising the money; but, on the one hand, the expenditure arising from the mutiny has rendered it necessary to borrow from £40,000,000 to £50,000,000, which have made Indian securities more plentiful than is advantageous in the money market; and, on the other, the present state of that market, owing to the uncertainty which exists as to what may happen in Europe, keeps interest at a rate which is not favourable to borrowing money on a large scale. There is not much use in discussing that subject now. Government is pledged to this extent; that sooner or later these undertakings are to be carried out, and the only question is, what practical steps it is necessary to take at the present juncture? I have no hesitation in saying that it is our interest to finish those railroads which are now in hand as quickly as possible. The shareholders receive 5 per cent whether the works are finished or not, and altogether irrespective of the existence of any receipts from traffic. A strong opinion exists in India with regard to the management of railroads, but it is not necessary that I should go into that question now. As far as pecuniary interests go, it is the Government rather than the shareholders who are concerned in the early completion of these lines, because until they are completed no returns can be expected from traffic, and it is to that source that the Government look for a diminution of the heavy payments of interest they have guaranteed. The Government of India feel that so strongly that they are willing to recommend what, otherwise, would be a most objectionable proceeding—the raising of money in India, to be expended with this object. I believe it would be far better on all accounts that the money should be raised here. At present we are paying no less than £2,000,000 per annum for guaranteed interest; that amount is of course increasing every day, and we cannot hope to put an end to this growing charge till the railroads are actually completed and at work, when we may be able, to some extent, to recoup ourselves. Those which we have determined on pushing forward with the utmost despatch consistent with the proper execution of the work are lines which in the present crisis in America must be looked to with the greatest interest. One pierces the cotton district, and the other skirts its very edge. The only delay which will arise will be occasioned by the natural obstacles that present themselves. There are other railroads on which no capital has yet been paid up, and on which, therefore, we do not pay interest; we propose that the commencement of these shall be postponed. I by no means say that their completion will not ultimately be of importance, for they will fill up gaps in the communication, but, generally speaking, they pass through rather a desolate country, and, therefore, they are not so pressing. The demand, then, for this year will be £8,000,000, and the indispensable requirements for the next two years will be £6,000,000 or £7,000,000. In all, allowing for contingencies, £24,000,000 or £25,000,000 will be required for the completion of the lines of Indian railway which have been laid out, and which are requisite for the development of the resources of the country. Some gentlemen did me the honour of calling on me, and of representing that large sums ought to be raised for the prosecution of public works in India. I apprehend they were hardly aware that, directly or indirectly, the Indian Government is responsible for the large amount to which I have referred. And I must say that I do not believe we could apply money to any purpose so profitably as to the completion of those railways. Other undertakings may be more immediately remunerative; but we are pledged to the railways, and by completing them we shall be relieving ourselves from annual payments in respect of guaranteed interest, the amount of which may then be applied in reduction of duties justly complained of as oppressive, or in the advancement of other public works, the advantageous character of which may be hereafter urged upon the Government. Another question to be considered is whether, in the present state of the money-market, we should be justified in asking for a larger sum between the Government and the railway companies than £12,000,000, the interest of which, if we obtain it, the Committee will bear in mind is £600,000. I am told, indeed, by some of my friends that the more I ask the more I am likely to get; but I do not think the experience of last year justifies such an expectation, and the City authorities whom I have consulted do not lead me to entertain that opinion. I believe the wise course is to ask for that which will meet the present emergency, and see what its result will be, and then in more favourable times to renew our demand upon the money market. I am aware that the object which these gentlemen have in view is the vitally important one of developing the resources of India. But that is a question to which I have not at any time been blind. When I first became President of the Board of Control, railways in India were in their infancy, and it was suggested that the main lines should be treated simply as experimental lines. After having put myself in communication with my lamented friend the Marquess of Dalhousie I determined that they should be completed as soon as possible. The opening of the Godavery was also a project of which I early saw the importance, and I ordered a survey of it, believing that it was capable of being made a great high road of traffic to the interior. But all the plans for the improvement of India were most lamentably interfered with by the Sepoy mutiny, and it is not likely that so great a storm could have passed over, or have calmed down, without leaving traces of its mischievous effects, and one of those is the interruption of public works. Happily the accounts which we receive of late show that its injurious results have nearly expired, and in the course of this year, or at any rate at the beginning of next, I hope the Indian authorities may turn their undivided attention to peaceful pursuits, and to the amelioration of the internal state of India. I am fully aware of the importance of the subject of the production of cotton in India, and it is one in which I have always taken a deep interest. I have been in communication with many gentlemen who have a commercial interest in it, and all I can say is that they shall receive the support and heartiest co-operation of the Government. I think that they are now taking a correct view of the subject, and nothing that the Government can do in this respect shall be wanted. I have already stated that we have urged the completion, as rapidly as possible, of those works which, by improving the carriage down, will bring the producing country into convenient connection with one of the best harbours on the west coast. With respect to the Godavery, I think, myself, that it is better in the hands of the Government, and that is the opinion of Sir William Denison, a most experienced engineer officer. The House may rest assured of this—that no unnecessary delay shall take place; but that the Government will do all in their power to accomplish the opening of that river. I am not very likely to overlook what I may call a pet project of my own. The loan which I am about to ask power to raise is required for home expenditure. I should be very glad to leave as much money as possible in India for the purposes of public works, for I believe it can be applied with more advantage there; but whether there be a deficiency or a surplus in India, it is equally necessary that I should be supplied with means of meeting the demands for the home expenditure on account of the Government of that country. It is, therefore, that I propose a Resolution as a preliminary to a Bill to empower me to raise a sum of money. The sum I propose to ask for, and which I shall put in the Bill founded on this Resolution, is £4,000,000. The right hon. Baronet concluded by proposing—

MR. BAZLEY said, he proposed to make a few remarks on that portion of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman which affected the commerce of India. The northern part of the United Kingdom might probably soon be embarrassed by the want of raw material, but independent of that no new-born zeal induced him to claim justice for India, and the development of the vast resources of that dependency. The resources of India were daily becoming more apparent, but, as an agent for their full development, the establishment of public works was indispensable. He considered that the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had made, considering the difficulties which surrounded him, was eminently satisfactory. As the first agent of progress the means of communication were required. At present they were so lamentably deficient, that they had neither the means of taking their manufactures to the interior of the country, nor of bringing the productions of the country to the seaboard for transmission to this country. Indeed, so difficult was the access, that the funds which had been charitably subscribed to relieve the famine in the North-West Provinces were mostly expended in the transit, so that if a gentleman subscribed £50 to the fund, £40 of it would be expended in carriage. A gentleman writing from India said, had there been cheap and easy communication the famine now raging would not have existed. Again, for the cotton coming to the London markets the ryots received only 2d. per lb., while the price here was 6½d. What would our agriculturists say if the carriage of their produce was 200 per cent on the value in this country? As between the price of cotton in America and the sum which it cost here there was only the difference between 7d. and 8d. or 12½ per cent. He believed that under a proper system cotton could be had from India at as low a rate of carriage as from the United States; but railways of themselves would not afford the best means of carriage. The canals and rivers were the natural channels of communication for heavy traffic, and he hoped canals would be established both as means of communication and for purposes of irrigation. He wished he could induce the Minister of India to come forward and ask for such a sum as would give them roads and canals within a short space of time. There was another subject of much importance. He alluded to the land tenure in India. He hoped the system would be improved so that property could be passed from hand to hand as it was in this country. Though on the railways the cost of carriage would still be relatively high, still, on present rates, it would be a great reduction. He hoped, however, that the railways would not charge more than one-third of a penny per mile on cotton making its way to the seaboard. One-eighth or one-tenth was the rate charged on the Mississippi. His personal knowledge of the subject induced him to say that, with improved cultivation, India could produce cotton as good as the American, but from the agricultural Returns he perceived that 12s. an acre was the whole pecuniary produce in India, while in America it was £12 per acre. He regretted that greater exertion was not made to induce a larger production of cotton in India. Last year our consumption of the raw material was 2,500,000 bales of cotton obtained from all sources. Of that quantity 85 per cent came from the United States, 8 per cent from Egypt, Brazil, and other foreign sources, and only 7 per cent from the East and West Indies. The disproportion between our colonial and our foreign supply would appear still greater, when they took into consideration the question of value. He calculated that last year we paid America £26,000,000, and Egypt and Brazil £2,500,000, while we only paid £1,500,000 for the cotton which we received from our own possessions. The Indian mutiny had unfortunately led the Government to take a step which he deeply deplored. Before that event the import duty upon British goods was 5, but afterwards it was raised to 10 per cent. The result had been to encourage the establishment of rival manufactories in India to an immense extent. Within the last few days a gentleman had told him that there were at present eight new and extensive spinning and weaving concerns in Bombay, and that there were already 4,000 power looms at work. All that had been done in the face of immense disadvantages. For instance, machinery which in Lancashire or Lanarkshire would cost £100,000, would cost £300,000 in India; and coal, which could be had in England for 10s. per ton, sold in Bombay for £3. There was, however, an immense saving of wages, for while a very moderate concern in Lancashire would expend £400 a week under that head, the cost in India would only be £100. That saving of £300 a week in wages could not but hold out a very great inducement to speculators to establish mills in India. It was, however, only just to the Indian Government to say that they had reduced the duty on cotton yarns 5 per cent; but he trusted that before long there would be no duty at all on goods imported from England. Our exports to India during the last year had amounted to £18,000,000, while our imports from it were only worth £15,000,000, showing thus a large misdirection of energy and capital. If, instead of that excess of three millions in their imports, the capital in India had been applied to the development of the natural resources of the country, an immense advantage would have accrued both to the natives and to us. They had great and varied resources, which a wise Government would labour to develop instead of encouraging the formation of resources which were merely artificial. He was sorry to say that our exports were diminishing, a fact that must produce a depressing effect upon our manufactures. Since the commencement of the year they had, in fact, fallen off to the extent of 20 per cent as compared with the same period of last year; and that fact, coming at a time when a large expenditure had been incurred in the erection of new mills, was very disappointing. The history of the American cotton trade afforded strong grounds of hope for India. It was only seventy-five years ago that America entered upon the growth of cotton, and it did not succeed without great outlay and exertion. The labour was not aboriginal, and the plant was not indigenous, nevertheless, the cotton trade of America had become one of the wonders of the world. The value of the cotton of America was £45,000,000 per annum; and a similar triumph was in store for India if similar means were taken to develop its resources. America had largely benefited from her intercourse with this country during the last two years. Last year we imported from her £20,000,000 worth of corn, and £26,000,000 worth of cotton, making a total of £46,000,000; whereas our exports to her had been only £24,000,000. This year those exports, he was sorry to say, were rapidly diminishing. In cotton goods alone we had sent out 25 per cent less in the first four months of 1861 than we did in 1860. The total exports of the United Kingdom last year amounted to £136,000,000, of which the cotton trade alone furnished £52,000,000—a fact alone sufficient to show the vast magnitude of that industry, and the necessity there was for providing a requisite supply of the raw material. He viewed with some alarm the present aspect of affairs, though not perhaps to the same extent as the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Baillie), for he still hoped that means might be found to arrive at an amicable settlement, in which case we might not suffer any serious inconvenience, while at the same time we should have learned the lesson not to extend our commercial operations too rapidly, and not to vaunt too highly our great prosperity. During the first quarter of this year we received  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent less of cotton than we had during the first quarter of last year. There had been lately, however, an increase in the number of mills, and our increased power of production could not be less than 10 per cent, so that embarrassment and confusion would be the result. Up to the present time we had received a less supply of cotton by 15 per cent than we did during the same time last year. Therefore, our condition seemed to be one of increasing difficulty and embarrassment, and called for greater exertions on our part to obtain somewhere new supplies of cotton. He hoped the Indian Government would look seriously to this matter, and encourage to the utmost the cultivation of cotton in India, whence abundant supplies might be had. He trusted that some one would inquire of the Indian Minister whether the beneficent proclamation of Her Majesty had been carried out, and whether the admirable Minute of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), touching the sale of waste lands, had been acted upon? He feared that the answer in neither case would be in the affirmative. If, however, the acts of the home Government and of the Government in India were not in harmony, they could not expect satisfactory results. It was quite true that there were other places from which we might expect supplies of cotton. Many of our colonies were admirably adapted to its growth; in fact, we had more cotton-growing territory than any other Power in the world, and yet we only received 7 per cent of our supply from British territory. We had the West India Islands, which were lying comparatively idle. We had also a vast and magnificent territory in Australia—namely, Queensland, which was under the care of a most enlightened, able, and energetic Governor, Sir George Bowen. He (Mr. Bazley) could state, from his personal knowledge, that no cotton that was ever grown was comparable in point of quality to the cotton of Queensland, and we might have any quantity of it. For his own part, he had always been of opinion that it would be unwise for a great manufacturing country like England to depend upon any one particular locality for her supply of cotton, even though that locality might be within her own territories. The greater the number of our sources of supply the greater in that respect our security, and he must do his friends in Manchester the justice to say that they had made no slight exertions with the view of increasing the quality of cotton to be obtained from new fields. Six thousand bags of cotton, indeed, he believed, had reached this country last year from twenty-four new fields, and of that quantity a very considerable portion, equal to the average New Orleans cotton, he was glad to find, came from Western Africa. He had, in conclusion, simply to express a hope that our attention would be turned to the cultivation of the land which lay ready to our hands in India, and if we did so the object which we sought to attain would, he felt assured, be achieved at no distant day.

LORD STANLEY said, he only rose for the purpose of making one or two remarks on the question which had just been brought under their notice. It was obviously impossible to criticise at once the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. It was never wise to attempt to enter into a minute examination of any financial scheme until time had been given for its consideration, and in the present case it was clearly impossible for the House to discuss the general state of our Indian finances, because they could not regard a telegraphic summary of the statement of the Finance Minister in India as that statement itself; and although his right hon. Friend had given them all the information he possessed himself upon that subject, everybody who possessed any acquaintance with India was aware how uncertain were all financial estimates and anticipations in that country, how widely they sometimes differed from the actual results, and how impossible it was to speak of financial totals in such a case until all the figures were produced. It was clear, therefore, it would be necessary that an opportunity for the full discussion of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman should be furnished at a later period of the Session, and, that being so, he should not trouble the House by dealing with it at any length that evening. He might, however, be permitted to observe that there was one remark made by his right hon. Friend which he had heard with great satisfaction—he alluded to the statement that the military expenditure of India was this year being rapidly reduced, especially in the case of the Native army. Upon that reduction all our prospects of equalizing revenue and expenditure, he felt confident, hinged; for any retrenchments which could be effected in the salaries of the civil servants, or by putting a stop to the prosecution of unnecessary works, would be found to be comparatively insignificant, and would by no means greatly alter the general result. The question, indeed, had long been regarded in that light; for ever since the pacification of Oude had been accomplished, the reduction of the Native army had been continually pressed on the attention of the Indian Government. That that reduction should be carried out to a large extent he thought the House had a right to expect. The danger, it was true, of turning loose on the country a number of men accustomed to the use of arms, and naturally indisposed to take up any other profession, was not to be altogether lost sight of; but when the present state of India was taken into account; when one reflected how completely her internal peace had been restored; how well-disposed the Native princes were towards us, and how thoroughly our power had been re-established and consolidated in that quarter, it would, he thought, be admitted that we should be able to carry on our administration there with a much smaller military force than we had hitherto deemed it necessary to maintain. He might add, with respect to the loan for railways, that the right hon. Gentleman was, in his opinion, perfectly right in proposing to push on those works. Indeed, in the actual state of affairs, the only option left to the Government was either to assist the railway companies by the resources of the Government, or to leave the railways in an unfinished state, when they would be likely to suffer to such an extent from the action of the elements and other causes, that the cost of restoring them to their present state would in many instances be as great as that of carrying out the original plan. It would be idle in dealing with that particular point to raise the question whether it was desirable, with the view to the promotion of the interests of India, that the railways should be completed, or canals and works of irrigation taken in hand in the first instance, because, so far as the Home Government were concerned; they were pledged in a manner quite irrevocable to the adoption of the former course, by the fact of the guarantees that had been granted unless they were prepared to sacrifice the interest on all capital which they had already guaranteed. But he regretted to hear his right hon. Friend state, if he understood him rightly, that he was inclined to keep in the hands of Government officers those other works which they all knew were so necessary in that country—such works as canals, works of irrigation, and the opening of rivers. It seemed to him quite clear that the Government, having undertaken the construction of railways to an extent involving an outlay of between £20,000,000 and £30,000,000 for the benefit of India, would have no money available for the prosecution of any other works not absolutely necessary. Canals and works of irrigation, therefore, must either be neglected or some means must be adopted of committing their construction to private hands, different from any to which we had hitherto had recourse; for he regretted to say that the only one public work which had been undertaken in India without a Government guarantee, and which would not involve a loss of one shilling to the Government in the event of its failure, appeared to him—and he had looked into all the circumstances of the case—scarcely to have been dealt with in a fair or friendly spirit. He did not, however, rise to discuss the affairs of any particular company, and would simply add that he thought the Government would find that they had as much work as they could accomplish in the completion of railways in India, and that the construction of other works of importance must either be suspended altogether or intrusted to private individuals. Taking it for granted that they would not, in agreeing to any Resolution on the subject that evening, be pledging themselves to the amount of the loan, he should reserve any further observations which he might have to make for a future occasion.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, he could not but express his disappointment at the circumstance that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India had, in proposing to raise so large a sum of money for railways, shown so little affection for what he called his “pet scheme”—the opening up the navigation of the Godavery river—a work which might be carried out by merely making an addition of 10 per cent to the amount now asked for the construction of railways. The Godavery led into the finest cotton districts of India—districts hitherto inaccessible except on those occasions when cotton stood at so high a price as to enable merchants to pay extraordinary sums for its carriage on the backs of bullocks. A few years ago some native houses under those circumstances made an attempt to convey cotton from Berar, a distance of nearly 600 miles, and 30,000 bullocks were employed for the purpose, but thousands of them perished of hunger and fatigue because sufficient provender could not be procured for them on the route. If New Orleans had adopted the same system as the Government of India had done, and been content with having its cotton brought there on bullocks' backs, instead of by means of the Mississippi river, it would never have been the great and flourishing place it had become. What was wanted from India was good cotton, and that would never be obtained until there should be a cheap conveyance for it. They would probably receive 1,000,000 bales of cotton during the present year from India, as all the rubbish that could be scraped together would be sent over now that the price had risen so high. But that was not the sort they wanted. They required good cotton, and good cotton could be got from India as well as from America if its carriage to market were equally cheap. Cotton was brought down the Mississippi 1,000 miles for half-a-farthing a pound, and for the same price it could be brought 500 miles down the Godavery, if that river were made navigable. About a year ago a company proposed to make this river navigable; but at that time the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India preferred that the work should be carried on by the Government, because it would be impolitic he said to impose tolls on the traffic, as a company necessarily must, to compensate them for their outlay. If it were thought advisable last year to open out the river, it had not been rendered less desirable by occurrences which had taken place since. No one could foresee what effect the events on the other side of the Atlantic might have on the supply of cotton. There could be no objection to the opening out of the Godavery on the score of the great expense of the work; and when the right hon. Gentleman talked of £8,000,000 for railways, £300,000 or £400,000 for opening the river constituted no immense expenditure for an undertaking which Sir Charles Trevelyan, who had travelled through the district and described it as one of the richest in India, declared to be of the highest importance to India, and claiming the first attention on the part of the Government. He believed that in a few years the opening out of the Godavery would yield the Government 100 per cent per annum on their outlay while the great increase in the consumption of salt, which was a Government monopoly, and the carriage of Government stores alone would nearly pay the annual interest on the outlay. He would mention an instance of the effects of cheap carriage: the Indus having recently been opened and steamers placed on it, a flax company in Ireland had been induced by these facilities to send an agent to India to obtain flax. The agent stated that when he got out he found that the flax grown was only eight to twelve inches high, he found that the land prepared for its growth was merely scratched with a stick, and that from generation to generation there had been the same seed without change. This gentleman tried the experiment of an English plough and ploughed a portion of the land, sowed it with fresh seeds from Europe, and had the satisfaction of finding that flax was thus produced four times longer than that previously grown. Similar results would take place from a better cultivation of cotton under English superintendence, and that better cultivation would come if only cheap conveyance were obtained. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was glad to see Englishmen going out to India to cultivate cotton. But, he would be mistaken, they would not go out because they could not successfully cultivate cotton unless he gave them conveyance to market equally cheap with America. On Friday last the Under Secretary for India (Earl de Grey and Ripon) stated in the other House that the Government had appropriated for opening out the Godavery the sum of £30,000 during the present year. At that rate of expenditure it would take fifteen years to open out the river, whereas the work might be effected in two years if the Government authorized the engineers to set about it in different parts at once. He heard the other day a similar account respecting the improved growth of cotton in India to that which he had related respecting flax. An English gentleman in Madras turned his attention to the cultivation of cotton, and produced 1,000 bales last year of a quality worth 7d. a lb., double the price of ordinary India cotton ; but not one pound of that cotton came to this country, the whole of it went to Calcutta for the Indian manufactures. He, therefore, had no doubt that if the attention of Englishmen were directed to the cultivation of cotton, and if they were encouraged to do so by the facility of cheap carriage India could be made to produce cotton equal in quality to that of America, and to as great an extent this country might require. He hoped, then, the right hon. Baronet would not take upon himself the responsibility of delaying the great work of opening up the Godavery for fifteen years, but set about it immediately. If the right hon. Baronet did not take that course, then he (Mr. Smith) would appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The noble Lord was distinguished at all times for protecting the persons and property of Englishmen in all parts of the world, and had even sent large fleets to collect money unjustly withheld from British subjects. He, therefore, did not believe that the noble Lord would at the present moment withhold from the English people the means of obtaining a supply of that most important article, on which the welfare of 4,000,000 of the population depended.

MR. VANSITTART said, that notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. Baronet, and which he had introduced with one of his usual couleur de rose speeches, it appeared to him that on the whole it rather confirmed than otherwise the gloomy view which he (Mr. Vansittart) took of the state of our Indian finances last year. On that occasion he ventured to draw the attention of the right hon. Baronet to a speech of the late Mr. Wilson, which he delivered in the Calcutta Legislative Council, in the course of which he inquired "What is to be the state of our Indian debt, if we are to resort to the miserable disreputable expedient, of continuing to borrow in time of peace?" He regretted that that warning appeared to have produced so little impression upon the right hon. Baronet that, not satisfied with asking the House for power to raise a second loan this year in this country, he only so recently as on the 2nd of May last, in paragraph 33 of his letter to the Governor General, gave his sanction to his raising a loan in India. That seemed to him to be very much like burning the candle at both ends. If they required proof of the state into which the Indian finances were falling it was only necessary to refer to the correspondence contained in a Return which had been placed on the table during the last few days. In a letter dated the 5th of February, 1861, and signed by Messrs. Frere, Beadon, and Laing, and addressed to the right hon. Baronet, it was stated that "by the 1st of May of this year the cash balances in India will be reduced to the lowest point at which it is possible to carry on the government of the country;" that the deficit in 1860-1 amounted to £6,678,000 ; that, looking to the remissions of revenue which it would be necessary to make on account of the famine, and the disbursement of £664,000 on account of prize money, the current deficit would be in round numbers £5,000,000 (which was recognized in the 19th paragraph of the right hon. Baronet's reply, already referred to); that, with the exception of the licensing tax, no new taxes could be imposed ; and, lastly, that no further reduction of expenditure was feasible. These gentlemen, moreover, verified the prediction which he ventured to make last Session in regard to the unproductiveness of the income tax. In their letter of the 5th of February, to which he had just referred, they

"Calculated that the full year's collection of the income tax for 1861-2, with the arrears of the previous half-year not collected by the 30th of April, would give a total receipt for 1861-2 of £2,500,000, or every £2,800,000, being £2,000,000 more than the receipt from the income tax in 1860-1."

But on the 13th of March, only five weeks later, these gentlemen wrote—

"We apprehend that our estimate of the produce of the income tax for 1861-2 may have been taken considerably too high ; and we hardly venture now to place it at a higher figure than £2,000,000, or £1,200,000 above the estimated receipt for 1860-1, given in our regular estimate."

It would, therefore, appear that that odious and oppressive tax, by which it was supposed that the restoration of the Indian finances would be effected, barely yielded £2,000,000 a year, which had to be wrung from 200,000,000 of people, amid great discontent and sullenness. Then, again, there was a claim for £250,000, which had been alluded to that evening by the hon. Member for Inverness-shire. As he did not find that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made any provision in his rash and improvident Budget to liquidate that claim of £250,000, the correctness of which the right hon. Baronet recognized in his letter in reply, and as no allusion whatever had been made in these estimates to the half-million which the right hon. Baronet had ordered to be paid to the Mysore family, he thought he would find that the pleasant dream of an equilibrium, in which he was so apt to indulge, was very far from being realized. Under those circumstances it appeared to him that the first thing to be done in order to place the Indian finances on a satisfactory footing was to restore that confidence in the Native mind in respect to the soundness of our financial and commercial schemes which we had lost since the mutiny. The late Mr. Wilson was of opinion that the existing railways ought to be completed not only at any cost, but quickly. It was, he believed, calculated that an additional capital of £24,000,000 would be required to be raised for that purpose, and that of the shareholders, numbering 17,118, only 336 were Natives. It was a notorious fact that the railway companies could not raise this additional capital, as they were unable to compete in the money market against the Secretary of State for India and his Council, although precisely the same terms, rate of interest, security, and guarantee were offered by both parties. If the right hon. Baronet was sincerely desirous to bring about a more favourable state of affairs, and to implant confidence in the Native mind, he should lose no time in introducing such a Bill—which should take precedence of all other Indian Bills—as would prove to the people of India that he was determined to uphold the power and credit of that country from home. Now that India had been made financially one with England he was bound to come forward with a bold and comprehensive Bill, explaining what our future financial policy was to be in regard to that country. He ventured to warn the right hon. Gentleman that he would not succeed in carrying out that object by simply coming down to that House year after year and asking for small irritating loans, which were only calculated to meet the exigencies of the present hour.

MR. CRAWFORD said, it was more desirable that the discussion should be confined to the subject before them than that they should enter into the whole question of Indian finance, Indian economy, and Indian everything at that time. The proposal of the right hon. Baronet was to ask the House to give him power to raise the sum of £4,000,000 sterling to make good a deficiency in the general balance of the

Indian Exchequer; and if the railway companies should not be successful in obtaining the money necessary to enable them to carry on their works, then the right hon. Baronet said he was prepared to ask Parliament in the course of the Session for powers to enable him to raise the money for that purpose. It was clear to his mind that the right hon. Gentleman, in asking Parliament for the power to raise that money, would not place any additional burden upon the market. He would merely take power himself to do that which he apprehended the railway companies might not be able to do. The question was would the railway companies be able to raise the money? He had no doubt whatever that, if it were not for the state in which they found the money market placed, in consequence of the events occurring on the other side of the Atlantic, they would have no difficulty at the present time in raising all the money necessary for the purposes of the railway companies. He obtained power about a month ago for the company he was connected with to raise a sum of £1,000,000. He was proceeding satisfactorily with the operation, but two days before that on which it was to have been brought to a close, the Bank of England was compelled, in consequence of the advices received from America, to raise the rate of discount, which increased the value of money in this country, and but for that fact he had no hesitation in saying that he should have no difficulty in raising the £1,000,000. As it was, he should pay into the hands of his right hon. Friend on the next day very nearly £400,000. It must be clear to the minds of all those who watched the progress of events in India, and took an interest in this matter, that the security offered by the railways was not undervalued by the public. What the money market feared was these constant applications for money for the service of India. Year after year the Secretary of State asked for fresh powers to raise loans, and the public always doubted whether the last of these loans had been reached. He trusted, however, that after the statement of his right hon. Friend that evening, the public mind would recover itself, and that the value of these Indian securities would rise very considerably in the market. Reference had been made in a despatch from the Governor General to the extravagant system of expenditure on which Indian railways were constructed. It should, however, be remembered that the whole of the railway companies in India carried on their operations under the direct control and superintendence of the Indian Government. If any extravagance took place, therefore, it could only be with the concurrence of the Government, whose officers had the power of checking it. He did not, however, believe the statement. He doubted whether there would be found anywhere railways either of a better class, or constructed at a cheaper rate than those of India. He made that assertion with great confidence on the authority of persons who had seen the Indian railways. Nor was there anything in the cost of these railways that would justify so positive a statement as that made by the Governor General of India. The East Indian railway, in which he had an interest, connected the port of Calcutta with the imperial city of Delhi on the Ganges. The length of the line was 1,140 miles, and it would be opened, if not all the way, at all events Agra, 900 miles, by the end of next year. The Committee would bear in mind that there was not a single railway in existence of that length; and having regard to the physical difficulties in constructing a line of that extent in a tropical country, the various impediments in the way, and the time that had elapsed since the work was first undertaken, the result could not be regarded as unsatisfactory. Not less than 371 miles of the railway were in actual operation, and the average returns upon the cost of the line already opened were sufficient to pay the whole of the guaranteed interest upon that part of the line. He believed the time was not far distant when the railways of India, so far from constituting a charge on the resources of India, would, independently of the great collateral benefits to be derived from them, bring in a large annual sum in the shape of interest on the advances made by the Indian Government. His hon. Friend the Member for Manchester talked about the want of communication. On that subject, however, he would beg to recall to his attention a document published in August, 1847—the Report of a Committee appointed in the Bombay Presidency to inquire into the question of the cotton supply. The whole basis of that Report was the want of communication with the interior. Whatever the value of canals might be, there were no doubt many cotton districts which it was impossible to reach by means of canals. His hon. Friend had talked of the land tax, and was in favour of the system of redemption which had been proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley). But when they talked of revising the land tenures, it must be remembered that India had been in a state of civilization for 3,000 years; and that the tenure and value of land in India rested on a basis as well understood as the tenure and value of land in this country. Again, these cotton lands were the most valuable in India, and it was not to be supposed that cotton was the most valuable production which could be raised there. In a densely populated country food was the most profitable article of cultivation. It seemed as though some hon. Members thought they had merely to express a wish for the growth of cotton in India, and the native would at once produce it, merely because we found it desirable to import large quantities of cotton into this country. The people of India could not be expected to put out of cultivation more valuable products to gratify our wishes in this respect. As to the supply of cotton from India, it might be observed that within the last year the whole supply to this country was 800,000 bales; whilst within the first five months of the present year the supply from Bombay alone was 550,000 bales. Large quantities were also exported from India to China, and it might be found desirable to import cotton from China to this country. Strange and paradoxical as it might seem, he (Mr. Crawford) believed that India produced, bale for bale, and pound for pound, more cotton than the United States. There were 200,000,000 of persons in India to be clothed, and though they might be very lightly clothed, still a large quantity of material was requisite to supply this demand. India supplied her own people and sent to this country and to China her surplus production, and in facilitating the export of that one of the main points for consideration by the Indian Government was the provision of railway transit between the seacoast and the cotton districts. His hon. Friend seemed to view with some apprehension the establishment of mills and manufactories in India as the result of the increase in the import duties there upon British manufactures. No doubt this might prejudice the interests of Lancashire; but every well-wisher of India ought to think that rather a matter for congratulation. With regard to the comparison instituted by his hon. Friend between the circumstances of India and those of America, in relation to the cotton supply, he thought no such comparison could be fairly drawn, seeing that America was comparatively a new country, while in India they had to deal with a well-established and ancient civilization. He was glad his right hon. Friend had announced his intention of coming to the House again to enable him to raise money, but he understood the additional powers he had referred to, were to be exercised only under the contingency of the railway companies not being able to obtain money for themselves.

MR. SMOLLETT said, the Resolution proposed by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State declared that it was expedient to borrow money in this country for the service of India. He, for one, was entirely hostile to that policy. According to the right hon. Baronet's statement the finances of India appeared so exceedingly prosperous that the income and expenditure would be balanced at the end of the present year, and, therefore, the right hon. Baronet now sought to borrow £4,000,000, and also expected at the end of the year to have to enter the market again for a similar purpose. That was a most extraordinary proceeding. The hon. Member for London had described the Indian railways as so flourishing, and their prospects as so excellent, that they would return a very large rate of interest, and yet the right hon. Baronet was now about to borrow £8,000,000 or £10,000,000, because the railway companies were unable to raise the money. Surely if gentlemen in this country thought that these Indian railways would return 6, 8, or 10 per cent they would be anxious to lend money for railway purposes; but the fact was that it was because the public did not believe the works would be reproductive, that the Indian Government had come into the market themselves to borrow £20,000,000 or £25,000,000. He (Mr. Smollett) was not one of those who thought there was anything unintelligible in Indian finance. In spite of the attempts at mystification to him it seemed to be quite clear enough; and, certainly, nothing could be clearer than that the present impecuniosity of the Indian Government was owing to the wasteful expenditure which had been going on for some time both at home and in India. Up to 1860 there were only four great sources of revenue in India—the land tax, which produced from £19,000,000 to £20,000,000; the two Government monopolies of salt and opium, £10,000,000; the Customs' duties, about £4,000,000; stamps and some other small items, which together, made up a total of £38,000,000. What was incomprehensible was that, with that amount of income, the Government did not make the two ends meet. That was a task which they ought to be called upon to perform, not only without aid from the country, but without imposing further taxation on the people of India. Instead of that, however, the opposite policy of constant loans with the imposition of new taxes was being pursued. In the year 1859, when Mr. Wilson went out to Calcutta, he told the public that in the year 1859-60 the expenditure was £47,000,000, and the income £38,000,000 showing a deficit of £9,000,000. In 1860-1, after every possible reduction in the Estimates, Mr. Wilson said that, supposing the income to remain the same, he could not anticipate a less deficiency than £6,000,000. Moreover, he repudiated the idea of having recourse to loans; yet we had had and were having constant loans. He insisted, too, upon the necessity of establishing an equilibrium between income and expenditure, and he showed how that could be achieved by an income tax, a tax upon trades and professions, by the introduction of a tobacco monopoly, and by raising the Customs' duties. He sought, in short, to raise the income to the level of the profligate expenditure which was then going on, instead of cutting down that profligate expenditure to the level of the income. But in this he was most unsuccessful; for in 1860-1 the income was only £39,500,000, yet the expenditure still remained at £47,000,000. Now, he (Mr. Smollett) agreed with the late Governors of Madras and Bombay in thinking that the proper policy would have been to have applied ourselves to the revision of our establishments, and not to the imposition of fresh taxation upon the people of India. In his opinion the taxation imposed by Mr. Wilson had been rash and unnecessary. It was certainly unnecessary; for if they turned back to 1856, when the Marquess of Dalhousie resigned the reins of Government, after all those annexations and spoliations for which his viceroyalty was notorious, he left behind him a minute in which he distinctly stated that for all ordinary purposes the ordinary revenue of India was then sufficient. At that period the revenue was between £33,000,000 and £34,000,000, and the Marquess of Dalhousie expressed his decided conviction that every possible exigency of the Government might be supplied with the sum of £34,000,000, including an expenditure of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 for public works. What had since occurred to discredit or falsify that computation? Nothing but the mutinies. To suppress the insurrection in Bengal—for he took it to have been an insurrection of the people, not a mere mutiny of the army—£40,000,000 was borrowed, the interest of which was £2,000,000 per annum, and that £2,000,000 per annum was the penalty which the people of India were compelled to pay for what Mr. Wilson had termed their most foul and unnatural rebellion. But that was not the only penalty which they were paying. They were now required to provide for an expenditure of £47,000,000 sterling; or £14,000,000 more than the Marquess of Dalhousie thought to be amply sufficient to meet every exigency of the Government only four or five years ago. Surely the enunciation of such a fact was of itself sufficient to show the necessity of an urgent scrutiny into and reform of every branch of Indian expenditure. In his judgment a large sum might be saved in every department of the Government expenditure, and especially in the civil establishments, not by cutting down the salaries of individuals, though much might be done in that way, but by the introduction of new and improved fiscal schemes of administration in the country; by the introduction, for instance, into the territories of Madras and Bombay of the principles of that permanent settlement which Lord Cornwallis adopted in Bengal seventy years ago, and which was the foundation of the improvement and wealth of that portion of our Indian empire. The cry in India was always for more patronage, places, and situations, but, in his opinion, there were too many highly paid functionaries there already. Those parts of the country were best governed where there were fewest officials, and where power was centred in the hands of a small number of experienced officers, as for example in the non-regulation provinces. In fact, the ordinary administration had fallen into the utmost possible contempt in districts where appointments had been multiplied to the greatest extent. It was in the army, however, where the largest amount of reduction should be made. The maintenance of a force of 80,000 European troops in India was wholly unnecessary; 50,000 would be amply sufficient to preserve tranquillity if the country were only governed with justice and moderation, and endeavours were made to conciliate instead of to exasperate the inhabitants. But if the European army was to be maintained upon its present footing there was a great necessity for considerably lowering the pay and emoluments of the officers and soldiers. At present, when a regiment was sent out to India the pay and allowances were at once doubled, and the pay and emoluments of the superior officers became five or six times what they amounted to in this country. The time had arrived when that should be revised; when the pay should be rendered more commensurate with the duties performed, especially in time of peace, and be made nearly identical with the pay of regiments serving in our other tropical possessions. Then there were the staff appointments in India. Since he had served in India they had been multiplied five fold. Places had been made for men, not men selected for places. Last year the Secretary of State said there were 1,200 officers in the local Bengal army alone serving on the Staff, and this was mentioned apparently with the view of showing that the Queen's officers did not get their fair share of the plunder. A lieutenant-colonel presided over the stationary department; captains and majors on full pay superintended ragged schools; and not long ago an officer in the Madras Presidency was selected to be photographer to the Governor, probably to take likenesses of the notables of the Council and of the family of his Excellency. The sum paid for his chemicals and for this officer's general establishment was £1,600 a year. In former times the staff appointments were limited in India, and only a certain proportion of officers could be taken from the regiments; but since the amalgamation of the armies had taken place there seemed to be unlimited opportunities for multiplying these staff appointments. He feared they would be doubled in a few years, though he believed half of those which already existed were not needed. Then there was the Public Works Department, which seemed to be in such favour with hon. Gentlemen connected with Lancashire; though, after having watched it carefully for twenty-five years, he must say that he thought it one of the most expensive, corrupt and profligate organizations in the world. In this country where a work was undertaken by officers of the Government one generally looked for the maximum of cost and the minimum of profit; but how much more must that be the case in India, where every public work was done by Government officers, from clearing a drain to opening the Godavery. In the Revenue department when immense works were undertaken fabulous reports were spread of the enormous profits derived from them, but those anticipations were too seldom realized. He would instance the irrigation works of the Godavery, which had been often referred to as likely to produce enormous profit; they were begun in 1847 and opened in 1852 at a cost of £300,000. The normal land revenue of the district previously stood at about £200,000 a year, and from 1852 to 1857 it never rose above £204,000. The expenses of maintaining the works, superintendence, and the interest of capital sunk amounted to £40,000 a year, so that there was a clear loss of between £30,000 and £40,000 a year to the Government. And yet all this time the Government allowed their officers to state that the works had paid for this construction from the beginning, and that they were about to pay 70 per cent per annum to the Exchequer. It was now stated, on the authority of Lord Canning, that the public works of reproduction were stopped in India, but on looking into the accounts it would be seen that in 1859-60 £4,500,000 was expended on public works, irrespective of railways, and the estimate for 1860-1 was £4,300,000. The salaries for establishments alone in 1859-60 amounted to between £600,000 and £700,000. These public works might easily be cut down to the level of the Marquess of Dalhousie's time. In the home expenditure very large sums were lavished unnecessarily in subsidies to companies in the City of London, got up, in his opinion, for stockjobbing purposes. The expenditure of £47,000,000 for the year 1860-1 was a great scandal. The interest on the public debt of India was but £4,500,000, and the rest of that large sum was spent—squandered to a great extent—on the civil and military services. Such an expenditure was altogether unnecessary if we governed the country with justice and moderation, but it was now required to be extorted from the Natives of India because we carried on our Government there on the principle of military dominion. That military coercion was the rule of our Government there was shown by the fact that the income tax had been brought down to salaries of £20 in civil life, while all highly paid military officials up to the rank of majors of the line had been exempted. Such an exemption was most unexampled, and could only proceed from a desire to conciliate the military service. So long as our rule was conducted on this principle, so long should we have there a harvest of discontent. The true policy was to reduce expenditure. The Indian Government ought to be compelled to remit money to England for the expenses of the Home Government, instead of the Secretary of State having to borrow it here, and he should certainly, therefore, vote against the right hon. Gentleman's resolution.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he was sorry to see that the right. hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had inherited a very bad principle of the old East India Company, never to allow a private company to get too good a thing in India. In the instance adverted to by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, a private company was raising money in this country for an object which would have been of great benefit to India, when the right hon. Gentleman turned round and retreated from the conditions to which he had agreed, or, at least, which he had led the company to believe he would agree to. This was the policy of the old company, and very injurious it had been to India, for it had prevented English capital from flowing into that country. The only exception was in the case of the Madras Irrigation Company, where the terms granted were fair and liberal, and the profits of that undertaking would be very considerable. The consequence was that the shares of that company had risen considerably. What they wanted to see in India was one or two companies which paid extremely well, so as to give confidence and enable them to raise capital without this extreme burden being cast on the finances. He believed that the more they reversed the old principles of Government the better it would be for India and for this country. The railways would carry anything but cotton. The ordinary carts might have been seen not long ago carrying cotton side by side with the Madras line. He did not know how far the change in the rates effected by Sir Charles Trevelyan had had the effect of altering such an extraordinary state of things, but he believed that even now other railways did not bring the products, to convey which was the great object of their being made. There had been a small beginning in a new system of finance. The right hon. Gentleman had introduced the income tax, which, in a poor country like India, was an extremely heavy impost, and extremely distasteful to the people. It would be dangerous to persevere in taxing personalty unless they removed the shackles which prevented the accumulation of capital, and the right hon. Gentleman had not taken measures to promote that great object. It was useless to send planters and seeds from South America, or to write despatches about the cultivation of cotton. The one thing needful was to alter the tenure of land. It might be quite true that, in some parts, the people were attached to the present system of tenure; but in such parts they need not alter it, as it was a great mistake to suppose that legislation must be uniform for the whole of a great continent. There were miles upon miles of waste districts adapted to the cultivation of cotton which were once fertile through the irrigation works of former Mahomedan princes. Why were those lands not sold? He would give notice that dormant rights would be extinguished, and apply the same principle which had been successfully applied in America—of selling lands to settlers at low prices. The same cause which now attracted population to America and Australia would draw them to India, and make India prosperous. The parallel between the Godavery and the Mississippi had been questioned, but he had the authority of Captain Haigh, the engineer of the Godavery, who had seen the Mississippi, for saying that there were no more obstacles to making the Godavery navigable than to making any river in America navigable. The hon. Member had appealed to the noble Lord at the head of the Government as one imbued with the spirit of the age, and convinced of the necessity of going a little faster than people who lived in former times. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State to take an example from his colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose alterations during the last seven or eight years had given satisfaction to the great mass of his fellow-countrymen? They did not want necessary reforms delayed for twenty years. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had been only a year in office, and he had made a beginning. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State had been two years in office, and he wanted to know how long it would be before he would decide on some bold and enterprising measures. If they had begun to govern India in the spirit and with the vigour which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown, they would never have had the mutiny. A miserable apathy prevented the cause being removed. They had paid dearly for it, but the same cause would lead to the same results. They would not only have a revolt of the army; but, if reforms were not adopted, they would have a rebellion, and they would lose India.

COLONEL SYKES said, that the subject of railways and cotton had an important bearing on the financial position of India. As to cotton, if the Ryot or farmer, who generally had a proprietary right in the land found that the cultivation of it would pay better than the cultivation of sugar he would grow it; he was fully alive to the value of money, and was free from the obligation to raise certain crops in rotation like the English farmer. Experience showed that cotton of any quality could be produced in India. But its prospect of sale depended upon the cost of its transit to the coast, and it was of importance, therefore, to get the cotton conveyed to the coast in the cheapest manner, and, as water carriage was less expensive than the railway, the Government ought to improve the rivers and canals as much as possible. He observed that the Ganges Canal Navigation Company divided at the rate of 34 per cent on their paid-up capital for the half-year ending last December, and he had no doubt that the navigation of the Godavery, if properly carried out, might be rendered equally profitable. With respect to the question of the sale of land in fee simple; the Government had no power to sell occupied land as long as the land tax was paid; but Government might dispose of waste land in that manner with great advantage. That was not the time to discuss the question of finance; but the explanatory despatches laid on the table upon the subject were utterly inexplicable. Whether these despatches were intelligible or not, public works in India could not go on without the assistance of the Government; and he apprehended, moreover, that the right hon. Gentleman, before the Session was over, would have to apply for power to raise more money to pay the home charges of the Indian administration.

MR. HADFIELD said, he must complain of the great hardship inflicted on trade by the 10 per cent duty which was charged on all goods, except cotton twist, entering India. It amounted, in fact, to a prohibition, and he hoped the Government of India would make a change in that respect.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) in thinking that a discussion on the general state of the Indian finances would not be attended with any advantage until they had later and fuller information on the subject. As to the railways, the Government, after careful consideration, had come to the conclusion that it was better for them to assist the railway companies by advances of money, than to take the lines out of their hands and complete the works on their own responsibility. The Godavery was essentially different from the Mississippi, as extensive and costly works were required to make it navigable, and would probably require the construction of canals in three separate places. No doubt the report of Captain Haigh was a very valuable one, but it would be very imprudent to commence a vast work, such as rendering practicable at all times the navigation of the Godavery, without further inquiry; and, in corroboration of that, he might refer to the proceedings of the Madras Irrigation Company, that model company which had been mentioned by his hon. Friend. In the case of these operations, plans were prepared for the works in four sections, the whole cost of which was to be little more than a million, but it turned out upon more complete investigation, that the lower section of the work alone would cost about a million, and in the other sections the cost would at least be equal to the whole amount of the original estimate for the complete work. As to the danger of beginning works without a full survey, it appears that the same company built a dam across the river, in order to turn the water into a canal for irrigation, which had to pass over some high land, and when built it was found that the water would not run over the heights from that head, so that a new one had to be built eighteen miles higher up the river, in order to gain a sufficiently high level from which to take the water. Thus, from want of a proper survey, from inaccurate estimates and inadequate levels, a considerable loss had been incurred. The result of the operations of this company ought to be a warning to the Government. In his own opinion, if the Government had the means, it would be better for them to construct those works than private companies, because the Government only required a fair interest upon the outlay, while a private company, of course, wishes for a profit besides. With respect to the growth of cotton in India, he agreed that English superintendence would be useful, but the ryots only wanted sufficient inducements to cause them to grow cotton instead of other crops. It was not quite the fact that the want of means of transport at present prevented the extension of the growth of cotton, for cotton was now sent from India to China. Improvements in the means of transport were no doubt desirable, but, as the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford), had truly said, the ryots would grow cotton suited for the English market, if the price offered for it were sufficiently remunerative. English superintendence and direction in the various processes of cultivation, picking, and cleaning, would do much towards improving the quality; and within a year or two he hoped the means of communication would be improved, and the cotton brought down for shipment at a cheaper rate than at present. With reference to the duties upon manufactured goods, he hoped that before long they would be reduced to 5 per cent, as that upon yarn had already been reduced; but as a revenue was necessary, it was hardly fair to object to direct taxation upon land, and to indirect taxation by means of Customs' duties. In regard to the tenure of land in India, he had followed out the course adopted by his predecessor in office. It was not true that all the waste lands of India were the property of the Government, but in fact he never could see that the tenure of land was an insuperable bar to the cultivation of cotton, as had been represented, because leases for twenty or thirty years could be obtained. The proposal which he made had no reference whatever to the balance of income and expenditure of the year; he was not proposing to raise money to supply a deficit, but to supply immediate wants, because he had not, as he had during the last year, a considerable balance available for home expenditure. He was inclined to think that there would be no deficit at all in the course of the year, and, therefore, neither in the last year nor this, should he have to borrow a single sixpence, as he hoped, for the public expenditure of India. He might, however, have to borrow for the railroads. If the state of the money market enabled the railway company to raise the necessary capital for constructing the line, he had not the slightest wish to interfere, and he should only ask for power to raise money for that purpose, if the companies were not able to raise the necessary capital themselves upon reasonable terms.

Resolved,

"That it is expedient to enable the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise Money in the United Kingdom for the service of the Government of India,"

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

OBSERVATIONS.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to move that you now leave the chair, in order that the House may go into Committee of Supply, and I cannot refrain from taking this opportunity of expressing the deep regret which Her Majesty's Government feel at the great loss which the country has sustained this very morning by the death of Vice Admiral Dundas, a most distinguished officer, who was for forty-five years in the service of his country, and who equally distinguished himself in every sphere in which he was called upon to act. He was eminent for the good discipline and order of the ships which he commanded, he was distinguished by the gallantry and good judgment with which he conducted every naval operation in which he was engaged, he was most valuable as a public servant in the direction of naval affairs at the Admiralty. Whether at the Council Board or on the quarter deck his merits were equally eminent, and his services were equally valuable to the country. It would have been an omission of which we should have been sorry to be guilty, if, upon this occasion, in moving that you, Sir, leave the chair, in order that we may go into Committee on the Naval Estimates, we had not expressed our deep sense of the loss which the country has sustained, and had not paid a tribute of respect to the memory of a distinguished and valuable servant who has been unexpectedly lost to the public service.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I cannot refrain from begging permission to add a few words to what has been said with so much feeling by the noble Lord, and to express the very deep regret with which I heard this morning of the loss which the country has sustained by the sudden death of my gallant Friend Sir Richard Dundas. During the time that I had the honour of being at the head of the Admiralty I had the advantage of his assistance at the Board, and I am sure that every one who was acquainted with that gallant Officer will feel as I do, that it was quite impossible to be connected with him so intimately to see him as I did from day to day, without forming the highest opinion of his character, and feeling for him the warmest friendship and attachment. He was a distinguished ornament of the naval profession, he was an honourable, frank, and straightforward colleague, and I deeply lament his loss, not only upon those accounts, but as a private friend for whom I felt the greatest value and respect.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE: Sir, I hope I may be permitted to say one word to lament the death of my old and valued Friend Sir Richard Dundas. Many years ago I had the pleasure and honour of serving under that distinguished Admiral. I feel that the loss sustained by the country by his death at this moment is very great, because, as the noble Lord has said, whether on the quarter deck or at the Council Board, his safe advice and his sound judgment were most valuable, and I believe that it will be extremely difficult to supply his place at that Board.

SIR GEORGE SEYMOUR: Having long known the late Sir Richard Dundas, and having served with him on the last occasion on which he was at sea, I wish to echo all that has been said with reference to the loss of that gallant Officer. I served with him as his second in command in the Baltic, and have known him in every rank, the duties of all of which he so admirably discharged; and I am deeply sensible of the loss which the navy as well as the country has sustained by his death. His judgment was based upon great experience, and he exercised it with great advantage to the country and to the naval service. I can well understand how highly he was esteemed, and how thoroughly his merits were recognized by those who were connected with him in office.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I must ask the indulgence of the House while I, likewise, express my deep regret at the death of that valuable officer Sir Richard Dundas. He was perfectly well known to me, and an officer of greater merit, of more determined courage, or more resolute to do well in the service of the country could not be found in the navy.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee ;

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,489,477, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of Naval Stores for the Building, Repair, and Outfit of the Fleet, Steam Machinery, and Ships built by Contract, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. LINDSAY said, that they could only hope to draw attention to the Estimates by singling out items and dwelling on their details; and, therefore, he wished to say a few words on this Vote. For many years the Admiralty confined the manufacture of steam-engines for the navy to two firms. After knocking at the door of the Admiralty Session after Session, they were at length convinced that there were many other firms which could supply equally good engines, and it was then found that engines for which they had hitherto paid £70 to £80 per horse power could be built for £55 per horse power. But, even now, tenders might with advantage be received from a larger number of manufacturers. With regard to anchors one firm had held the contract for twenty years. For a certain number of anchors the Admiralty paid that firm £3,434, and these same anchors could be had from equally eminent firms for £1,428. In other words, they were paying nearly three times the market price for anchors. It might be said that the prices were subject to revision; but somehow, notwithstanding the invention of the steam hammer and other improvements, the prices seemed to be increasing. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty might wonder what was the reason of his hammering, year after year, upon this subject, and would, perhaps, think he had some interest in the matter. His personal feeling, if any, in the matter, was, however, in favour of the particular firm that had the monopoly of the anchors. He wished to know why the particular firm of Brown, Lennox, and Co., retained that monopoly—why the supply of anchors had not been thrown open to competition, and why other eminent manufacturers had not the opportunity of tendering? He had given notice that the Vote of £500,000 for the purchase of steam machinery for Her Majesty's ships should be reduced by £100,000; but before dividing the Committee on that proposal he wished to know from his noble

Friend for what ships this steam machinery was required?

MR. CONINGHAM said, he could not understand why the supply of anchors should not be offered to competition. It was only necessary that the contractors should be under proper control. There was no difficulty about that. The contractors for the fortifications of Paris had been ruined because they had to complete their contracts under the superintendence of Government engineers. The great thing was to take care that contracts were not made with those who were incapable of executing them. He rose, however, more particularly to object to the system of iron-ship building. He should certainly, at the proper time, take the sense of the Committee on the Vote of £55,000 for steam machinery for iron-built ships, to see whether a wholesale system of manufacture was to be sanctioned by them or not.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that if the Motion to reduce the Vote of £685,000 for steam engines by £100,000 were put, the hon. Member for Brighton could not move the reduction of the minor item.

MR. LINDSAY said, he should await the explanation of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty before he troubled the Committee to divide.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, there was no item in the Navy Estimates on the expense of which he would place less stress than for anchors. But the Admiralty were sticking to the old heavy anchors, when the necessity for heavy anchors had gone by. For ships of 300 or 400 feet long, with such fine lines as they were now building, they required light anchors. Rogers's and Trotman's anchors were very much lighter than the Admiralty anchors. It was objected to those anchors that they did not bite; but having inquired into the subject he found their great defect was that they bit too sharp, so as to produce what was technically called "snubbing," when the ship being brought up too sharp, the cable broke, but not the anchor. He would give his support to the first part of the proposition of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), but not to the second; for though eventually we should be obliged to substitute iron for wooden ships, the time for doing so had not yet come; and as, in case of war, we should look for a combination of the whole world against us, we should be prepared to put steam-engines in the ships now laid down. The subject of the reconstruction of the navy demanded at least as much consideration as was vouchsafed by the House to the establishment of country post-offices, or the expenditure of a sum of money on Kensington Museum. But what was now proposed was to alter the character of the navy in a wholesale way, under the direction of the Surveyor of the Navy and his assistants. He believed the country ought to have better advice than was to be found in the Surveyor's-office, and that the men most capable of dealing with the question and who had turned their attention to it in a practical manner, ought to be assembled immediately, and invited to give their opinion on this all-important question. The adaptation of the steam-engine to the sailing ship was merely a change of the motive power, and did not trench to any great extent on the qualities of the ship; but in iron vessels the primary principles of construction were unknown. The point had yet to be ascertained, at which specific gravity overcame flotation. A wooden ship would stagger and recover herself; but if the Warrior were sent to sea in a gale of wind, and she was pooped with one wave and caught on the lee bow with another, it was impossible to tell how she would act. In one point that vessel was singularly malconstructed, for she was wall-sided, and thereby exposed to danger from boarding, which he was informed by competent authorities would be only way of taking these iron-plated frigates.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he quite concurred in the belief that, regard being had to the immense cost of these new frigates, it was almost impossible that the subject could be too fully considered. Very anxious attention, he knew, had been given to it by the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty, and he had availed himself of the opinions of a very valuable committee, consisting of Sir John Hay, Dr. Percy, Mr. Fairbairn and other officers who had been for some time engaged in experiments with regard to the various qualities of iron, and had extended their investigations into still larger questions. A great deal of attention had lately been paid by foreign nations to the subject of iron-cased ships, and all the maritime nations to a greater or less extent were commencing the construction of this class of vessels. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, thought it necessary to increase our force in this respect. We had seven vessels of this description. The Warrior, Black

Prince, and the Achilles belonged to the first class, measuring somewhat about 6,000 tons. The two former were now nearly ready. The Achilles was about to be laid down at Chatham. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: But not actually laid down.] She would shortly be laid down, but a great deal of her material was ready, and when commenced it was hoped that she would progress satisfactorily. There were two others of the second-class, the Resistance and Defence, measuring between 3,000 and 4,000 tons, and the remaining two vessels were of about 4,000 tons. These seven ships were now under construction, and in addition to them Her Majesty's Government had thought it wise that we should undertake the construction of five more iron-cased ships. It was a question whether they ought to be of iron or wood; but it so happened that they had the timbers of five line-of-battle ships of the latest and best 90-gun class, and it was accordingly determined that the whole of these vessels should be put up, lengthened about 20 feet, and cased entirely with iron plates. Midships they would be of the full thickness of 4½ inches, but at the two ends, with a view to their sea-going qualities, they would be somewhat less solid. It was intended that these vessels should each carry fifty guns, and the engines which it was intended to place in them would give them a high speed. He was not prepared to say that at a future time the Government might not be prepared to go on building iron-cased ships, indeed, he believed, they would be called on to do so, but what he had now stated was all that had been decided on up to the present time. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) declared that his course with regard to the vote would be affected by the reply given to him with regard to the engines now in course of construction. Sixty-four engines were now being constructed for the Admiralty, but of these only one was for a line-of-battle ship, far advanced towards completion; and four were for other vessels in process of conversion, which he hoped would be out of dock during the present summer. The rest of the engines were intended for vessels of a smaller size. In reference to the anchor question, on which they had an annually renewed discussion, he could only say that if his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland would give the name of any firm prepared to supply anchors such as the Admiralty could approve on terms greatly beneath those at present paid to contractors, the application should receive the fullest consideration from the Board. [Mr. LINDSAY: Why not advertise.] It was true they might advertise; but would the Government be justified in allowing strange parties to tender for the manufacture of first-class anchors any more than they would for first-class engines? The practice of the Admiralty was to allow firms who had submitted to have their yards inspected with the view of ascertaining whether they had the requisite plant, to tender for the manufacture of engines of the lowest class, then if they built engines which gave satisfaction for those of a more powerful description, and so on to the highest and best class of engines. He had received offers from one or two firms saying it was not worth their while to make the lowest class of chains, though they were quite prepared to tender for the best description. But it was a very grave question whether the Admiralty would be justified in departing from the rule they had hitherto acted upon. All he could say was that their case would meet with due consideration at the Admiralty. He hoped the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) would not persist in his threatened opposition to the Vote for steam machinery for the iron-cased vessels building at Chatham. The experiments going on at Chatham might or might not be successful. He was not prepared to say that the Government would build either better or cheaper vessels at Chatham, but when we were embarking largely in the construction of iron-cased ships it was right that we should have at least one dockyard where we could repair them. Private builders knew that repairing old vessels was more remunerative work than constructing new ones, and the Government, in order to protect the public, wished to have a dockyard where they could repair iron-cased vessels when they had got them.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had heard with considerable disappointment what had just fallen from his noble Friend with regard to the intentions of the Government as to the increase of the iron-cased ships of the navy. He wished he had been fuller in explaining what he proposed to do. He did not clearly understand what was to be the character of the five ships when completed, nor what was their condition now. His noble Friend had spoken of them as line-of-battle ships; but he (Sir John Pakington) apprehended from what he had heard elsewhere that they were to be cut down to ships of one deck.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: They are not to be cut down, because they are not yet built up.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: One of the questions which he was about to ask was, what condition those ships were in, or what progress had been made with them? The noble Lord had not told the Committee how far they were advanced, or what was to be their character when completed. He understood now that they were laid down as two-deckers — line-of-battle ships. ["No, no!"] Then his noble Friend had better explain, for he certainly could not understand what was meant.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET explained that the frames of three of them were not yet laid down, but they would soon be so. The intention was to build them on the model of the Bulwark, which was the latest model of a 90-gun ship. Of the remaining two the frames were already laid down. At little or no expense the whole of them would be lengthened by 20 feet as compared with the Bulwark, and they would be built as iron-cased frigates carrying 50 guns.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the fact was that these ships would be built de novo, and would be all single deck ships. The important point at which they arrived was that it was the intention of the Government to add five iron-covered ships to the force in progress. Therefore, the iron-covered ships proposed to be given by the Admiralty, and already in progress, would be twelve. Now, after the information with which they had lately been furnished, he wished that the Admiralty had stated that they intended going further. He found that he had understated the case on Friday evening. He had omitted to mention one iron frigate called the Invincible, which had been launched at Toulon early in the last month. He had stated on Friday that Admiral Elliot had not visited Toulon; he was not aware, therefore, of more than La Gloire, La Savoie, and La Provence. The present strength of the French navy in these ships, either built or building, was fourteen frigates, two line-of-battle ships, four batteries, and five armour-covered gunboats. Our Admiralty thought that it was a sufficient answer in these circumstances to say that they would shortly have twelve vessels in progress. That was not satisfactory. It was not meeting the preparations of France to the extent they ought to meet them, especially considering the formidable character of the French iron-cased vessels, and considering the large number of other ships belonging to the French Navy. He also regretted that the noble Lord had not given a clearer and more satisfactory answer to the hon. Member for Portsmouth with respect to the appointment of a competent Committee, not only to test the quality of the iron, but to ascertain, if possible, the best mode of constructing iron-cased ships.

MR. FINLAY said, he concurred with the right hon. Baronet in thinking the statement of the noble Lord hardly satisfactory. He did not see why the Admiralty might not act with more energy without putting the country to additional expense. We were told that our wooden fleet was of little use for coast defence. We had several large wooden three deckers; and he wished to know why some of the hands now engaged on wooden ships could not be set to work to cut off the upper deck of these three deckers in order to cover the lower decks with iron plates. Altered in that manner, those ships would defend our ports and coasts, although they might not be fit for long voyages. In company with officers of experience he had visited some of the iron-plated ships which we had in course of construction, and he was sorry to say that the opinion of those gentlemen was not very favourable. They considered that the Warrior, although a splendid model of a vessel, would not under certain circumstances be able to meet at close quarters a vessel like La Gloire. The latter had 34 guns under casemated batteries, while the former had only 26, and was perfectly exposed, fore and aft. She was too long for the defence of coasts, and would not be handy in such a service. He, therefore, hoped that the Admiralty would not depend on vessels of the Warrior class for our coast defences.

MR. BENTINCK said, his noble Friend had talked of the observations of the hon. Member for Sunderland and the hon. Member for Portsmouth with respect to anchors as the "annually renewed discussion." It was true that the discussion was renewed annually, and he did not wonder at it, because after each renewal they appeared to leave off pretty nearly where they had begun. His noble Friend had told them that the Admiralty did not wish to shut up the contracts for anchors, and that those who tendered for anchors would be treated in the same way as those who tendered for engines; but if he (Mr. Bentinck) understood the matter rightly, those who tendered for anchors were not in the same position as those who tendered for engines, because the practice had been virtually to exclude all tenders, and leave the manufacture of anchors solely in the hands of one person. He had no interest, like his hon. Friend opposite, in Trotman's anchors; but the case was simply this:—Some years ago Trotman's anchors were subjected with others to trial before a committee of scientific men, who pronounced Trotman's the best, and the Admiralty anchors the worst. The Admiralty might choose not to accept that as an authority, but the fact remained unanswered,—that Trotman tendered to construct anchors subject to the Admiralty test at a much cheaper rate than the contract now existing for Admiralty anchors, and that up to this time he had not been allowed to make the experiment. He (Mr. Bentinck) considered, therefore, that the tender for anchors was virtually closed to the public. His hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, with reference to the iron ships, complained of the system generally. He (Mr. Bentinck) was inclined to think that there was a great deal in the present system that was objectionable, but his hon. Friend seemed to forget that they both had had the advantage of sitting twice a week on a Committee for the purpose of investigating the merits or the demerits of the present Board of Admiralty; and his hon. Friend would agree with him that a more hopeless task could not have been undertaken. He believed that the labours of that Committee would be perfectly ineffectual, and he could only repeat what he had said from the first—that he looked upon the whole thing as a broad farce. His hon. friend ought to remember when he was making those complaints that he was complaining in vain. Until they could arrive at some investigation which should bring the constitution of the Board of Admiralty before that House all complaints would be useless. He would suggest to his hon. Friend to give up the inquiry that was at present going on, and endeavour to institute one that was likely to lead to practical results. He hoped, however, that the Committee would not agree to either the reduction proposed by the hon. Member for Sunderland, or the one proposed by the hon. Member for Brighton, because it was quite clear that so long as the Board of Admiralty was constituted as at present, they must put faith in that Board. Under the present circumstances of the country and of Europe, any attempt to cripple them would be impolitic. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, that the exertions of the Admiralty with regard to the iron-cased ships, were not equal to the occasion. They ought to make greater exertions to put themselves on an equality with their Galic neighbours. They must all know perfectly well that there could be no object on the part of France in going to the enormous expense of ship-building, particularly of this new class of vessels, except that of obtaining and of maintaining a maritime superiority over this country. On the other hand, no man could believe, either in France or England, that there ever was or ever would be, an attempt on the part of this country to invade France. That was absurd on the face of it, because the number of troops we had were not sufficient for the defence of the country. It was only about one-fifth of the number in France. They were bound to consider that the only possible object of France in going to her present enormous expense in the construction of the new class of vessels, was to obtain a maritime superiority over this country, and the Committee ought to bear in mind that if the maritime superiority of this country was lost, the commerce of the country would be lost also; and if that power should be obtained by France, it would only be used for the purpose of invasion of this country.

MR. DALGLISH said, that an attempt had been made by the right hon. Member for Droitwich to startle the country, but that attempt had failed. He hoped the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty would avoid going on too rapidly in the building of iron-cased ships. Let the Admiralty first fairly try one of the ships and let the Committee now sitting consider the subject before more ships of that kind were built. If they proceeded deliberately in that way they might hope one day to have an efficient navy, but that object would never be accomplished by rashly building a new class of vessels for the success of which they had no security.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, there was no doubt that the French iron-cased vessels would be more numerous than ours, but before we plunged into a vast expenditure for the erection of that class of vessels,

we should have the best grounds for believing that they were necessary. He suggested that they should case with iron some of the wooden vessels that were in a forward state. At all events, it would be unwise to build more iron-cased ships till a fair experiment was made of their value.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he wished to correct an impression that seemed to exist that the Admiralty never consulted anybody but the Comptroller of the Navy in the construction of ships. They had consulted several of the most eminent ship-builders, including Mr. Laird, of Liverpool, and Mr. Napier, of Glasgow, as to the construction of these ships. It must be remembered that they had had no experience to guide them, that they were groping to a certain extent in the dark, and that it was impossible to arrive at any certain result as to the value of this class of vessels till experiments had been tried. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) found fault with the composition of the Committee now sitting on the subject of the Admiralty. It was an unfortunate circumstance that his hon. Friend did not regularly attend the meetings of the Committee, but he had no doubt that it would be able to arrive at important results. With regard to Mr. Trotman's anchors, all he would say was that he was not aware Mr. Trotman had offered to make anchors cheaper than the Admiralty now made them; but if he would make such an offer, he would take care to lay it before Board of the Admiralty.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that if the noble Lord meant to say that the contracts would be thrown open, that would meet all the objections that had been raised, and must be satisfactory to Mr. Trotman and his friends. He should not press his Amendment, hoping that his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland would take the sense of the Committee on the essential question.

MR. E. BALL remarked, that he had always understood that when various anchors were tested, the reward of merit was given to Trotman's, as being that which exhibited the greatest amount of tenacity. Yet he had since been treated with the greatest discourtesy. He had been much impressed by the statement they had heard last Friday from the right hon. Gentleman on that great national subject. This country possessed great wealth, much exposed, and extensive colonies, and we must maintain our naval supremacy. They had heard on very high authority that the French were in advance of us in respect to their iron-clad ships, and it became the imperative duty of any Administration to be on the alert, and to see that we were placed in a position to command and maintain that naval supremacy which was essential to our national independence. He thought the best way of proceeding was to go on building iron-clad ships on the best possible mode of construction, making them fully equal to compete with the ships of France. He could not help thinking that we were in a very perilous position, for he found it impossible to believe that France would make so great an effort to strengthen her navy as she was making had she not some ulterior object in view. If, under these circumstances, £1,250,000 of revenue by means of which we could build five ships of war of the best class every year had not been recklessly thrown away by abandoning the paper duty, what a benefit would have been conferred upon the country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The subject which was started by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) is one of infinitely greater importance than the relative merits of different anchors, or the best mode of fitting steamships with boilers. It is, moreover, I can assure the Committee, a subject which has not escaped the notice of the Government, and which still intensely occupies their attention. It is, in short, a subject of vital moment, because—as everybody must see at a glance—if any other Power were to acquire a superiority to us at sea, the most vital interests of the country would be imperilled. The question, therefore, which presents itself to our consideration is—seeing that other nations, and especially our nearest neighbours, are making efforts to commence a career of very extensive construction of iron-clad vessels—what we can do to meet the corresponding demands of the country. The right hon. Baronet opposite stated the other day very accurately the number of iron-clad ships-of-war which the French Government had either already built or ordered to be constructed, the total number, as far as we are informed, amounting to fifteen. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sixteen.] The right hon. Baronet thinks there is another; and of the fifteen I have mentioned, the greater proportion have only recently been ordered to be laid down, so that it will be a very considerable time before the whole of these vessels are launched and ready for sea. We, upon the other hand, have at the present moment, either built or building, seven of these vessels, as was stated by my noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, and the Government have considered which would be the best and readiest method for providing a large and valuable addition to our iron-clad ships. The most effectual and expeditious method, we thought, would be that which my noble Friend has stated—namely, to take advantage of the preparations which have been made for the construction of a certain number of wooden line-of-battle ships, to put five of these up and fit them to be clad with iron. By adopting this plan it is quite obvious we shall be saving time, because the materials are, in a certain degree, ready to our hand, and these five ships will, as a consequence, be fit for sea sooner than five iron ships now laid down for the first time. The French ships, I may add, are chiefly built of wood and cased with iron—[AN HON. MEMBER: All but two]—and the five vessels of which I am speaking will, therefore, be of exactly the same description as those which the French are building, while, armed as they are to be with guns of the heaviest calibre, they will be found very formidable, and, we trust, owing to the arrangements which have been made, good sea-going vessels as well as batteries. These five ships being added to the seven which I have already mentioned will give us twelve as against fifteen French vessels. France has, in addition, a certain number of floating batteries; but so have we, so that we may set those vessels one against the other. I wish the House clearly to understand that, although I have stated the measures which are now at once prepared to undertake, we do not consider ourselves precluded, by the adoption of those measures, from taking any others which we may deem expedient with the view of constructing ships of iron of a larger and more formidable description. It is evident, however, from what has passed in this discussion, that it would be unwise to launch at once into ordering a great number of iron ships of a new description until the Government has arrived at a clear and definite understanding as to what is the best manner and the best form for their construction. The building of such vessels would, of course, involve a large expenditure, and although that expenditure would be far from being thrown away in providing for the security of the country, yet it is expedient to ascertain beforehand, as far as possible, how the money may be laid out in the best way to accomplish the object which we all have in view. Ships of this description must be built by contract, and before the Government undertake to give a large order for them they think it prudent to place themselves, by communications and experiments, in a better condition to know what are the best and most useful ships of the kind. The steps which we have taken will put us in possession of five iron-clad vessels of the best sort, armed with the heaviest guns; and my opinion is that those five will be ready sooner than any five of those which the French Government is beginning to lay down. We have the materials already provided, which it is to be supposed they have not, and we shall, I feel confident, find ourselves on a par with the preparations they have made.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he was sure that no Member of the House would refuse to sustain the honour and to promote the security of the Government. But underlying all these discussions there was one fatal feeling—a want of confidence in the administrative power of the Admiralty. They could not commence these operations without great preparation. With all deference to the hon. Member opposite (Sir Frederic Smith), he was surprised to find that Chatham Yard had been selected for the building of the first iron ship. The Government were compelled to come to the House for smithies, and a Vote of £180,000 had to be taken for iron and appliances for that purpose, and a staff must be organized as wooden ships only had been constructed there. Why was not Keyham selected? It was said that the docks at Keyham were not large enough. If so, they ought to be enlarged, if Keyham was to retain its position as the great steam-building factory of the kingdom. With respect to the construction of these other five vessels to be clothed with iron, he should like to know in what yards the Secretary of the Admiralty meant to build them, because it was desirable to avoid creating large establishments in connection with these matters. What was really wanted was that the money granted should be applied in the best way. At present these vessels could not be built in the Royal dockyards without an enormous increase of establishment; and it was, therefore, the duty of the Committee to consider whether the better course to pursue was to build them by contract or in Her Majesty's yards. Let the House have the opportu- nity of calmly considering this matter, without rushing headlong into the expenditure. He deprecated the discussions which so often took place in reference to France, for he knew the feeling they excited in France, and he must say that the present French Government were doing nothing but what this country ought to have been doing long since. In 1858 they profited by the experiment that was made, and with great practical skill went on producing an iron navy instead of a wooden one. This country had enough wooden vessels to meet all the world, although those to whom she was likely to be opposed were building nothing but iron ships. They were desirous of strengthening the Government by adopting the most practical mode of obtaining the end they had in view. The noble Lord had had a great experience in official life, but he had not had much experience of commercial life. He (Sir Morton Peto) remembered the instance of a man connected with one of the staple manufactures of the country, who made a large fortune, and left it to be maintained by his sons after him. Relying upon the reputation of his name, the business was continued, but the sons failed from want of practical superintendence and skill, allowing others to supersede them by improvements in fresh applications of machinery, while they relied on the machinery by which their father had achieved his success. That was just the position the Government were in at present. They went on perpetuating their expenditure in the old direction, because they were not subject to any commercial check, or influenced by anything like a commercial feeling; but now, for the first time, there was a ruler in an adjoining country who took a different course. Nothing in France was spent that could be saved, for every shilling was there applied with the best scientific skill to obtain the required result, and £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 was made to go further than £12,000,000 in this country. They must, therefore, take care that this nation did not go to decay in consequence of the want of sufficient energy to remodel the establishments, and place them in that state of efficiency which circumstances demanded.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that no doubt there had been an enormous change in the construction of the navy of the whole world. They had spent a large sum on wooden ships, and now they found that they were compelled to build ships in some way connected with iron. The real question, then, was, how they could best build those iron ships — whether in Government dockyards or by private contract. He had no doubt that in this case, as in many others, the truth lay in the middle; and that while the private establishments in the country might well be called in to aid, yet the Government of the country should have the means of exercising a certain control. But he wanted to know whether the Government were prepared to state to the nation the cost of the Achilles? Unless a good system of accounts were established, which would explain the entire cost of every one of these ships, he should hesitate before placing in the hands of the Government these millions of money. He was quite content that the Government should build a first-rate iron ship at Chatham; but upon the condition that they should be bound to explain to the House what they did with the money voted for it. At present the accounts were so kept that the cost of a ship built in the dockyards could not be got at.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) was mistaken in supposing that these five new iron ships would cause an increase in the dockyard establishments. The wooden frames would be constructed by the ordinary artificers. The only extra sum required would be for the iron plates, which would be bought by contract. In answer to the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) he had to say that the Admiralty had directed stringent measures to be taken for ascertaining every element of cost in constructing the Achilles, with a view to a future comparison with vessels built by private contract.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would remind the Government that unless they constructed those ships on proper principles they would be worse than useless and it behoved them, while those ships were being constructed, to have a committee of scientific men to consider such questions as to the form and rigging of the new vessels. The inquiry might be carried on simultaneously with the building of those ships. The country had ample resources, and if they gave the French six months' start they could easily overtake them. He was convinced that if such a report was made it would enable them not only to avoid in future all recrimination, but would form a groundwork for the reconstruction of the whole navy.

MR. BENTINCK said, that he had taken particular care to be present at the Admiralty Committee when his noble Friend was examining the witnesses in the hope that he would elicit some information; but he had so signally failed in doing so that he (Mr. Bentinck) felt himself bound to express the opinion that the labours of that Committee would end in nothing.

MR. LINDSAY said, it appeared to him from the statements which had been made, that a very alarming state of things was going on, for it was said that in France those formidable ships were springing up like mushrooms, and that in no country in the world could they build ships so fast as in France. Now, he had no hesitation in saying that in an emergency we could turn out six ships for every ship built by France in the same time; but where was this expenditure to end? If they were to build 100 ships, and France were to build 100, their relative position would not be altered. No doubt when the French heard of the debates in that House on Friday and that night, they would build ten iron ships more, and then the noble Lord would come down and ask for the means to build fifteen. He always maintained that they should be the first maritime power of the world. But he believed the necessity of that expenditure might be avoided by coming to an understanding with France. After the explanation of the noble Lord he would not divide the Committee on the whole Vote, but he should move that it be reduced by £200,000, which comprised £140,000 for two troop ships, and £60,000 for machinery. They had six troop ships at present. Four of them had been in China for the last three years, and two remained at home. He believed that six troop ships were ample, and he did not think they ought to spend more money for that purpose. They could hire ships for the purpose of conveying troops cheaper than they could build them, and that was the opinion of Sir Alexander Milne, who was a competent authority on such a subject.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he hoped the Committee would not agree to this Amendment. No doubt the ships which were hired for the conveyance of troops were sometimes cheaper, but the question was not whether contract-ships were not cheaper in the long run than Government transports. The Government had to find a large amount of tonnage for the conveyance of troops suddenly at all times, particularly between the Mediterranean and the home ports; and if they were without transports of their own they would have no control whatever over the freights. What they asked was simply that the Committee should keep up the transport establishment to what it was until recently. Two had been lately lost, and the Himalaya and the Adventure, as well as another ship, required very extensive repairs. He might add, that if the Governments had no transports at all they would have no check at all on the price of the freight. It was always necessary to fit up troop ships with expensive fittings, and to employ merchant ships for short voyages would positively cost a larger sum than the Government troop ships.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the Government did quite right in keeping a considerable number of transports in their own hands; but after what they had heard that night about the exertions necessary to get iron-plated ships, and of the chance that wooden vessels would be useless for war purposes, he was of opinion that they might take some of the frigates now lying in ordinary and employ them in conveying troops, applying that £200,000 towards providing another iron-plated ship.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he must complain that the hon. Gentleman opposite should have alluded to the evidence given before the Admiralty Committee while it was still sitting. It would have been better to have waited to see the effect of the whole of it before he expressed an opinion. Economy was, doubtless, a very good thing, but it was not the first consideration when the safety, interests, or honour of the country was concerned; and he certainly did not think that there was any economy in employing our men of war in conveying troops to stations only a short distance off. They ought always to have eight or ten troop ships in the hands of the Government.

MR. J. C. EWART said, he would support the Amendment, because he believed, in the present state of the mercantile marine, the Government could never be at a loss for transport ships.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that no doubt they could always get plenty of merchant ships to convey troops on long voyages at a cheaper rate than the Government could, but taking the long and short voyages together, they did nothing of the kind.

MR. CAIRD said, he thought the noble Lord Clarence Paget

Lord ought not to have asked for any Vote of this kind until the Committee had reported on the subject.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the new frigates were an eminently useful class of vessels, which it would be a waste to turn into transports; and the old frigates were all sailing vessels.

MR. HENLEY said, there were plenty of steam-vessels in reserve, unfit for fighting purposes, which it would be as well to wear out in that way, while they were building the iron-cased ships.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £60,000, for the purchase of Steam Machinery for two Troop Ships, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 85: Majority 17.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £469,835, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of New Works, Improvements, and Repairs in the Naval Establishments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. CONINGHAM said, the Vote contained items relating to Chatham which ought to be matter of further inquiry. He thought the whole matter ought to be submitted to a Committee.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would move that the Committee report Progress.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would allow him first to state the object of the Vote. At present Great Britain had only 528 acres of dockyard accommodation, and 37 acres of basin accommodation, against 678 acres of dockyard and 188 acres of basin accommodation possessed by France. If the House of Commons decided to enlarge the dockyard and basin accommodation to the extent required by the wants of our fleets, it was considered by competent authorities that no better site could be found than that selected at Chatham. He would not for a moment conceal from the Committee that if they agreed to the Vote they would agree to the commencement of a great work, involving an expenditure of £902,000. The Government would offer no objection to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the merits of the scheme.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he hoped that all the plans would be laid before the Committee.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed, that the question was especially a question for the Executive Government to decide.

MR. WHITBREAD said, the Committee which sat in 1848 complained that the Keyham works had been commenced without the House of Commons having an opportunity of expressing any opinion upon them.

LORD LOVAINE said he, for one, objected to the appointment of a Committee.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he should not resist the Motion to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question,—“That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported this day.

Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT—THE REV. MR. DALY.—EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: My Lords, I trust your Lordships will permit me to trouble the House for a short time while I make a statement on a personal matter, in reference to what passed in the House last night. I have been favoured this morning with a visit from the rev. gentleman whose name was mentioned in the discussion of last night—I mean the Rev. Mr. Daly; and I wish to explain that, with reference to that rev. gentleman I had fallen into a mistake which I wish for an opportunity of correcting. I stated last night that Mr. Daly called on me before he had the interview with Lord Palmerston. I was in error. He called on me on Monday, having seen Lord Palmerston on the previous Friday; and he had a memorial in his hand from Galway, which he said he wished to present to Lord Palmerston, and he wished me to accompany him to present it. I declined to do so: and Mr. Daly proceeded to call on Lord Palmerston; but he did not on that occasion see his Lordship; but he left his memorial. Not having seen Mr. Daly subsequently, I supposed that that was the interview which has been so frequently referred to. In that I was in error. The interview took place on the Friday before the discussion in the Budget, and at that time I was in Ireland. I the more naturally fell into the mistake, because it so happened that the two Gentlemen, Members of the House of Commons, whom I am in the habit of consulting on Irish affairs, and especially on the affairs of the county with which I am connected, are my two relations, one Member for the town and the other for the county of Galway, and neither of those Gentlemen had any communication of any kind whatever from Mr. Daly previously to the interview with Lord Palmerston. One arrived in England on Friday morning, the other on Friday night; and I mention this to show how very improbable is the whole story that Mr. Daly was, or represented himself to be authorized by any Members of Parliament to speak in their names to the Prime Minister. Mr. Daly came to me this morning principally for the purpose of saying that he was most anxious to have the opportunity which my noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) wished he should have of appearing at the bar of either or both Houses of Parliament, to state exactly what did take place, and to clear himself from the imputation which had been made against him. I thought it right, wishing to be very particular in the matter, to take down in writing what Mr. Daly stated was the purport of the interview with Lord Palmerston; and, instead of speaking from my own recollection, with your Lordships' permission I will read the memorandum which I made. Mr. Daly said—“He appears to have been misunderstood and that he certainly has been entirely misrepresented if Lord John Russell at any time stated”——

EARL GRANVILLE: I rise for the purpose of putting it to the discretion of the noble Marquess whether he is quite in order in entering into these details. It was quite competent to the noble Marquess to explain any error into which he had himself fallen in referring to his interview with Mr. Daly; but it seems to me that there would be great inconvenience in introducing on this occasion matter respecting the interview between Mr. Daly and Lord Palmerston, and concerning the conduct of the Irish Members; seeing that in this House, where the question would be raised, neither Lord Palmerston nor the Irish Members could be present. I merely throw this out for the consideration of the noble Marquess.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: No doubt. But I have not said one word which was out of order or which referred either to this or to the other House of Parliament. It was Lord John Russell who named the Prime Minister; it was Lord John Russell who said that a person had waited on Viscount Palmerston, "seeming to be authorised." I do not know why Lord John Russell said this. I suppose he had some grounds which satisfied himself, though I do not think he could have had any. He said he "seemed to have been authorized" to make certain statements affecting the honour of certain Gentlemen. It is incidental to those Gentlemen that they are Members of Parliament. It was my noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) who mentioned the matter in this House as one deserving of full investigation, and who expressed a wish that Mr. Daly should be afforded the opportunity of appearing at the Bar—I think of either House of Parliament—and being asked whether any person, Member of Parliament or otherwise, had authorised him to hold out any threat or to offer any corrupt promise to the Prime Minister. Such suggestion having been made by my noble and learned Friend, I am in the recollection of the House whether it is not usual for a person so mentioned in this House to have a fair opportunity given him for making a statement? Mr. Daly says—

"That he appears to have been quite misunderstood; and that he was entirely misrepresented by Lord John Russell if Lord John stated that he (Mr. Daly) had told or intimated to Viscount Palmerston that he was authorized to speak on behalf of any M.P.'s, or of any individuals whatever. That, in fact, the question of a deputation arose out of his having said that he had no such special authority, but was confident that he was stating truly the general sentiment of all classes in Ireland. Mr. Daly denies that he offered, or attempted any sort of bargain, traffic, or negotiation whatever. That what he said was, that the strongest possible and most universal feeling on the subject existed all over Ireland, and that he believed and he trusted that the Irish representatives shared in and would act in accordance with this feeling, and would prefer the plain interests of their country to all other considerations whatever [a laugh]; that in saying this he did not refer or allude to any individuals, or party, or to any section of a party. He says that the phrase of 'taking action' arose out of a question asked by

Viscount Palmerston, and did not refer or apply to any special vote whatever, but to the attitude which he expected and hoped that the Irish people and their representatives would assume and permanently maintain [a laugh] towards the Ministry, according as Ireland was dealt with. [Laughter.] That he made no improper, corrupt, or unconstitutional threat or offer; that he said, and says, that he believes and hopes that the feelings of Ireland towards the Government will be mainly influenced by the justice shown to or withheld from her in this matter, which is the most pressing and important that can affect her progress and prosperity." [Laughter.]

Now, my noble Friends may laugh; but do they hold the interests and prosperity of the country as light matters? I want to know on what grounds but those of attending to those interests and that progress can any Government claim the confidence of the people of Ireland? I said so much as that last night myself, and the noble Lord who followed me did not show—I defy him to show—that such is not the proper and constitutional language of a free people. It is what the elector says to his representative and the Parliament to the Ministers of the Crown. The elector says, "I will not support men who act contrary to the interests of the country; I withhold my confidence from such men, and I shall give it to those who will give me justice and attention." If such language is to be called a threat, I should like to know what are the speeches of Ministers themselves when appealing to their constituents on the hustings, when such feelings are always exhibited as this gentleman very properly attributes to the people of Ireland?

LORD BROUGHAM: I am sure your Lordships will believe that nothing could be farther from my wish, or thought, or imagination, in any way than to have Father Daly at the Bar of this House on any occasion whatever. Your Lordships will also do me the justice to recollect that I was not the person who first introduced the subject of the interview of Father Daly with Lord Palmerston, for it was referred to first by the noble Lord the President of the Council, and afterwards by the noble Marquess himself, who dwelt repeatedly on it. It was in consequence of the allusion by those noble Lords, as well as its connection with the subject matter of the discussion, that I ventured to make the remark which has been attributed to me. There can be no doubt whatever that the statement of Lord Palmerston was that an offer had been made—not actually made, but given notice of being about to be made —of an interview with his Lordship, on the part of the Government, by certain Irish Members [“Oh, no!”]—by certain Irish Members who took an interest in the Galway contract, and who desired to see his Lordship on the subject matter of the Galway contract: and when Lord Palmerston answered, “I have no objection to see them, but it must be after Monday” —“Oh, no,” it was said, “then it will be too late, for they must take action on Monday night on a subject entirely different from the Galway contract—namely, on the paper duties.” Their “taking action” on Monday night depended on what passed on Saturday, the day on which the interview was requested. It now turns out that “taking action on Monday night” meant “assuming a permanent attitude,” and not taking action on that particular question which was coming on upon the Monday night—namely, the paper duties. Well, there is nothing one cannot believe. One has lived too long to suppose anything incredible; and, therefore, I am bound to suppose that was the meaning of the reverend Father, who, I understand, is a highly respectable man, though very zealous on this subject—as, indeed, I believe is all Ireland—and, therefore, quite incapable of making a misrepresentation. The examination of this gentleman by this House, to which reference has been made, is out of the question; but it is possible in the other House if, as I should hope, Irish Members should desire to take a course by which the whole matter might be cleared up, and themselves cleared from a suspicion which at present, more or less, hangs over them. Here, this would not be in point; there, it would be perfectly.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: Perhaps my noble and learned Friend will state where he got the statement said to have been made by Lord Palmerston, that Irish Members requested an interview? I do not remember that Lord Palmerston has made such a statement.

LORD BROUGHAM: I did not understand Lord Palmerston to have said that any Irish Member asked for an interview. What I understood Lord Palmerston to have said was that Father Daly asked him to give an interview to Irish Members on Saturday, because after Monday it would be too late, as they must take action on Monday night.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Thursday next,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 4, 1861.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>o</sup> East India Loan; Sheriffs Courts (Scotland) (No. 2).

COLLEGIATE AND ENDOWED PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government is prepared to advise Her Majesty to issue Her Royal Commission to inquire into the Colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, as well as of Harrow, Rugby, Charter House, Christ's Hospital, and all endowed, collegiate, cathedral, and prebendal Schools in Great Britain and Ireland in which the Greek and Latin languages are taught, with a view to ascertain whether the great resources of these institutions may not be rendered more serviceable to education and learning?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he stated on a former occasion that the Government were prepared to accede to the principle of an inquiry into the collegiate and public schools. The doubt which they had was as to whether an inquiry by a Royal Commission would be sufficiently effective for obtaining the desired information. Since his hon. Friend asked the previous question, he (Sir George Lewis) had communicated with the authorities and the principal public schools, and he found that they would generally be disposed to give information to a Royal Commission; and, therefore, that there would be no necessity for doing what the Government would not willingly resort to unless there should be a necessity—namely, of asking Parliament to pass a Bill giving compulsory powers to the Commissioners for that purpose. He ought to mention that there was one school, the case of which must be regarded as under the consideration of the Government, and upon which they had not yet been able to arrive at any conclusion—he meant the Winchester School. The doubt with regard to that school arose from the fact that it had been made the subject of detailed legislation by the Oxford University Commissioners, whose powers extended to the College of Winchester, and, therefore, as the affairs of that school had been lately the subject of investigation and of regulation by competent authorities it might not be necessary to include it in the inquiry.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he wished to know how far the right hon. Gentleman would desire that the inquiry by the Commissioners should extend — whether he would include the principal endowed schools?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that he understood the answer formerly given was that this Commission should inquire into all endowed public schools in which the Greek and Latin languages were taught. With respect to the cathedral and prebendal schools he did not wish to give any positive answer.

VOLUNTEER EXCURSIONS. QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, If any application was made to allow the London Irish (28th Middlesex) Rifle Volunteer Corps to visit Dublin during this year, and refused; and, if so, to inquire the grounds for such refusal?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that no application had been made in regard to this particular corps, and, therefore, no such refusal had been given. At the same time, it was only right to state that the Secretary of State for War was not disposed to encourage excursion trips by Volunteer corps. They put the members of corps to expense which they did not like to decline, though many of them were much inconvenienced by it. There were also other reasons which the House would understand from the fact that an English Volunteer corps lately, on an excursion trip, had come into collision with a regiment of militia, the consequences of which were not at all gratifying to those who had the control of these matters.

ECCLESIASTICAL RETURNS. QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Return, ordered on the 4th day of March last, relative to the Receipts by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England of Revenues derived from the Estates of the Dean and Chapter and Prebends of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London, will be laid upon the Table?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Returns in question were very intricate, but he was in hopes they would be ready before the end of the Session.

Sir George Lewis

DISCOVERY OF GOLD IN NOVA SCOTIA. QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has received any authentic information regarding Gold discoveries in Nova Scotia?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Government had received accounts of gold discoveries being made on a small scale at a place called Tangier Harbour, some forty miles from Halifax. The Governor reported that he doubted whether they ever would be valuable to individual miners; but he thought them of considerable importance, and capable of being made valuable by the application of capital and machinery.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.—COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. WHALLEY said, he rose to move the following Resolution:—

“That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Acts for the Endowment of the College of Maynooth, with a view to the withdrawal of any Endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, due regard being had to vested rights and interests.”

At the outset he must claim the indulgence of the House while endeavouring to occupy a position which was extremely difficult and embarrassing for many reasons, and especially because he succeeded an hon. Gentleman who had very frequently brought the question forward, and who carried with him great weight and influence from his ability and personal character. Without some explanation it would appear presumptuous on his part to ask the attention of the House to a subject, which could be discussed to much greater advantage by other Members; but he might state that he had been encouraged to undertake the task by having had presented to him a memorial, signed by 7,000 leading Protestants, who might be said to be the exponents of the Protestant principle of the country. He felt, under these circumstances, he might without diffidence claim to be heard by the House while he brought before it the grounds upon which the grant to Maynooth was regarded now, more than ever, with unmitigated, uncompromising opposition by the Protestant feeling of the country. Before he had undertaken to bring the subject forward he had inquired into the state of public feeling, and he could assure the House that the subject was not brought forward as a mere annual exercitation of the question, nor as a matter of form, but with the conviction that it would be successful, and that the agitation would be actively carried on until the grant was repealed. He intended to call particular attention to those reasons for the withdrawal of the grant which had never existed in the same force as they did at the present time. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) had been in the habit of reading extracts from various books which constituted, as was generally supposed, the elements of the education given at the College of Maynooth. Those extracts were undoubtedly essential in order to arrive at a full comprehension of the national wrong and injury—he might say, iniquity—involved in continuing the grant to the College; but he would not inflict upon the House an irksome repetition of painful arguments. If he were to read the whole canon law of the Roman Catholic Church, and the books of Deus, Liguori, and others, they could not have any further effect than the simple enunciation of the principle which underlaid the whole system of Roman Catholic teaching—namely, that the end justified the means—the end being the promotion of the interests of the Roman Catholic Church, and the means, whatever should tend to that end. By that principle treason was directly encouraged, and not only was murder tolerated as also every other offence which men of all times had agreed to denounce, recommended and adopted as justifiable, when the end was to promote the interests of the Roman Catholic Church; but in proportion as a pupil of the College had an opportunity of committing those crimes, of violating the ordinary moral sense which governed the community at large, and thereby placing himself in antagonism to public opinion—he, in the same proportion, established a claim to respect among his fellow students, and had a prospect of those temporal and eternal rewards which the Roman Catholic Church held out to its followers. He was fully prepared to establish that position. Let them look back to history, and see whether such teachings as those he had described as now carried on at Maynooth had not been in past ages carried out in practice to the fullest extent in the degree in which the Roman Catholic power was predominant. There they found proofs of a disregard of those moral laws which common sense had dictated, and which all mankind had agreed to look upon with respect and reverence. The modern history of our own country also gave a practical exemplification of these doctrines of the Romish Church. In 1853 a Commission was appointed by the Crown for the purpose of inquiring what doctrines were taught at Maynooth; and, after two or three years, they made a Report, in which they stated that they were unable satisfactorily to discharge their duty, inasmuch as it appeared from the evidence of the professors that there were no text-books to which they could refer as the authorities by which the teaching in the college was guided. They were asked to believe that professors and students were left to form their own opinions, and, therefore, whatever astounding doctrines might be found in the works of Roman Catholic writers the ready answer would be that that part, at all events, might not be recognized in the college. Now, he put it as a distinct proposition to the House, whether any reasonable assembly ought to continue the grant to the College of Maynooth, which, in the words of the Act of Parliament, was for the “better education of Roman Catholics,” not “Roman Catholic priests,” unless they had an opportunity of ascertaining clearly and beyond any doubt whatever, what was the course of teaching adopted? It was a palpable insult to the understanding of the Commissioners for the Professors to say that they had no text-books and no books of authority, and that fact of itself was a sufficient ground for withdrawing the grant. But while he did not press these details on the House at that moment, he reserved to himself the right at a fitting opportunity of investigating the course of teaching at the fullest length and in the completest manner. There were certain departments of that teaching which not even the Commissioners could give to the public, so revolting were they to the sense of decency and morality. He might say for himself, having investigated the subject, that no one could read so much on the subject as he had without feeling it to be his bounden duty to his country to endeavour to ensure for it a Parliamentary investigation, in its fullest details, if that should be found to be necessary. He should not, however, enter into those details on that occasion, because he believed that, whatever might be stated on that part of the subject in support of his Motion, there were independently of that abundant reasons of a political and public nature, such as more generally came within the view and consideration of the House.

which would afford sufficiently to make out the case he was contending for. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton (Mr. Digby Seymour) had given notice of an Amendment to his Motion, to the effect that the House should take into consideration all grants of a religious nature to all religious bodies whatsoever. Now, he (Mr. Whalley) felt himself at liberty to anticipate to some extent the discussion of that Amendment, because it appeared to assume that that question of Maynooth was a mere religious question, that all religious grants were pretty much on the same footing, and that if the Maynooth Grant should be withdrawn all others ought to be withdrawn also. In the first place he would observe that he might simplify the point which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southampton proposed to establish, by referring to the sentiments expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman in reference to that very question on a former occasion. The grant in its actual application was undoubtedly applied to purposes of religion, but that was not the intention of the Maynooth Act—the object of that Act was to provide for the better education of Roman Catholics, and it did not say a word about religion in any other sense. Nothing could be more conclusive as to that, in fact, than the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman he had referred to. The hon. and learned Gentleman on a former occasion had very fully expressed his opinion on this subject, and I cannot better express my own views than by quoting the words of the hon. Gentleman. He then said—

“The State, either wisely or unwisely, and I confess I am of the former opinion, has determined that there shall be an Established Church. Of course there can be but one, and that one maintained at the national expense. The State has further determined that the Established Church must be Protestant. Now, a Roman Catholic college, founded in perpetuity for purely Roman Catholic purposes, is inconsistent with the security of that Protestant Establishment, as a conscientious member of which I maintain that such a college should not receive encouragement or bounty.”

He said also that there should not be a Roman Catholic College for the education of Roman Catholic priests, for it would be their steady purpose to direct their strongest energies to the overthrow of those principles which the State had accepted for a national religion. And then he went on to state that if a fortress were erected at a great public cost, and he saw the Gen-

ral in command of that fortress endowing a school by its side for educating boys to undermine that fortress, he should pronounce that General a fool, a madman, or a traitor. He entirely concurred in the sentiments of his hon. and learned Friend. It would be for his hon. and learned Friend to explain to this House what connection there was between the Maynooth Grant and grants to other religious bodies. He knew of no other grant that was at all in a similar position except the Regium Donum; and if some Gentlemen thought that this Regium Donum should be repealed or even that the Established Church in Ireland was too amply endowed, he would ask all those who thought so on what rational grounds they could deem it a remedy for that to endow this college or could withhold their consent from the Motion he was now making? So long as this grant remained no other could be repealed, withheld, or diminished.

He had promised to bring the question forward free from all the embittered feelings with which it was commonly associated, and he should strive to his utmost to observe that promise whilst asking the House to consider the position of the Maynooth question in reference to our foreign relations, and also in reference to the progress of Romanism at home. Sir Robert Kane, the President of the Queen's College at Cork, remarked that Maynooth was the only place in the world, not excepting Rome itself, where the principles of the Roman Catholic religion could be inculcated with perfect immunity from the supervision of the State. There, and only there, were Ultramontane doctrines freely taught, with what success might be judged from the fact of the extension of the college privileges, and of the college turning out 500 or 600 students annually. Maynooth supplied priests, not for Ireland alone, but for England and the Continent of Europe. Maynooth was the citadel of Popery, in fact, to which it had been at length driven by the awakened common sense of the nations of Europe. In 1795, when the college was first established, there were circumstances to justify its establishment to a limited extent. There was not a spot in Europe where the doctrines of Rome could at that time be taught; and the object was to resist even by Romanism the doctrines of Atheism and anarchy then predominant on the Continent; in then offering an asylum to it at Maynooth, we had to choose between that and atheism, anarchy, and the other horrors of the French Revolution. But the grant was limited simply to the establishment of a college—for it was not ventured to propose a grant of money. But why should England now be the only place where such license was allowed? Since the period to which he referred, reason had asserted its sway on the Continent, and England and the nations of Europe were quietly watching the issue of the contest now being waged between the party of whom Garibaldi was the leader, a Roman Catholic nominally, but yet a Protestant by right of judgment, and that of which the Pope was the head, his officers being these priests, and especially those of the Ultramontano school. And where did he get those priests from? From England—from free, Protestant England. England became thus the citadel of the Pope; England was his greatest support in this unholy warfare against the civil and religious liberties of Italy. The material consequences of the sympathy thus manifested for him were seen in the formation of “the Pope’s Brigade,” and the honours that were conferred upon it after its return. Thus was England disgraced in the eyes of Europe. He submitted, therefore, that having due regard to the position of England, as having been for centuries the great Protestant bulwark of Europe, to continue the grant under such circumstances was inconsistent with the honour and dignity of the country. And as regarded the home question, what had the advocates of the grant to say in its defence? At the time of the foundation of the college, assurances, the most solemn, were given of obedience to the law, and that the donors should never have to regret their benevolence. Yet how had that promise been observed? The priests had received instructions to teach St. Thomas Aquinas, Augustine, and the canons, doctrine, and discipline, of the Roman Catholic Church, the natural effect of which was treason to the Sovereign, and social and moral anarchy. Passing over the interval from 1795 there were two or three Acts passed which ought to have excited the gratitude of the Roman Catholics, one of them being the Catholic Emancipation Act. But instead of gratitude there was not to be found in the history of any people more outrageous ingratitude, more barefaced rebellion and treason than had from that time been manifested in the College of Maynooth, and most especially so in connection with those measures which had been taken with a wish to conciliate. He would now come, however, to a circumstance which seemed to imply a distinct repudiation of the grant by the Roman Catholics themselves. The grant as it existed now was given in 1845. In 1851 the canon law was introduced into this country by a bull addressed to Cardinal Wiseman. The whole system of Rome was introduced on this authority, in the same plenitude as it existed in other countries of Europe. The House would remember the extent to which that aggression roused public opinion in this country, and the attempts that the House made to repel that aggression, and the result showing the impotence of those attempts against the power of Romanism, which entirely defeated all the attempts of Parliament and the country to resist it, was also present to the mind of everyone. In 1852, the Earl of Derby, who proposed the grant in the House of Lords in 1845, stated that although he was not then prepared to withdraw the grant, yet could not but express his regret that the grant could not be any longer justified, and that the conduct of the Roman Catholic priests had entirely deprived him of the means of justifying the grant. Lord Derby then explained at length all the circumstances. He would now call the attention of the House to the reply, given apparently by way of challenge, by a society established by Dr. Paul Cullen, and called the Catholic Defence Association, of which Mr. Henry Wilberforce was the secretary. Mr. Henry Wilberforce replied to the statement of Lord Derby in the following terms:—

“It is quite true that you made this grant in the expectation that the people of Ireland would be conciliated, that they would become loyal subjects, and would recognize some degree of obligation to the Queen and the Parliament of England in respect of this grant.”

And then he went on to say—

“It was not likely that any Minister could suppose that the people of Ireland were going to sell their liberty of action and right of independence for a grant of £30,000 a year.”

And further—

“Lord Derby expected that the Catholic clergy would have obeyed the law, and they have openly refused obedience to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. And who are they who have disobeyed the law? The archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland; they have treated it as they were in duty bound—namely, as if it did not exist.”

The Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops who were the visitors of this college deliberately declared, and fulfilled that declaration on all occasions by their acts, that they would continue openly to defy the law, and to set at nought the conditions on which the grant was made. These Roman Catholic prelates declared, therefore, in the most flagrant and express manner, by words and by acts, that they would set at defiance the supreme authority of the law of the country. Unfortunately the canon law, so long as it did not come home to the feelings of the people, was not deemed worthy of their investigation, and they found it difficult to understand what it was; but whatever it was, whether it was for good or for evil, it had been established by the Bull of 1851. In effect, the Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom said to Parliament, "Take back your grant if you like; nay, it is your duty to withdraw it, for we will not accept it on the conditions which the Earl of Derby, who moved it in the House of Lords, expressly declared to have accompanied it."

The danger and the mischief was greatly increased only last Session; an Act had been passed to raise money for the purpose of repairing the college upon the security of this grant. The trustees of the college are the Bishops and Archbishops of the Roman Church in Ireland, and all of them by their words and acts, openly defy the law of the land. That was the fruition of the system pursued at Maynooth; but, unhappily, its full effects did not come home to the business and bosoms of the people to the full extent it should do, because it was impossible for them to know what the canon law of Rome is; but whatever it might be—whether it was material or immaterial that we should know what that canon law was—one thing was certain, and that was, the Archbishops and Bishops, the trustees of this college, openly and constantly defy, and that too with impunity, the statute law of the land. On these grounds he contended that the House was bound to withdraw the grant. With regard to our foreign relations, he thought he had established his case; he would say that, however expedient it might formerly have been in the estimation of the then Government or the House to have made such a grant, there was no reason why it should be continued, when it was known that it taught doctrines which these European nations have repudiated. With regard to the home interests affected, we were called upon to pay £26,000 a year for imparting an education of the nature of which we were kept in ignorance. The authorities of the college refuse to acknowledge its text-books or submit its teaching to any practical supervision or inspection. In so doing, he contended that they had violated not only the spirit but the letter of the understanding, and agreement on which the grant had been made, and thereby rendered it inexpedient, to put it on the lowest ground, that it should be continued. The terms of the grant—the terms on which it had been paid from 1845 up to the present time—were that the money was to be applied "for the better education of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion." It might have been right to make such a provision at that time, because there was then no provision in existence for educating "persons professing the Roman Catholic religion." Yet how stood the case now? Why, since that time the "Queen's Colleges" had been established in Ireland for the express and avowed purposes of affording to Roman Catholics as well as others such education; but the grant itself, instead of being applied to this original purpose, was applied to the education of Roman Catholic priests alone, and, on behalf of the laity of that Church, he thought he might fairly insist that it should be discontinued. Looking at the practical results of the mission of these priests. The college was maintained for the purpose of teaching the priests a system which, not many years ago, had produced a famine in Ireland. In their interest he asked the withdrawal of a grant which had been wrested from its purpose, which was uncalled for, under the new circumstances which had arisen since it was first made, and the conditions of which were not fulfilled by those who received it. But there was another reason why the grant should be withdrawn. By the Constitution of this country the Roman Catholic religion was declared to be superstitious and idolatrous. How, therefore, could that House possibly justify or continue a grant the special object of which was the education of those whose special mission was the teaching of that religion. In 1845 the plea might have been urged that the Roman Catholics were very numerous in Ireland and very poor; but how was it now? The result of the aggression in 1851 had multiplied in every direction Roman Catholic cathedrals and chapels. The Roman Catholics were increasing in power and influence, and they had seen within these few days the very threshold of that House invaded by those who propagated the tenets and the doctrines of the Church of Rome with a view to influence in secular matters the deliberations of that House. He would ask the House if, under these circumstances, he might not put in a word in favour of respect to the religious scruples of the people of this country? It was objected that the floor of that House was not the proper arena for the discussion of religious questions or the claims of religious parties; but it was not his fault that these questions were mooted there. It was the fault of the Act which granted money from the national purse for the promotion of purposes which religious and conscientious men could not approve of, and he said that these religious scruples were entitled to consideration. The noble Lord the Member for London had admitted in 1845 that, if there were any great and continued agitation arising out of the grant upon religious grounds, that might be a reason for its discontinuance. Upon that ground he asked for the vote of the noble lord. He said that ever since that time there had been an agitation against this grant, and that that of itself was a reason for its withdrawal. That was one of the principal reasons why he, occupying so humble a position in that House, had brought the subject forward. He had been asked to do so in an address presented to him by 7,000 persons who had earnestly urged him to bring the question forward. That address was signed by persons of all classes and resident in every part of the kingdom, and petitions in favour of the withdrawal of the grant had been signed by 50,000 persons. He asked the House to agree to his Motion on another strong ground. The people of this country annually subscribed voluntarily £200,000 a year for the dissemination of the Bible; and other societies, with somewhat of similar objects, subscribed annual amounts that would make the sum nearly a million a year contributed for the dissemination of the Bible and for other essentially Protestant purposes; but, confining himself simply to the £200,000 a year voluntarily subscribed for the dissemination of the Protestant Bible, he would ask how was it possible that these persons could acquiesce in the annual payment of £26,000 a year, from the national taxes, to persons who were totally opposed to the dissemination of the Bible? In Wales, the part of the country with which he was connected, there were a great number of Dissenters. They neither asked for nor received any grants; they subscribed for the diffusion of Scriptural knowledge and the great religious truths in which they conscientiously believed; and on their behalf, and on the behalf of all Bible Christians, he asked the Government on what public ground either arising out of our relations to foreign countries this grant should be continued, or why the conscience and convictions of hundreds and thousands of persons at home should be insulted by the continuance of a grant which they looked upon in the light of a national sin? He would not, however, lay much stress on that argument then, that would hereafter arise and make itself heard throughout the country and in that House, but he did appeal to the statesmen on both sides of the House to do their duty on an important question. He asked them either to show some great national cause or purpose to justify the continuance of a course which was so much opposed to the judgments and consciences of the most loyal and religious of Her Majesty's subjects? or, in the absence of any such reason, he did hope that they would respect the religious scruples of the community at large, and withdraw this most obnoxious grant. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR WILLIAM VERNER rose to second the Motion of the hon. Member who had just sat down. He was happy to have an opportunity of joining in any measure calculated to put down an establishment in which doctrines were taught contrary to the Word of God, and detrimental to the best interests of mankind here and hereafter. He would take advantage of the opportunity to return his thanks, and the thanks of the loyal body of Protestants in Ireland with whom he was identified, to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), for the manner in which year after year he had come forward to endeavour to put an end to the State support of an institution which taught doctrines so repugnant to all Protestants. He (Sir William Verner) was fully aware that the House of Commons had now no power to withhold the annual grant from Maynooth, as it was paid out of the Consolidated Fund; but that was no reason why it should not agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Peterborough. It might be said that there had already been an inquiry into the Maynooth system. He (Sir William Verner) recollected that a Commission was appointed to inquire into the College of Maynooth, but it was a mere mockery. Several of the persons at the head of the establishment, and who joined in the mischievous course pursued in it, were placed upon the jury to try themselves. The consequence naturally was that they acquitted themselves. The doors of Maynooth were now closed, and they could know nothing of what was going forward within its walls. Their only mode of forming a correct judgment of what is taught within them was by watching the conduct of those who have been educated in it after they have left it. [The hon. Baronet then read to the House a document which was understood to be a declaration made by every person admitted to the college, and to which he was bound by oath before he could be collated to any parish. This declaration set forth the principle and doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church, and was, the hon. Baronet said, a full exposition of the principles and doctrine taught in the college.] He (Sir William Verner) would now ask how any Government professing to be Protestant can feel justified in calling upon the country, still Protestant, to contribute to the support of an establishment where such an oath is required to be taken, and where such doctrines are not only taught, but those who are instructed in them are by oath bound to circulate, in whatever part of the universe they may be sent? In order to make the House aware of the sentiments entertained by the priests, and the means they take to circulate and impress them upon the public, he would mention a circumstance which took place in that House, and at which he was present. There was in the House, at the time to which he alluded, a Member of high character and position. He was put forward as the representative and mouthpiece of the Roman Catholic body, to speak their sentiments whenever an opportunity presented itself. A debate took place upon a subject connected with Romanism, upon which occasion this person spoke as follows:—

“The Church of Rome had been accused by many Members of persecution. He was not prepared to deny the imputation. He admitted that on many occasions members of the Church had been guilty of acts of persecution; but he might mention that each of those acts was to be estimated according to the temper and spirit of the time. He might point to the Old Testament as containing much that might appear to authorize the persecution and extinction of unhallowed creeds.”

He (Sir William Verner) would beg to ask, who is to define what are “unhallowed creeds?” The same Member thus continued—

“The hon. Member who had just sat down had said that the Church of Rome was antagonistic to Protestantism. He perfectly agreed with him; and as long as the world lasted it would continue so, until Protestantism was extinct.”

This was language that could not be mistaken. Mr. Plumptre, who was then in Parliament, thanked the noble Lord for the candour and fairness with which he admitted that the contest between Popery and Protestantism must go on till Protestantism should become extinct. He would tell him that the Protestants of this country were prepared to meet these words with corresponding language. He (Sir William Verner) had several more documents which he intended to submit to the House but for the impatience expressed. He would conclude by making one observation, which he would take the liberty of addressing to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The noble Lord had been repeatedly appealed to, to “do justice to Ireland.” It was well understood what sort of justice that meant. In this call he fully joined; but what he wanted was equal justice for Protestants as well as Roman Catholics. Did the noble Lord consider it justice to Protestants to appoint eight Popish Judges for Ireland? Would the noble Lord venture to say that it was not because they were Roman Catholics they were appointed? Could not the noble Lord find one Protestant member of the Irish bar sufficiently respectable or qualified to be placed upon the bench? And now a ninth may be said to have been appointed, in the person of a Roman Catholic Attorney General. This right hon. Gentleman was sent down by the Government to the assizes at Armagh, with a strong force at his back, to hang a Protestant of whose innocence there existed no doubt. He (Sir William Verner) could not say that the Attorney General knew that he was innocent—that might be to commit himself—but this he could say, that from his professional experience the Attorney General must have known that had he not withheld the evidence of two witnesses, and suppressed the declaration of a dying man, he must have been acquitted; notwithstanding which, a jury exclusively Protestant—four of them masters of Orange lodges—found him guilty of manslaughter. But so disgraceful was the whole transaction, and so clear the man's innocence, that the Lord Lieutenant, exercising his prerogative of mercy, ordered the man to be liberated from prison, but not until he had suffered incarceration for upwards of eight months. And yet this individual still continues to fill the office of Attorney General, and has been rewarded by being presented to the Prince Consort.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR, said, that he congratulated his hon. Friend on finding a seconder in the hon. Baronet, who united to English zeal and fervour the Orange loyalty of Northern Ireland. At the same time he regretted that his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough had spoken of the Roman Catholics in a tone that was calculated to rouse bitter feelings. He did not yield to his hon. Friend in his zeal for Protestantism; but, however appropriate pulpits and platforms might be for anti-Roman Catholic harangues, he thought that Protestant feeling was not a proper basis for a vote given in a legislative assembly. He did not think that the Irish famine had any connection with the teaching or logic of Maynooth, or that Puseyism in the English Church was at all referable to Maynooth, and, therefore, he deplored the introduction of these topics by his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend had quoted an opinion of his; all he should say was that that opinion was given seventeen years ago, and when he was only twenty-two years of age. His language then was full of zeal, and he did not regret it. What he said in substance was this, that so long as the State, wisely or unwisely, maintained a Protestant establishment in Ireland—so long as the religion of the minority was forced by State props upon the majority of the Irish people—so long, he thought, there was an inconsistency in this country supporting the Popish College of Maynooth. He guarded himself, however, by saying whether, “wisely or unwisely.” The experience of many years and deeper acquaintance with the subject had led him to the conclusion that it was not wise, for the sake of the Protestant religion itself, to maintain in Ireland by the support of the State a Church which was opposed and in obnoxious hostility to the religion of the great majority of the inhabitants of the country. His Amendment was intended to place the subject before the House on a most satisfactory footing. He begged to say that he was opposed to the Maynooth Grant on the same grounds that he was opposed to the Regium Donum, and to the Edinburgh annuity tax. That was the broad and charitable ground to take of the question. Religion unshackled would be better able to battle against the powers of untruth, because the people would be more ready to embrace the doctrines of a pure religion when unaccompanied by State aid. There were four parties in the House on the subject—the first were those who supported church rates and voted against Maynooth; they were entirely inconsistent. The second, the Roman Catholic Members for Ireland, who supported Maynooth and opposed church rates; they were inconsistent, for why were they not as tender to the consciences of Members of the Church of England, who supported church rates, as to those of the Roman Catholic Church? The other two parties were for both and against both. As he voted against church rates, he should vote against the Maynooth grant, and leave the support of pure religion as the free offering of a free people.

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

“After the word ‘Fund,’ to insert the words ‘and also to consider the expediency of withdrawing all other State Endowments and Grants for Ecclesiastical and Religious purposes in Great Britain and Ireland.’”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. CARDWELL said, he was glad to have collected from the course of the discussion, that it was not the pleasure of the House that the question should be discussed at length, and that they did not desire to re-open a question which by common consent, both in the present Parliament and in the last, was closed. It must not be forgotten that in the former Parliament, at the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), who as Home Secretary had then to answer the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, the House declined to re-open a question so full of angry feeling, and last Session it came to the same conclusion. Without meaning the slightest disrespect to the hon. Member for Peterborough he might be permitted to state that if this question could have been brought to a successful issue in the way desired by the hon. Gentleman it would have been so terminated.

by one for whom they all sincerely felt regard, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. The hon. Member went on advocating his sincere views on the subject up to the latest moment when he could obtain a favourable attention from Parliament, and the fact of his having now allowed the question to pass into other hands was a proof that the House would not permit it to be re-opened. In consequence of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Peterborough, he thought it right to state that, according to the Report of the Commission, there was nothing in the teaching of the college which was not consistent with unreserved allegiance to the Queen or with the rules of morality; and, further, it was only right to state that the conduct of the students of the college was acknowledged by those who were competent to speak on the subject to be most exemplary. The hon. Member for Peterborough had spoken of a new agitation, but he hoped the House would not encourage any such undertaking. The hon. Member, not feeling sanguine as to the result of his Motion had, like a cautious general, provided a line of retreat for himself, having given notice that in the event of his Motion for repealing the grant to Maynooth College being negatived, it was his intention to propose a Select Committee on the doctrines and discipline of the college, intending to employ the Committee in considering the commentaries of Cabbasutius and Devoti. He hoped it was no proof of discreditable ignorance if he admitted himself to be profoundly ignorant of those writings. He was convinced, however, that if the House of Commons began to uproot the foundations of religious establishments throughout the country, they would have difficulties to encounter and anxieties to meet which they would find it most difficult to surmount.

MR. SPOONER said, he would trespass for a few minutes only on the indulgence of the House, which had been so often accorded to him. He wished to disabuse the House of the impression which seemed to have been conveyed by the right hon. Gentleman that he had withdrawn from this question, because he considered that Parliament was no longer willing to entertain

it. He assured the right hon. Gentleman that he felt it to be his duty, so far as he was able, to protest against the Maynooth grant. But if he had been desirous again to take the lead in this question, his health and strength would not permit him. His right hon. Friend had said that this question was silenced; but in this his right hon. Friend was mistaken. The Protestant feeling in this country was as strong as ever, and, in his humble judgment, the Protestants of this country were able to bring before the House so strong a case against Maynooth that it would not be possible for any Government to put it aside, or resist it. At the same time he was far from denying the Protestant right of private judgment. That, however, was a right not allowed by the Roman Catholic Church. They declared that their followers were to be guided, not by their own judgment, founded upon the Word of God, but by what their priests decided to be the right doctrine. He (Mr. Spooner) respected many Roman Catholics, with some of whom he had had a personal acquaintance of many years; but he was opposed to a system which he believed to be in principle completely subversive of the Constitution of the country, and contrary to the Word of God. He believed that the favour of Divine Providence had rested especially upon this country on account of its Protestant character and principles, and that whenever we had diverged from those principles we had incurred, as a nation, the Divine displeasure. The experience of this country of late years, during which we had unhappily lent ourselves to the propagation of Popish doctrines through Maynooth, and in other ways, would, he contended, fully bear out this view of the question. The Sovereign, at the Coronation, took an oath that she would support on all occasions the Protestant Reformed Church of England. He was deeply grateful to his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland for the kind manner in which he had mentioned his name, but he must say that he believed the feeling of the country was decidedly against this grant, and he should vote with the hon. Member for Peterborough.

MR. SOMES—whose remarks were rendered almost inaudible—said, he rose with considerable diffidence to support the Motion which had been so ably brought forward by the hon. Member for Peterborough; but he thought that having that evening had the honour of presenting to the House a petition, signed by some 1,300 of the inhabitants of Hull, against what he should call that unrighteous and inconsistent grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, he had some claim on the indulgence of the House while he said a few, and but a very few, words on the subject. He should consider himself utterly unworthy of a seat in the Parliament of a Christian and Protestant country, were he not to endeavour to overcome his reluctance to speaking on an occasion when such a matter was under discussion in the House. It could not be said that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were not able to bear the expenses of Maynooth College; for they could contribute some £8,000 or £10,000 a year to a society at Lyons for the propagation of Romish principles, and they also contributed largely to the fund called "Peter's Pence," to feed the Pope's armies, and repress the spirit of liberty and independence which Englishmen so much admire amongst the people of Italy. During the last twenty years the Papists, whose demands for other purposes are constantly increasing, have received from this country more than half a million of money for the support of a college where the Bible is excluded, while all support is withheld from those Scriptural schools in Ireland in which the Bible is taught to all the children. He had intended to make some further remarks on the subject, but, seeing the impatience of the House, he should refrain. However, he felt it his duty to make an attempt at being heard, and he could not sit down without protesting against the continuance of the grant to Maynooth, and stating that he should vote in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Peterborough.

MR. NEWDEGATE, who at first had some difficulty in obtaining a hearing, said, he felt that he stood in a somewhat difficult position; for sixteen years he had in that House, without intermission, promoted the object of the Motion now made by the hon. Member for Peterborough, and recently he had been strongly urged to introduce the subject, when it became inconvenient for his hon. Colleague (Mr. Spocner) any longer to bring it before the House. He, however, declined to accede to the request, and he rejoiced that he had done so; not in the least that his opinions on the subject had changed; not in the least that he believed the anticipations of the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary for Ireland, would be fulfilled, but because he felt that when an hon. Member had for many years urged on the attention of the House a very grave subject, the subject was apt to become overlaid by personal considerations in the estimation of the House, and lost that representative character which was essential to the due appreciation of the just value and importance which the people of the country attached to this question. He felt also that the subject was in danger of degenerating into a mere party question, and he rejoiced that he declined to bring it under the consideration of the House, because the choice of an advocate on the part of the Protestants of England had fallen upon an hon. Member who had brought it forward with ability, temper, and judgment, which he hoped would establish him in the good opinion of those whose gratitude he had fairly earned. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Southampton was to the effect, that whereas he, in common with others, felt a strong objection to the grant to Maynooth especially, because the teaching at Maynooth was directed against the very existence of the Church of England, that, therefore, the House should proceed to abolish all other endowments. What did that amount to? This fervent Protestant, not in the least denying that ultramontane doctrines were taught at Maynooth, asked the House to say that, because they were not prepared to grant £30,000 a year for the continuance of ultramontane opinions, they should proceed to abolish the endowments of the Church of England. The hon. and learned Member formerly entertained great objections to the endowment of Maynooth, because that establishment was specially organized to attack the Church of England; but now he proposed that the House should at once accomplish the object which he deprecated before. He thought he might easily anticipate the fate of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment. It was not to be denied that the teaching of Maynooth was ultramontane teaching—that it was the teaching of the Jesuits. Nothing could be more unprincipled, nothing more impolitic, than that Protestant England should pay for the dissemination of these doctrines. For what reason? Why did Roman Catholic Europe tolerate the position of the Emperor of the French, not only in Europe, but in Asia? He was tolerated because he restrained the tyrannical disposition generated by the Jesuits, and thus conferred an enormous benefit on Christendom. This fact stood forth, that the chosen ruler of Roman Catholic France was exercising restraint upon the dissemination of these Jesuitical doctrines, and the tyranny which they generate, and that Roman Catholic France maintained herself in an exalted position because she rendered not only to Frenchmen, but to Roman Catholic Europe, that great service. What a contrast! The Parliament of England continued in a state of disgraceful ignorance on the subject, paying for the inculcation of doctrines which she condemned, and fostering the extension of a power not tolerated by Europe or the rest of the world. While the Austrians had so far freed themselves, as to compel their Government to rescind their Jesuit-coined Concordat with the Pope — when Baden-Baden, despite the exertions of the Archbishop of Friburgh and his allies, had discarded her Concordat — when the rest of the world were rejecting and restraining this spirit of Jesuitical domination and tyranny — the Parliament of England were paying for the dissemination of these very ultramontane doctrines, for the extension of this very Jesuitical domination, against which almost the whole of the rest of the world were protesting. He was confident that those who choose to persevere in such a course would, sooner or later, find themselves severely corrected by the strongly expressed opinion of the country.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, it was impossible for him to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southampton, and he, therefore, wished to state his reasons for not voting for it. He thought very few hon. Members understood the Amendment. On reading it, it appeared to him that it did not go beyond the Regium Donum in Ireland, and the Annuity Tax in Scotland, and that it did not include the revenues of the Established Churches in England and Scotland. The Amendment was, however, not very clearly drawn up. He would suppose his hon. Friend to be addressed by a Protestant clergyman at Southampton, who would say to him, "How can you suppose that I will give you my vote again in this borough when you propose to abolish all grants to the Church of England?" "Oh," the hon. Member would reply to him, "the Amendment did not mean that—it only meant the grants to the rascally Presbyterians and those Popish gentlemen." To make sure, he (Mr. Scully) went up to his hon. Friend twice, and questioned him as to his meaning, and his answer was that he (Mr. Scully) understood the Amendment in the same manner that he (Mr. Seymour) understood it himself. Now, he was quite prepared to vote against religious endowments as a whole, but he would not single out small grants for abolition, while large ones were retained. Having now explained himself, he begged to say that he was prepared to vote against the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Southampton.

MR. WHALLEY, in reply, said: I wish the House to note this fact—that neither the right hon. the Secretary for Ireland, nor any other Gentleman, has attempted to deny my statement, that this college teaches those doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church which, under the name of Ultramontane, have been virtually excluded from every other seminary in Europe, or one there taught under the direct supervision of the State; and that this Protestant country affords the only means by which the Pope can now train a priest brigade to carry out that system from which Europe, after centuries of struggle, is at length emancipating itself. No denial has been given, or can be given, to the fact that this system recognizes and recommends treason, perjury, and murder as laudable actions, when thereby the interests of the Pope can be promoted; and that the extraordinary spectacle, which Europe witnessed with amazement, that Ireland was the only country which sent the Pope a military brigade, is the natural result of a system which amongst ourselves we see daily manifesting itself in treasonable speeches and such preparations for rebellion as prudence allows. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southampton, objects to my connecting with Maynooth that Jesuitical element which has of late years manifested itself in our own Church under the name of Puseyism; but I can show, if required, the very rules—the precise instructions as inculcated at Maynooth—by which men, who receive the pay and exercise all the privileges of our Church, are enabled to earn for themselves honour and immortality by treasonably availing themselves of our Churches, and, by direct violation of their oaths of ordination, using our pulpits for the purpose of perverting and denouncing all Protestant doctrine and practice. I consider this Puseyite form of Jesuitism is a direct illustration, intelligible and brought home by daily experience to every one of that teaching at Maynooth, to which we alone, of all the nations of the world, now give Parliamentary sanction by this grant. When the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary for the Home Department, last year sent 200 policemen, each Sunday, to St. George's-in-the-East to repress the righteous indignation of the Protestant parishioners, and refused to recognize the gross outrage to which they were subjected, or to afford them any opportunity of resisting the desecration of their parish church to Romish purposes, their cause became a national one; for by the voice and act of the right hon. Gentleman, the Governor of the country, Mr. Bryan King, the present priest-parson, was justified and supported, and the high-spirited Protestants of that parish were compelled by police and by magistrates to submit in silence and subjection to Roman Catholic forms of worship. And I can only account for so gross an outrage being tolerated by this House from the fact that it considers itself, by this grant to Maynooth, bound to defend the Jesuitical purposes which it so appropriates the public money to teach and inculcate. But I do not believe this House is prepared to accept all such consequences of the grant. I admit these are religious questions, and that this is not the proper place for the discussion of such questions; but so long as you grant money for religious purposes you must submit to the discussion of them, and, to avoid and avert such discussions is, in addition to all other objections, an unanswerable argument, I submit, in favour of my Motion. My hon. and learned Friend also objected to my connecting with Maynooth the famine in Ireland; but that is a point on which I can speak with a personal knowledge—for I was amongst the people. I was one of those humble instruments which England sent forth to save them from starvation and pestilence; and the evidence which all countries have contributed to give that this priestly domination, which we sanction and pay for at Maynooth, is really the direct cause of poverty, misery, and crime amongst all people who are subjected to it, was confirmed by my own observation. I saw myself the practical working of the system which, under pretence of providing for eternal salvation, deprives them of that liberty of thought and action which is essential for the temporal and present necessities of mankind. By this grant to Maynooth we pay for this teaching, we qualify these priests to keep in bondage the naturally high-spirited people of Ireland; and if it be true, as I assert and am prepared to prove that it is, that the qualifications which we thus impart to these priests consist primarily in conferring on them the ability to teach disobedience to the laws and a repudiation of the supremacy of the Queen and Parliament of England, what right have we to punish those poor deluded Irishmen for the acts which, in pursuance of such teaching, are carried out in their Ribbon lodges, and otherwise are repeatedly brought before our courts of justice and the public? The right hon. Gentleman says he has never heard of Cabanotius and Devoti, and yet he quotes the Commission in which one of the objects of inquiry was the doctrines taught at Maynooth, as to which these names are amongst the most important. I have here the evidence that these doctrines are, primarily, detestation of England and Protestantism; and students, who enter that college loyal subjects, leave it, to use their own expression, "the vilest rebels, thirsting and praying for the destruction of England," and such is the spirit with which they go forth on their mission to our Colonies and elsewhere, with the stamp of Parliamentary sanction upon such mission. This the right hon. Gentleman chooses to ignore, and refers to the Report—as if a Report which, in the teeth of such evidence, says they know nothing of disloyalty, was not of itself evidence of the depth of the Jesuitism which prevails at Maynooth, and of the impossibility of exercising by Parliamentary means any sufficient control. That Report, this House well knows, was, if not written, revised and prepared for publication at Rome by the authority of the Vatican; and that the right hon. Gentleman should have ventured to quote that Report can only be accounted for by supposing that he relied upon such clamour as I have now to encounter in my reply to him rendering impossible in this House such refutation of his statements and arguments as I am prepared most fully to give. He may be assured that the Protestant feeling of this country will not be silenced by such interruption and clamour as its enemies can raise here. It does not depend on my voice, which may be easily silenced; driven back from the floor of this House, it will but spread wider and sink deeper into the hearts of the people—and what we saw in 1851, and lately in St. George's-in-the-East, will again be manifest so soon as the public begin to discover that this House, on which they are so well disposed to rely for the efence and protection of national interests, is under the control of those who either perpetrate or tolerate such means of preventing discussion as that to which this debate has been subjected.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he would withdraw his Amendment, finding it was the wish of the House to take the Division on the Original Motion.

BARON DE BODE'S PETITION.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. DENMAN said, that he rose to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the allegations of the petition of the Baron de Bode, presented on the 18th of April last, and to report thereon to the House. A fair decision on the question could not be come to unless every one who took part in the vote heard every part of the argument. If he could insure that every one who heard him would listen to the case throughout, and that no others would take part in the decision, he should feel as confident of success as he ever did in any case upon which it had fallen to his lot to address any audience or tribunal. Before he proceeded to make the observations which he should have to make upon the claim itself, he wished to anticipate some objections which had been advanced over and over again, and which might be advanced on the present occasion. In the first place, it had been said more than once that this was a stale demand, and that the claimants had slept upon their rights; but he should convince the House that the Baron de Bode, so far from having slept upon his rights, had incessantly and by every means in his power pressed those rights upon the attention of Parliament, and upon all those from whom he had the hope of obtaining redress. It might also be said that it was res judicata, but he would undertake to satisfy the House that this was not a question which had ever been decided by a competent tribunal. He would also show that the Motion he submitted was the proper mode of proceeding. Parliament was always eager for precedents, and precedent was here in Baron de Bode's favour; because in 1834 the House of Commons had appointed a Committee to investigate his claims, but the labours of that Committee were brought to a premature close by the dissolution of the Parliament, and for some reason never resumed. True, in 1854, the matter was again brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Greenwich (Mr. Montagu Chambers), when his Resolution was rejected; but it must be remembered that the Motion made in that year was not one like the present, simply for inquiry; but, if carried, it would have required the House to provide in the Estimates for the satisfaction of the Baron de Bode's claims without any inquiry of its own. Yet nothing but the eloquence of the then Attorney General (Sir Alexander Cockburn) and the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer prevented a decision of the House in favour of the Resolution in 1854, because certainly nothing could have been more futile than the arguments which those eminent men used on that occasion, arguments which apparently must have been supplied to them on the spur of the moment by some official underlings. He would state to the House why it was that he had undertaken to bring forward the case. Shortly after he had the honour to obtain a seat in this House, an hon. and learned Member on the other side of the House, whose engagements prevented him from giving sufficient attention to the matter, put the papers in his hands, and requested him, when he had sufficiently considered them, if he thought real ground for further inquiry existed, to bring the case before the House. He had carefully perused those papers, and come to the conclusion, that a strong case for inquiry existed; and, having kept the papers for a long time, he felt that he should not be acting fairly towards the Baron de Bode if he shrunk from a task which, if he had consulted his own comfort alone, he should certainly have long ago declined. He was aware of the disadvantage under which he laboured in attempting to address so thin a House on such a subject, but with their indulgence he believed he should be able to show all who would listen to him that it was a case not only peculiarly affecting the honour of the country, but calling upon Parliament in its highest character, as the grand inquest of the nation, to see that that right should be done to the claimant which had so long been withheld from him. It was not a case which rested wholly upon law, for then the ordinary tribunals would be the proper place to seek redress; but it was one which came within the meaning of a phrase which had been recently employed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government with reference to another matter—Summum jus, summa injuria—a case where by insisting on strict legal measure the highest injustice would be committed, because indisputable moral and equitable claims would thereby be destroyed. The case generally stated was this—In 1793 the French Government confiscated the estate of the father of the present Baron as an emigré, and afterwards handed over to the English Government a large sum of money to cover this and all other claims in respect of which that sum was paid. The main reason why he did not receive that money was because in an Act of 1819 it was recited, contrary to the fact, that all British subjects who had claimed in time and who were entitled to that fund had been entered upon a register. By that Act the absolute disposal of any surplus which might remain after the payment of the various claimants was to be left to the Lords of the Treasury, and it was consequently held by the House of Lords that that provision was fatal to the Baron's claim. It was not until thirty years after the passing of the Act, and the disposal of the surplus, that it was many years after held that this recital was fatal to the Baron de Bode's claim. It was necessary, therefore, to refer to 1818 in order to see what the claim of the Baron de Bode was; and if he had a just claim at that time, then it must be admitted that Parliament had done him a great wrong, of course, unwittingly, when it passed the Act of 1819. He should now call the attention of the House to the nature of the claim of the Baron de Bode. By the fourth additional article of the Treaty of 1819, a right was given to recover for the loss of property, moveable or immoveable, belonging to the subjects of the King of England, unduly confiscated by the French authorities. The words of the treaty were as general as possible. Now, he undertook to prove, first, that the Baron de Bode was a British subject, and that he was a British subject within the meaning of the treaty; secondly, that he was possessed of a landed estate in France; thirdly, that it was unduly confiscated within the meaning of the treaty; fourthly, that money was paid by the French to the English Government, to satisfy the claims for property so confiscated; fifthly, that after the payment of all claims there was a surplus which ought to have been appropriated to the payment of the Baron de Bode's claim; and sixthly, that the late Baron did everything he could do to entitle himself to the payment of his claim. The first point he had to establish was that the last Baron de Bode was a British subject within the meaning of the treaty, and, if the establishment of this point depended on the law of England, there was no more doubt of the Baron de Bode's right than there was of the right of any one of them to be considered an English subject. The Baron de Bode was the son of an English mother and a German father. The father married in 1775, and the Baron de Bode, the claimant, was born in 1777 at Loxley Hall in Staffordshire, the residence of his mother's father. He was for some few years brought up in the family of the Kinnersleys, in Staffordshire, and was, therefore, to all intents and purposes a British subject according to all interpretation of English law. It was argued that he was not a British subject at all, or a British subject within the meaning of the treaty. But the case of Eneas M'Donnell, in Foster's Crown Cases, where a person similarly situated to the Baron de Bode had been sentenced to the penalty of high treason, showed the Baron de Bode must be considered a British subject. If exposed to the penal consequences of being a British subject, a person was of course entitled on the other hand to the rights of a British subject. Then it was said that the Baron de Bode ceased to be a British subject, because he lived in France from an early age. The Baron de Bode be it recollected was born in England, and Lord Hather-ton stated in the House of Lords that he had known him in childhood, and believed him to be to all intents and purposes a British subject. It was then said that the Baron de Bode was not a British subject within the terms of the Convention. He had several answers to that objection. His first was that between 1815 and 1818 the French Commissioners expressed a doubt whether the Baron de Bode was a British subject because his father was a German. On that occasion a case was laid under this very treaty before the high authority of Sir Samuel Romilly, and his unhesitating opinion was that he was to all intents and purposes a British subject. This opinion was sent to the French Government and the French Government acted upon it by withdrawing the objection, and thus acknowledged that the Baron de Bode was entitled to be compensated out of the money.

which they sent to this country. Again, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, and the late Lord Truro, expressed an unhesitating opinion in the House of Lords that the Baron de Bode was a British subject within the meaning of the treaty. There was this still more cogent reason for holding the Baron de Bode a British subject, that among fourteen or fifteen cases decided before the Privy Council the current of decision, without a single exception, was that a person born in England was entitled to compensation as a British subject unless there had been some solemn act of naturalization to divest him of the character of a British subject. Again, there was the strong opinion to the same effect, of Mr. Pollock, in 1834, although in his forensic capacity of Attorney General he afterwards opposed the claim. What was there to divest the Baron de Bode of his right to be considered a British subject? Was it that he was possessed of immovable property in France. If that were so, the whole treaty was a nullity, for it recognized the right of persons holding such property to be compensated. Was it because he was a German? Why the essence of the claim was that whether his father was French or German, the Baron was a British born subject. It was said that he owed allegiance to France. But his father was not a Frenchman but a German, and he possessed property in Germany as well as in France. At the time the spoliation took place he was only fourteen years of age, and, therefore, it was idle to pretend that he could divest himself of the rights he then possessed. The Baron de Bode, therefore, having been born in England had a right to claim the privileges to which he was entitled as a British subject under the treaty. The petitioner's father was the possessor of a landed estate, consisting of the town and castle of Soultz, in Lower Alsace. That province, by the Treaty of Westphalia, was annexed to France, but by that and subsequent treaties the old German tenures were declared to be valid. The tenure was what was called a German male fief, which corresponded to what in English law would be called an estate tail, which could not be cut off. The right of investiture to the fief was in the Archbishop of Cologne. From 1788 to 1791 this was the state of things. The father was tenant for life; the son had a remainder-in-tail, a vested remainder which he could not cut off. In 1791 the father made over his rights to the son, and the

of the tenants before a notary public in the most solemn manner. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who played junior to the Attorney General on the occasion of Mr. Chamber's Motion—strenuously argued that there was no proof of the consent of the feudal superior; but it was plain that a person with a vested remainder wanted no such consent. Whether the father, however, made a valid cession or not, the son had still the remainder, and that was destroyed by the confiscation, and would of itself entitle him to claim. About 1793 the father and son, dreading what might occur if they remained in Alsace, took refuge with the Austrian army, and in 1793 their estates were confiscated by the revolutionary Government, by which they were sold and the money appropriated. It was contended that the confiscation was not an undue confiscation, as the Government by whom the act was done were in possession of the soil of France; but the object of the treaties of 1814 and 1815 with the legitimate Government of France was to do justice to those who had been spoliated. Every confiscation by the arbitrary decrees of the revolutionary Government was unfair and illegal, and that was the view which the English House of Commons ought to take, because those were not days when England so easily recognized new Governments, and it never did recognize the revolutionary Government of France. Then it was said that the father and son were emigrants, and, therefore, the confiscation not undue; but it was held by Sir William Grant that it did not follow that the treaty did not apply because confiscation took place after emigration. The next objection was that, although it was the property of a British subject, it was not confiscated as the property of a British subject, and, therefore, not within the treaties. This point was strenuously insisted upon by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and mainly influenced the votes on a former occasion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire and the hon. Member for Greenock; but it was completely answered by the case of the Count de Wall, as reported in 3 Knapp's Privy Council Reports. Drummond's case, reported in 2 Knapp had no bearing on the present question, because there the claim to be recognized as a British subject was made under a special statute as to Protestant inheritances by the grandson of a man born in England, and not as here by a British-born subject. Fanning's case in the same volume was more to the point. Fanning was a natural born British subject, who resided in France, where he acquired the title of Count de Fanning, and was looked upon as a French subject. He took out letters of naturalization, but, as they were not properly completed, the Privy Council held that he still retained his birthright as a British subject. It could not be pretended that the Baron de Bode had ever become a Frenchman by any solemn authenticated act; and he submitted in spite of what had been argued formerly that the accident of birth was sufficient to constitute him a British subject within the meaning of the treaties. On a former occasion it was urged by the Attorney General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Convention only applied where the persons whose property was confiscated were referred to in the second Article of the Treaty of Commerce in 1786, but that treaty had no more to do with the subject than it had to do with any other treaty with any other country on any other subject. On the 20th of November, 1815, a definitive treaty was entered into which recited the fourth additional article with regard to property of British subjects, and it was upon the Treaty of 1814 and the conventions added to the Treaty of 1815 that the actual question of the Baron de Bode's title rested. In Article 1 of Convention No. 7, it was stated that the subjects of his Britannic Majesty having claims upon the French Government who in contravention of the second article of the Treaty of Commerce of 1786, and since the 1st of January, 1793, had suffered on that account by the confiscations decreed in France, should, in conformity with the fourth additional article of Treaty of Paris of 1814, themselves, heirs or assigns, be indemnified. But it was not under that clause, but without and entirely beside it, that the Baron de Bode's claim arose. In the fifth Article of Convention No. 7, there was this provision—

“In order to determine the capital due on immovable property which belonged to British subjects, and had been sequestered, confiscated, and sold, proofs of two things should be required—first, the deed of purchase proving proprietorship; and, secondly the act proving the facts of the sequestration, and of the confiscation against themselves, their ancestors, or assignors, subjects of His Britannic Majesty.”

That was all that was required, and that clause was perfectly free from any mixture with the second article of the Treaty of 1786. The Treaty of Commerce of 1786 referred only to persons temporarily residing in France for the purpose of trade and commerce. In case of any misunderstanding arising between the two Crowns, the subjects of each Power were to be allowed to continue their residence without being disturbed, as long as they conducted themselves peaceably. If they became suspected by their conduct, they were to have twelve months' notice before they were required to leave the kingdom. It had been said that Baron de Bode did so offend by acting contrary to public order. But it was the French revolutionary Government that decided he had done so, simply by the act of emigrating. But the Treaty of 1786 did not refer to immovable property at all; for down to a later period, by the law of France, and the Droit d'Aubaine, no British subject could hold immovable property in France. On a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer maintained that it was only to cases in which persons merely residing temporarily in France that the Treaty of 1815 applied. But it really applied to claims of all kinds and descriptions. It was signed on the 20th of November, 1815; and a term of three months from that date was allowed to persons in Europe to make their claims for compensation; to those in the colonies a term of six months was given. After the expiration of those periods British subjects, who had not claimed within the time, were not to be entitled to compensation; and the next point of the case was that money was paid by France to England to indemnify those British subjects whose property had been confiscated; and the French Government was aware that Baron de Bode was one of the persons claiming. The opinion of Sir Samuel Romilly was sent to the French Government, and it admitted that it was valid. It was a curious fact that so late as in 1853, when the case had run the gauntlet of the courts of law, Lord Lyndhurst produced to the other House of Parliament, a letter from M. Guizot, written in answer to certain applications made by the Baron de Bode. It was perfectly obvious from that letter that between the date of the signature of the treaty, and the period when the case could be brought forward for adjudication, the French Government admitted that Baron de Bode was a British subject. Documents signed and countersigned passed on the question. After he had in vain attempted to obtain redress from the British Government, the Baron applied to the Government of France to see if he could obtain some justice; but in doing so he guarded himself against admitting that his true claim was against that Government. The answer of the French Government was that money had been paid to meet all claims including the Barons. The reports of many cases before the Privy Council showed that that high Court had proceeded upon the basis that persons situated like the Baron de Bode had valid claims under the treaties.

The next point was that after payment of all claims under the treaty there still remained a large surplus, and that surplus, he contended, was charged with a trust to satisfy the claim of the Baron de Bode. It was established upon the trial at law that there had been at a certain time a balance of £482,752 in the hands of the Government in respect of this Convention No. 7, and it appeared that with interest it had accumulated to £566,139 in 1821. What was the application of this sum? Out of the sum of £566,139, £196,000 odd was paid to persons who claimed under the Convention No. 7, and whose claims had been presented after the time prescribed for receiving claims. He did not say that so far as the law was concerned that was an illegal appropriation, but he said that in considering Baron de Bode's claim it would be hard upon him to say that the nation was not to be responsible to him because the Treasury chose to be too liberal to others. After all claims had been satisfied there still remained a sum of £200,000 not in any way to be considered due under the Convention, which ought in justice to have been appropriated to the payment of Baron de Bode. The next point which he should submit to the House was that the claimant had done nothing to disentitle him to compensation. In 1818 his claim was an incontestible right in law, and it was only in consequence of the statute of 1819, which gave to the Treasury an absolute right over the disposal of the surplus, that Baron de Bode lost his right. It was then a case for Parliamentary inquiry, with a view to compensation. The treaty was dated November 20, 1815, and the claims were to be sent in within three months. The Baron de Bode sent his claim on the 9th of February, 1816, to the Duc de Richelieu, then Prime Minister of France, the English

Commissioners not having arrived at that time. The Duc de Richelieu took objection to the claim, on the ground that the claimant was not a British subject, inasmuch as he was the son of a German; but Sir Samuel Romilly's opinion having been taken, he pronounced the claimant to be a British subject, and the objection was withdrawn. It would be unjust to say that the claim was not made in due time, because it had not been made to a particular person when every possible endeavour had been made to comply with the requirements of the Convention. In the year 1818 a new Convention was executed, under which France paid an additional 60,000,000*f.*, and the English Government undertook to dispose of all the claims. The Commissioners upon whom the duty of investigating the claims was imposed told Baron de Bode that unless he could prove that his property was confiscated under the decree against British subjects they could not allow it. He could not prove that, because his property was confiscated as being that of an émigré. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheered that admission; but the decisions of the Courts went to show that that ought not to have excluded his claim. In Fanning's case, in Count de Wall's case, and in others, the property had been confiscated on the same ground, and yet the claim had been allowed by the Privy Council. In consequence of that intimation, however, the Baron did not complete the evidence as to the cession, and the Commissioners then made an award, deciding against him on both points. That award being founded upon a fact which had nothing to do with the matter at issue—namely, the property not having been confiscated under the decrees against British subjects, proof of this having been required as a sine quâ non by the Commissioners, was bad in law. In 1819 the Baron appealed to the Privy Council against the decision of the Commissioners, but before the case came on he received a letter from the Secretary to the Commission, stating that he must not produce any new evidence. The Privy Council heard the case so crippled, and they held that they could not over-rule the decision of the Commissioners, and that in fact there was not evidence before them which would establish the validity of the cession. He then attempted to obtain a rehearing of his case; but was told that as the decision had been confirmed by the Sovereign it was too late to reopen the matter. The next step he took was to appeal to the Court of France, whose answer was that they had already made compensation for the claim. These details were necessary to show that the Baron de Bode had not slept on his rights, as some alleged, but had urged his claims whenever opportunity offered upon the consideration of the country. The treaty was in 1815, the award was in 1822, the appeal to the Privy Council in 1823, and in 1826 the rehearing was refused. In 1828, Lord Derby, then Mr. Stanley, who had always taken a very warm interest in the case, brought forward a Motion similar to the present for a Select Committee, and in 1830 he made a further Motion to the same effect. In 1832 and 1833 the House was counted out when the subject was renewed, but in 1834, in a House of 170 Members, the Government agreed to the appointment of a Select Committee. The Committee sat until the end of that year, and had nearly agreed to their Report when the Session ended. They suggested that they should be reappointed in the next Session, but in the following year the Government refused to assent to the reappointment of the Committee, Lord Cranworth, then Solicitor General, alleging that the Motion was a Quixotic attempt to turn the House into a Court of Appeal. Several other Motions were ineffectually brought forward from time to time, but, finding that the House of Commons were indisposed to do him justice, in 1838 application was made by the Baron de Bode to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus addressed to the Lords of the Treasury. The Court, however, held that a mandamus to the Crown to command itself would not lie, and the Baron de Bode was then advised to try a petition of right. This petition came on at first before Commissioners, and, with one exception, all the facts contained in it were found by inquisition. The Crown had afterwards traversed the inquisition, and also pleaded the Statute of Limitations. The case was tried at Bar before the whole Court of Queen's Bench and a special jury. The Crown lawyers exerted all their ingenuity during a trial of four days duration, but without success; for every fact found by the inquisition was affirmed by that special jury on the trial at Bar. The matter then came before the Queen's Bench on the points of law. It had been subsequently contended in the House of Commons that the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench had been against the Baron de Bode on all points. But no lawyer would have argued thus, because it was clear that the Chief Justice had guarded himself against giving any opinion on the merits of the claim, and that the question had been decided by the Court on narrow technical grounds which had nothing to do with the merits of the claim. The case then came on appeal before the Exchequer Chamber, where the decision was given against the Baron on the ground that the surplus had been disposed of according to the strict interpretation of the 59 Geo. III., and that the Baron had, therefore, no legal claim. The House of Lords on appeal affirmed the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, but those two tribunals, like the Queen's Bench, had carefully guarded themselves from giving any opinion on the merits. The period from 1839 to 1851 had been occupied in these legal proceedings, and there was no pretence for saying the Baron during that interval had slumbered on his rights. Lord Lyndhurst had been so shocked at the hardship of the case that in 1852 he moved in the House of Lords for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject, which was granted by the Government of the Earl of Derby. Lord Brougham, Lord Truro, Lord Lyndhurst, and other Peers, were Members of the Committee, which reported every single matter both of law and fact in the Baron de Bode's favour, and expressed their opinion that the case was one of great hardship, which they recommended to the favourable consideration of their Lordships. In 1853 a Motion was made in the House of Lords with the view of acting on that Report, but it was urged that their Lordships were not the proper tribunal to act, as it was not in their province to vote the money. In 1854 Mr. Chambers, in the House of Commons, moved a Resolution affirming that the national good faith required that the just claims of the Baron de Bode should be satisfied. It was urged, however, with some reason, that the House of Commons, which held the purse strings of the nation, could not come to such a Resolution upon the Report of the Committee of another House. He now, therefore, asked the House to institute an inquiry of its own, which should satisfy its own conscience. That Motion of Mr. M. Chambers was rejected by 81 votes against 67. The Attorney General of that day said that

Lord Stowell had held the cession to have been a fraudulent one; but if hon. Members referred to the judgment of that noble Lord, he thought they would be of opinion that he had not gone that length. Lord Stowell said it appeared that the claimant had failed in proving his ownership of the property; but it was not surprising that he should have done so, because he had been stopped by the Commissioners telling him of certain requirements which he had not the means of complying with, and which were not necessary. It was a mistake to suppose that the Baron de Bode objected to the fact of other claimants having been paid. What he objected to was that his claim was left unsettled, while claims had been settled in cases in which the British Government had a right to have gone to the French Government for a settlement, and so that money bound with a trust for him had been otherwise applied. On the occasion to which he was now referring Lord Chelmsford, then Sir Frederic Thesiger, observed, that after the judicial decision of the Privy Council in the case, a mandamus would not lie; but even if that were so, it ought not to prevent the House of Commons from doing justice to the Baron de Bode. And in reference to that House, he appealed to hon. Members whom he saw entering the House at that stage of the debate to bear in mind that justice could not be done unless they heard all the arguments on one side and the other. That was the substance of the arguments used in the debate of 1854. He apologized for troubling the House at such length; but having, as he believed, an honest claim to defend, he felt it his duty to answer all the objections which had been raised on former occasions. It was said out of doors that the claim was so enormous that the House of Commons would never be got to entertain it. He did not believe that that was the view which the House would take; and, indeed, it was one which had been repudiated over and over again. He had no acquaintance with Baron de Bode but what he derived from this case, but he could see that that gentleman had shown a fair and earnest desire to have his claim investigated; but he did not believe that Baron de Bode would be so absurd as to suppose that because the claim, if the interest at 5 per cent were calculated, would amount to nearly a million of money, therefore the House would be bound to pay a million of money on the Report of the Committee.

If a Select Committee were appointed, it would be found out that there was a very large sum unappropriated according to the law as existing before the statute of 1819, which the country had had the benefit of, and which ought to be paid to satisfy the claim of Baron de Bode. The jury on the trial at Bar had found that the value of the property confiscated was upwards of £300,000. Supposing it should be established before a Committee that Baron de Bode was entitled to some money (not, indeed, a million, unless the amount were calculated in an unreasonable way), he did not think so ill of his countrymen as to suppose that they would object to the payment of the obligation, for he believed that in that case they would, on the contrary be glad, by discharging the debt, to be relieved from the burden which they must feel on their conscience so often as they heard the case of Baron de Bode mentioned. He believed that they would gladly submit to an increase of the income tax to the extent of a third of a penny, or a half-penny, in the pound, rather than remain in the belief that an honest claim upon the nation remained unsatisfied. Again apologizing to the House for the length of time he had trespassed upon their patience, he left the case in their hands, believing it to be a just claim; asking them, however, not to decide upon it themselves, but to appoint a Committee who might investigate the accuracy of the statements which he had brought forward.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to consider the allegations of the Petition of the Baron de Bode, presented to this House on the 18th day of April last, and to report to this House thereon."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his hon. and learned Friend had maintained in a speech of three hours and a quarter a case which, he said, was incontrovertible. When a case, however, admitted of controversy some time must undoubtedly be granted to those who had to meet the various topics which had been urged. He was ready to admit that the hon. and learned Member had urged the claims of the Baron de Bode with much ability, but, at the same time, his advocacy had been as deficient in modesty as it was remarkable for pertinacity. ["No, no!"] Did not the hon. Member more than once declare that all that had been said in this House against the claims of the Baron de Bode was characterized by sophistry, fallacy, and a desire to mystify the House upon the question? The Motion was first raised in the House of Commons by Mr. Stanley, now the Earl of Derby, when Lord Lyndhurst was Chancellor. It was resisted by the Government, and rejected as destitute of moral justice. It was brought forward again when there was another Government, and it was again resisted. It was brought forward again when Sir Robert Peel was Premier, and was again resisted by the advice of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, and the law advisers of the Crown, and was rejected. It was brought before the House of Commons in 1853 a second time, and rejected. It was finally brought before the House in 1854, and discussed at great length, and again rejected. Some of the ablest Members both of that and the other House of Parliament had given it as their opinion that no foundation existed for the claims; and yet the hon. Member declared that all the arguments employed against them were nothing more than a tissue of sophistry and mystification. How long were such claims as these to be open to discussion in that House? They were admitted to have no foundation in law, and on every appeal to Parliament a decision had been given against them. What was to be the limit in urging such claims? Was the case of the Baron de Bode to be brought forward whenever any young lawyer who had a seat in that House chose to do so? That seemed to have been the case from time to time, and he was ready to admit that he himself had been infected with erroneous impressions on the subject. He was led in 1854 to consider the question more closely, and to devote his time and attention to it; and it was in consequence of the close examination he had thus made that he was now able to state the reasons why he could not advise the Government and the House to recognize the claims urged upon them. He did so under a feeling of great responsibility. The House had a right to require from a person holding the situation he did a bond fide opinion, carefully and conscientiously formed; and he was the more inclined to do so because he felt much compassion for the present claimant, who had been brought up in the strong belief which his father entertained, that he had a rightful claim to the money now demanded. That belief was delusive, but it had been created by the opinions of the lawyers to whom the case had been entrusted. He would put before the House the leading features of the case. His hon. and learned Friend said that the late Baron de Bode was a British subject; but a fallacy lay at the bottom of that statement. It was true that in the British dominions he was a British subject, but it was equally true that as between France and this country he was not a British subject. It was a common saying, referable, probably, to the insularity of our lawyers, that a man was a British subject because he was born in England. This was not necessarily the case. Suppose an Englishman and his wife were on a visit to Paris, and that during their stay there a son was born who was brought over to England a month or two afterwards, and there brought up and educated with English tastes, ideas, and feelings, could that child be called a French subject? Would he not in after life, whenever he had occasion to do so, put forth his claim to be a British subject? The late Baron de Bode, the father of the present claimant, had, no doubt, been born in England during a short visit paid by his father and mother to England, but he had been very soon after his birth taken back to France; he had been educated in that country, and must, therefore, be regarded as having been for every political and legal purpose a French subject. That was the point which constituted the real foundation of the whole case, which must be determined in accordance, not with the principles of English, but rather of international law. Taken in that point of view, the mere accident of birth was wholly immaterial; the fact that a person was a citizen of a particular country, and performed there all the duties incidental to citizenship, stamped him with the character of being a subject of that State. When the French Revolution had broken out the French Government de facto had a clear right to exercise control over those who were actually the subjects of France; while, upon the other hand, there were resident in that country a number of persons who were indisputably British subjects, and who, as such, had a right to claim protection from the British Crown, to which they preserved their allegiance. The language of the treaty to which reference had been made clearly pointed to persons so situated, the words—"His Britannic Majesty's subjects"—that was to say, persons who owed allegiance to the Crown of England—being those which were employed. Now, it was clear that neither Baron Charles de Bode, the grandfather of the present claimant, nor the late Baron, was in the position of a person who came within the scope of the treaty as a person recognized as owing allegiance to the Crown of this country. The Commissioners found that the grandfather of the present claimant was one of the French noblesse, residing in Lower Alsace, where he had purchased a large estate, and was a great territorial proprietor. His son, the father of the present claimant, was included in the entail, and, therefore, it was to his interest to consider himself a French subject. Further, it was found that he was in the French service, and a knight of the Order of St. Louis, and in every respect a subject of France. Baron Charles, moreover, when the troubles of 1791 began, adhered to the dynasty of the King of France, and was in every sense a Royalist; but, having some property to preserve he hit upon the following device to effect his object:—His son, who, at that time, was a boy of fourteen years of age, happened accidentally to have been born in England—accidentally, inasmuch as the mother had not come over here with the view that her offspring should be a British subject—and it was hoped that that fact would entitle him here, although he had been brought up and educated in France, to call himself an Englishman. That being so the father had transferred his property to the son, in order that it might be protected against the lawful authority which the French Government de facto might exercise in its regard. The transfer was, however, in reality a merely colourable and delusive act; and the French Government, seeing through the device, confiscated the property as being the property of the father. He might further observe that, whether they confiscated it as the property of the father or of the son they had a right to do so. The act might have been arbitrary and unjust, but it was a legal act. It was the act of a Government existing de facto. First, the status of the father and of the son at the time of the confiscation was confessedly that of subjects of France. Secondly, the property confiscated was professedly French property, held by a French title, possessed by a French citizen, and the ownership of which placed the individual in a particular rank in France—namely, in that of one of the noblesse of the country. What, then, was the aim for which the property was confiscated? It was an act done by a French subject which France had made an offence. They both, father and son, left their country, abandoned their property, and joined the Austrian army, which was then on the point of invading France. The result was that there was a law from which a subject of France could not appeal, which was only binding on a French subject in respect of a crime which could only be committed by a French subject. The law was, as he had said, one from which the subjects of France could not appeal, and no person of common sense could have imagined, if he had not been a lawyer, that the case of Baron de Bode could be brought under our treaty with France. The English Government could never have stipulated to protect the property of French citizens, nor could they have maintained a right to compensation from the French Government for the loss of the property of French subjects. No part of the property of the Baron de Bode could be said, in the words of the treaty, to have been “unduly confiscated.” It was confiscated on the authority of the Government of the country of which the owner was a subject, and the treaty, the conventions, and the Act of Parliament all proceeded upon the principle that the property for which the French Government was to give us compensation should be British property, held by persons who were at the time of the forfeiture subjects of the British Crown, and that the property so taken should be considered as unduly or illegally taken by the French Government. He was anxious to meet the merits, honesty, and truth of the case. The truth lay in this—what was meant in the treaty by the words “subjects of His Britannic Majesty?” He contended with great submission, but with as much confidence as his hon. and learned Friend had assumed, that those words meant persons who at the time of the forfeiture were de facto subjects of England, and were recognized in that character. It was impossible that a boy could be regarded as a British subject who, although born in England, was carried back by his parents, who were French, to France, who was brought up as a Frenchman, who held the status of a Frenchman, who was intended to be a Frenchman, and who never owed, or intended to owe at any future time, any allegiance to the British Crown. When a person in the position of Baron de Bode, never meaning to be a British subject, availed himself of an accidental title to call himself in England a British subject, and preferred a claim in that capacity, he did one of two things—he either imposed upon the French Government by assuming a denomination to which he was not entitled, or he tried wrongfully to appropriate to himself a share in monies dedicated for the benefit of British subjects by putting on for the purpose the character of a British subject which he did not hold at the time of the forfeiture, and which but for a pecuniary object he never for a moment would have dreamt of assuming. What was the conduct of father and son when driven from France by the Revolutionary Government? They first joined the ranks of the Austrian army as French Royalists, and the son, who was never able to speak a word of English, subsequently transferred himself to the Russian service, in which he was employed at the time of the treaty. Until the money was obtained from the Government he never, even in thought, contemplated connecting himself in any way with England, or placing himself in the position of a British subject. Again, was it possible that the property could have been held by anybody who was not a French subject? The owner of that property must have acted an important part in the political affairs of France, and could not have so acted except as a French subject. If the House came to the conclusion that these persons were French subjects, that the property was French property, that the position of the Baron and his son was one in which they owed allegiance de facto to the French Government, and violated that allegiance by joining the ranks of the Austrian army—then the claim must fall to the ground, for then the property had not been “unduly confiscated.”

But what was the House now asked to do? It was a mere mockery to say that there was any need for further investigation. There had been investigations for more than forty years, and not a single fact remained to be ascertained. He had hitherto rested his arguments on facts collected by the zealous friends of the Baron. But there was another point to be considered. When money of this kind was stipulated for by one Government and paid by another the only title to the money was by the act of the party requiring the payment. Now the conditions of these claims were defined by the Act of 1819, by which alone the right to participate in this fund could be determined, and they knew that upon this ground the Baron de Bode had not the particle of a claim. Lord Lyndhurst said that under the treaty he could have no title to appear in a court of justice as a claimant, and they would be placed in a difficult position if they recognized a title which would not hold in a court of justice. They could not take a single step for admitting the claim unless they were prepared to repeal the Act of 1819; and could they repeal that Act for the benefit of this claimant alone? By doing so they would be opening the door to every description of claim, however extraordinary and unascertainable, being regulated by no principle of law. So that the Baron de Bode would be just as far as ever from attaining the object of his desire, for he would have to contend with a vast number of other claimants rising up on every side, and it would be utterly impossible to lay down any rule by which the relative merits of those different new claimants should hereafter be determined. They would be establishing a precedent of a most mischievous character if, having established a rule in 1819 and adhered to it for forty-two years, they were now to abrogate that rule altogether, and retrace their steps in the distribution of this property. It might probably be supposed by many hon. Gentlemen, as indeed it was by himself till he read these voluminous papers, that the French Government had recognized the claims of the Baron de Bode, and handed over a sum of money especially on account of those claims. The argument used had been to this effect:—The Baron de Bode was one of the admitted claimants—a certain sum of money was handed over to the British Government—all the other claimants had been satisfied; of necessity, therefore, what remained belonged to him. The Baron de Bode made that allegation in his petition of right. But the representation was negatived by the jury, and found to be contrary to truth and to fact. They found that the French Government never did recognize the claim at all, and never paid over any money specifically on account of this claim. He believed there was scarcely a Gentleman who had been disposed to regard the Baron de Bode's claims with favour who would not find that his disposition to do so was founded on the belief or the suspicion that a sum of money had been handed over to the British Government to answer those claims, and that the British Government had repudiated those claims, and put the money into their own pockets. There had accordingly been unblushing imputations of conduct contrary to good faith, and inconsistent with the honour of the country. He did not wish to use unkind expressions with reference to the Baron de Bode, but he must say the only thing inconsistent with good faith and honour was his putting on for the purpose of this claim the status and garment of a British subject, which he never intended to assume, never dreamt of claiming or vindicating for himself until a pecuniary interest arose. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to the advocacy by Lord Lyndhurst of these claims. That venerable Lord was not more distinguished by his learning than by his benevolence; but to the course which he had taken in the matter when out of office must be opposed the course that he had taken upon it when Lord Chancellor. In 1828, when the law officers of the Crown resisted that claim so strenuously, they must have acted under the authority of that noble Lord. It was resisted again in 1835 under the same authority, as also in 1843, when the petition of right was traversed, and those pleas put in to which it was not necessary further to allude. It was stated that a new fact was discovered in 1847 through a letter of M. Guizot, stating that the Duc de Richelieu had received the claim on the part of the petitioner. Why, then, was not that fact mentioned in the proceedings before the House of Lords in 1852, five years after the alleged discovery? It was known that after the Treaty of 1815, and, finally, when the allied armies were evacuating France, the French Government gave an additional sum of money to meet all such claims, and handed over to the British Government the right and duty of investigating them, as well as of laying down the rules for determining their validity. That led to the Act of Parliament of 1819, and, consequently, whether the French Government received that particular claim or not henceforth became wholly immaterial. The hon. and learned Gentleman had, with a good deal of confidence, asserted that it had been established by judicial decision that that treaty was intended to apply to persons in the position of the Baron de Bode and his son at the time it was concluded. He maintained, on the contrary, that the Privy Council had on that point repeatedly recognized principles in entire conformity with those which he was himself now stating. In one case the learned Lords declared that the treaty between France and England meant to provide an indemnity to all British subjects for losses occasioned by the immediate acts of the French Government; that, although formally and literally by the law of Great Britain the party was a British subject, yet the question was whether he was a British subject within the meaning of the treaty; that he might be a British and also a French subject; and that if he was a French subject, then no act done towards him by the Government of France could be held illegal within the intent of the treaty, and that neither the law of nations nor any treaty bound that Government to deal with its own subjects otherwise than as it thought fit. Therefore when it was said that the Baron de Bode was a British subject that was only half the truth. The question was whether he had not the character of a French subject superadded to his character as an English subject? Then in which of those characters was his property confiscated? Undoubtedly, in that of a French subject? The decision of the the jury and the Court of Queen's Bench was that the claimant, even upon his own showing, had adduced no proof that his property was unduly confiscated. He would not trouble the House with any further remarks. He had met the case as if it had been unaffected by any judicial decision, unprejudiced by any lapse of time, and as if it had been submitted to their deliberation that night for the first time; and, on the grounds which he had stated, he must oppose the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion.

Mr. DENMAN said, that, as no other hon. Member appeared to be desirous of addressing the House on that subject, he wished to observe that all the arguments which the Attorney General had just urged had been anticipated and demolished in his opening speech. The subject was one of all others which demanded deliberate inquiry by a proper tribunal, and he did not ask the House now to decide the case. He desired merely that a deliberate tribunal, which would hear all the arguments on one side and the other, should be appointed to investigate the case. He hoped that those hon. Gentlemen who had not heard the arguments he addressed to the House would abstain from voting, and that they would not be led away by the arguments of the Attorney General, which he confidently believed he could completely answer by merely repeating what he had already said that night, when the House was not so full as now.

Mr. MALINS said, he had with pleasure listened attentively to the three hours' speech of his hon. and learned Friend, and he commiserated his position in having addressed his arguments to some thirty Members, while the decision would rest with 150. He should have risen earlier, but was physically exhausted through having gone without his dinner till ten o'clock. The hon. and learned Attorney General had very dexterously taken advantage of the change of audience, and argued that Baron de Bode was not a British subject; but in a Report of a most distinguished Committee of the House of Lords, of which Lord Lyndhurst, the late Lord Truro, and Lord Brougham were members, it was declared that the son Clement (who was the original claimant) was a British subject within the meaning of the treaty and Convention, and was entitled in that character to claim compensation for the confiscation of his property. It was not fair that the House, which had not heard the argument, should ride off on the proposition of the Attorney General that the Baron was not a British subject. All that was asked for was an inquiry before a Select Committee, in order to ascertain whether his claim was just or not. The Government had received the money, and ought to have paid it over long ago; and he was sure that, if a just claim were shown to exist, the nation would not wish that injustice should be done, simply because the amount was large, and it might be inconvenient to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to meet it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Remembering the privations which the hon. and learned Member has endured, and the impatience shown by the House, I shall not detain it beyond a very minutes. I cannot at all concur in the view which the hon. and learned Member has taken. He rests himself entirely on the fact that a Committee of the other House has given an opinion in favour of this claim; but, as Members of the House of Commons, we are not bound by an opinion of the other House. It is said that very few Members have heard the arguments of my hon. Colleague (Mr. Denman), and that the decision is to be taken on the statement of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General; but the speech of my hon. Colleague, and the reply of the Attorney-General are elements upon which the House can come to a decision. The simple question is whether the Baron de Bode is a British subject or not; and nothing can be clearer than the argument and conclusion of the Attorney General, that it is a mere quibble—if I must use the word—to represent him as being a British subject. His father was not British, his family was not British, the property was not British. He did not reside in England, he was established in France as a Frenchman, he emigrated as a Frenchman, he took arms with the Austrian army as a Frenchman, and it was as a French subject that the penalties of confiscation were imposed on him for quitting his native country and breaking his allegiance to the French Government of the time. It is not the case of a man belonging to a British family with a British name, whose parents were born in England, but who were for the moment domiciled in France. In the cases of such persons which have been cited their property was confiscated, not because they were considered French subjects in rebellion, but because they were alien enemies belonging to a country which was at war with France. That was not the case with Baron de Bode. With all deference to the hon. and learned Member there does not appear to me to be a shadow of a ground on which you can represent Baron de Bode as a British subject, or justify his claim to this immense sum of money. It is a very plausible thing to say, "Let us have a Committee of Inquiry," but there seems to me nothing for a Committee to inquire into. This House, in the arguments which have been addressed to it, has abundant elements to enable it to come to a decision. No one can say that any ground has been shown for taking a step which can have no meaning, unless it be a foundation for an application to this House for a large sum of money for compensating a Frenchman for the confiscation of French property by the act of the French Government, on French grounds alone. Then, look at what has been stated showing the fraud by which this transaction was originally tainted. The father, who was not an Englishman, made over his property to his son, then a minor, for the mere purpose of evading the confiscation which he saw was likely to come upon him. The House knew the whole question upon which they had to decide, and must foresee the consequences which might result from affirming the Motion.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that he would not detain the House more than a few minutes while he replied to the arguments adduced by the noble Lord in opposition to the claim. The case really lay in a nutshell, and the opposition to the claim rested on three grounds—1st., that the Baron de Bode was not a natural born British subject within the meaning of the treaty; 2nd., that the confiscation was not within the meaning of the treaty; and 3rd., that the property was fraudulently made over by the father to the son for the purpose of making a claim as a British subject. As to the question of nationality, the late Sir Samuel Romilly, the great ornament of the party opposite, said—

“I think it is clear that the Baron de Bode is a natural-born subject of Great Britain, and entitled to the same rights and privileges as any other natural-born subject, and that he has not, and cannot by any act which he can do, throw off his allegiance to the King of Great Britain, because nemo potest exuere patriam. The condition and rights of the Baron de Bode are exactly the same as those of a natural-born subject, the son of an English father and mother.”

He disputed the authority of the Attorney General if he denied that a natural-born subject of a country was, according to international law, the subject of that country all the world over. There was no distinction between nationality according to municipal and international law, and if the Baron de Bode was a British subject according to the law of England he was a British subject within the meaning of the treaty. As to the confiscation, Lord Lyndhurst had said, “Most of the instances in which compensation had been awarded are cases in which the confiscation has been solely on account of emigration.” He was sorry that the noble Lord had used the word “fraudulently,” because it appeared to throw a slur on the personal honour of a gentleman who was entitled to every respect. The Court of Chancery dealt rather severely with cases in which fraud was charged and not proved, and he asked the House to consider the case favourably, because fraud had been charged and was certainly not proved. As to the conveyance, the son had a vested estate in the lifetime of his father, and the conveyance of the father, whether good or not, could make no difference. The noble Lord had said that they need not follow the decision of a Committee of the House of Lords. That was a topic which was sure to elicit a cheer from those hon. Members who liked to have a fling at the House of Lords. But the House was bound to give the greatest weight to the decision of a Committee of the House of Lords, composed of those who held high judicial offices, on a question of law like this; and such a Committee had pronounced in favour of the

Baron de Bode. Under such circumstances he was sure the House would not allow the weight of the Government to tell against truth and justice.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he only rose for the purpose of pointing out the double inconvenience in which they were involved. It was unfortunate, after the Mover of the Motion had replied to the only speech that had been made in opposition to it, that hon. Gentlemen friendly to the Motion should, contrary to usage, address the House. It was contrary to usage in the second place, that a Member—as the hon. Member for Dundalk had done—should come down to answer a speech which he had not heard, and, at a late hour, after having been, no doubt, more agreeably engaged elsewhere, make a solemn appeal in the name of justice. The hon. and learned Member said that the Baron de Bode was a British subject. Now that was never denied. The Baron was a British subject for certain purposes, but he was not a British subject as between England and France, and the whole question turned upon the latter point. That view was supported by the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Drummond, when it was stated that he might be a subject both of Britain and France, and that if he were the latter, no act done towards him by the Government of France could be deemed illegal within the meaning of the treaty. He was informed on good authority that the Baron de Bode was not entitled to a reversion of the estate, and that the sole representative of the property in it was his father. The Privy Council, presided over by Lord Stowell, had heard the claims of the Baron de Bode, and decided against it. Lord Stowell, in giving judgment, said, that after full consideration it appeared that the complaint had completely failed in regard to the ownership of the property, that it had been a contrivance originating in the mind of the father to elude the French Government, which had proved ineffectual, and that, therefore, although it might be hard for the unfortunate nobleman, the Lords were bound to confirm the award of the Commissioners. His hon. and learned Friend had brought down upon the House the authority of Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham. But the authority of such men as Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham was greater in their capacity as the responsible Ministers of the Government than as private individuals; and for the last thirty years the law officers of the Crown had to a man refused to entertain the claim now before the House. They were asked to appoint a Committee. It would be cruel to the gentleman himself to appoint a Committee, to keep alive a claim of that description, and cause him to transmit to his children that which he had unfortunately received from his father as an inheritance, the prosecution of a claim of the kind. He wanted, moreover, to know how the Report of a Select Committee could justify an Executive Government in acting against the opinion of all the law advisers of the Crown for the last thirty years? Again, if a committee reported in favour of his claim, it would lead to infinite complications, and would be tantamount to an invitation to all the world who had similar claims to have them re-tried. On these grounds he trusted that the House would not assent to the Motion.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was true that he held in his hands the balance of a sum of money paid by the French Indemnity Fund, which was applicable to the satisfaction of the claim of the Baron de Bode?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was not true.

COUNTY VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. MURE objected to the Bill that it required claimants for the suffrage to take the initiative instead of adopting the system now adopted in the boroughs which gave universal satisfaction, where a public officer made up the list of claimants leaving it to any person whose name was omitted to send in his claim. According to this Bill the applicant must in every case send in his own claim, and the assessor's roll was only to be made up after the parties had sent in their claims. He begged to move that it be an Instruction to the Committee on the County Voters (Scotland) Bill to make the rules and regulations contained therein conformable with those of the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 58, in so far as they are applicable to counties.

MR. SPEAKER said, it would be competent to the Committee to do that which the hon. and learned Gentleman desired to do without an Instruction, and that being so it was contrary to rule that any formal Instruction should be moved. Besides this, the Resolution should have been moved before the Motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, because it was now an Amendment upon the Motion, and would thus, if successful, supersede the very Committee which it was the purpose of the hon. and learned Gentleman to instruct.

MR. BLACKBURN thought they ought not to take the Committee on this Bill that day. The Bill as it stood was very imperfect, and many of its provisions would require to be materially altered. There was a separate paper before the House, which was not printed with the Votes, which contained sixty Amendments to be proposed in Committee by the right hon. Gentleman himself who had charge of this Bill (Sir Edward Colebrooke). He thought it would be more convenient to the House if the hon. Gentleman would agree to commit the Bill pro forma, to have it reprinted with the Amendments he intended to move, and then to take the Committee on the Bill on another day. With that view he moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on that day week.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon Wednesday next, resolve itself into the said Committee,'"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he could not help thinking that the most convenient course to take would be to allow the House to go into Committee on the Bill. Hon. Members on both sides of the House were generally agreed as to the principle of the measure. Most of the Amendments which he had to move referred chiefly to matters of detail, and were simply intended for carrying out the suggestions that had been made to him for assimilating the county with the borough registration. He was willing to leave the case in the hands of the House. His object was to conciliate, and if the House thought it better only to go into Committee pro forma he should be glad to meet their wishes.

MR. ROEBUCK characterized the Bill as an alteration of the Constitution of the country, and said that the Lord Advocate ought to make that alteration on his own responsibility, if it were to be made at all. Things of this kind were becoming rather frequent in the present day on the part of private Members; but it was a proceeding which the House ought not to permit. Wednesday was rapidly becoming the most pestilent day of the week. From day to day, and almost from hour to hour, the House was making alterations in the Constitution of this country. A sort of higgledy-piggledy mode of doing business was being introduced by private Members interfering in matters which properly belonged to the Government, and the House should set its face against such proceedings. What were they to say to a Bill like the present, to which its own promoter had appended sixty Amendments before the Bill had got into Committee? It was plain that its Mover was not fit to make such a law, and that it was the business of the Lord Advocate to do so.

THE LORD ADVOCATE was sure the representatives of Scotland would be very glad if the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) would give them the benefit of his assistance. But he must say that he did not think the views expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman were sound, or in accordance with the usages of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that no alterations of the Constitution of the country should be proposed except by the Government. He (the Lord Advocate) entirely denied that that was sound. It was the privilege of every hon. Member to make proposals for any alterations he pleased; and he thought his hon. Friend (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was more particularly entitled to bring this proposition forward, from the fact that he had done so some years before. The Bill was of great importance, and would effect a very useful reform, and he saw no reason why it should not be proceeded with now when they had the whole day before them. As for the number of Amendments they were mostly simply changing September to August in the various clauses, and they could easily be taken as the clauses were put.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that a measure of this kind ought to be brought in by Government. He thought the proposal to assimilate the registration of counties to that of boroughs was a great change, and of very questionable advantage. He objected to the compelling persons to be on the register. There were frequently parties who did not wish to be mixed up with party politics, and did not wish to be subjected to the annoyance of being canvassed and solicited for their votes at elections. He should support the proposal to adjourn the question for a week.

MR. DUNLOP hoped that the measure would have general support. He reminded the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson) that, by Clause 13 of the Bill, any person might have his name taken off the register by sending a written note to the assessor. The greater number of the Amendments were merely formal; still he would not object to a postponement, if it were understood that every assistance should be given to pass the Bill.

MR. LOCKE said, it was within his recollection that several important measures proposing alterations of the Constitution had been brought in by independent Members. He might refer to the Bill for the admission of the Jews, the Bill which did away with the property qualification, and the Bill for the Ballot. Those were very great and important changes, and yet they were introduced by private Members. He really thought the recommendation of the Lord Advocate should be adopted, because a vast number of the proposed alterations were of a very trifling description.

MR. MURE allowed that many of the Amendments were very great improvements, but it would be much more convenient to discuss the Bill with these Amendments printed in it. That course would have to be adopted sooner or later, and it would be more expeditious to do it at once.

After some observation from Mr. CAIRD, Major CUMMING BRUCE, and Mr. LESLIE,

MR. BLACKBURN said, he would withdraw his proposition for adjournment of the debate for a week.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved the adjournment of the debate till Friday, with the understanding that the House should go into Committee on the Bill pro forma.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Friday.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATH

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LOCKE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that its object was to allow persons who might have a scruple as to taking an Oath, with the leave of the Judge, to make an Affirmation instead. That was the whole of the Bill; and it was confined to criminal cases, because the law in civil cases was precisely the same as he wished to make it in criminal. By the Common Law Procedure Act, 17 & 18 Vict., if any person was unwilling from alleged conscientious motives to take an oath, the Judge, if satisfied of the sincerity of such declaration, might permit him to make an affirmation. That alteration of the law was made after the greatest consideration on the part of the framers of the Bill, and with the sanction of the law officers of the Crown, and of all the Judges of the land. The form of affirmation was transferred from the Common Law Procedure Act to the present Bill, and was as follows:—

"I, A. B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare that the taking of any oath is, according to my religious belief, unlawful; and I do solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare, &c."

By the present state of the law a Quaker, Moravian, or Separatist, was allowed to make an affirmation, both in civil and criminal cases; but as there were many persons not belonging to those denominations, who, on religious grounds, entertained objections to the taking of oaths, he thought it was only right that the same relief should be extended to them. The Bill contained three clauses. The first he had explained, the second made the punishment for making a false affirmation the same as for taking a false oath, and the third simply stated when the Bill was to come into operation. The Bill was entirely different in its object and character from that which had been introduced in the course of the Session by the hon.

Member for Tavistock, and he hoped the House would consent to read it a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, as the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. McMahon), who had given notice of an Amendment to reject the Bill, and as the law advisers of the Crown and the Home Secretary were not present, he thought they were hardly in a condition to discuss the Bill at present, and he, therefore, moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. CONINGHAM said, he understood that the law officers of the Crown had been consulted and were favourable to the Bill, and he, therefore, regretted the right hon. Gentleman should oppose it.

MR. LOCKE said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) had read the Bill and had no objection to it himself, but was only waiting to see if any one else had. He had, in point of fact, already introduced this Bill in the early part of the Session, and read it a second time, with the title of the "Common Law Procedure Act (1854) Extension." The Solicitor General had approved of the principle of that Bill but had objected to the form in which it was drawn, namely, by way of recital instead of direct enactment. He (Mr. Locke) had redrawn the Bill to meet that objection and submitted it to the Solicitor General for his approval before it was printed. He thought it very hard that he should be compelled to postpone the Bill after all the trouble he had been at for the last six weeks in getting a day to bring it forward.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the object of this Bill was to assimilate the law with regard to the affirmation of witnesses in criminal proceedings with that now existing with regard to civil proceedings. He believed that the Quakers and Moravians had the benefit of a special enactment, allowing them to make an affirmation instead of an oath; but persons who did not come under those denominations, though they might have a conscientious objection to taking an oath, were obliged to take it, or their evidence was rejected. He did not think that any great danger was likely to arise from extending the law to criminal proceedings, as regarded that very limited class of persons. He had had some communication with the Solicitor General, and the remark he made was that the law had hitherto shown great jealousy as to substituting affirmations for oaths in criminal cases; but he did not understand him to say that he entertained any decided objection to this Bill, though he expressed some doubts as to its policy. Under these circumstances perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might be inclined to withdraw his Amendment, and allow the Bill to be read a second time, on the understanding that the Solicitor General would be present when the Order was taken that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. SPOONER said, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Estcourt) did not object to the Bill, nor did he; but he objected to the Bill being taken in the absence of the law advisers of the Crown and of the Home Secretary, who at that time was not in the House.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he intended to divide the House against the second reading of the Bill. The effect of this Bill and that of the hon. Member for Tavistock was the same, and both would take from the proceedings in our Courts the sanction of religion.

Mr. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. HENNESSY thereupon moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill merely extended to criminal cases the principle already followed in civil actions. It could not, therefore, be said to ignore the religious sanction of an oath.

Mr. ROEBUCK could not see why, if exceptions were made in favour of the conscientious scruples of persons wearing peculiar garments, such as the Quakers, others who did not belong to distinctive denominations, but equally objected to take an oath, should not be as unfettered in their action.

Mr. LONGFIELD said, there was a great difference between relaxing a rule in favour of a body of persons belonging to well-known and defined sects, one of whose fixed principles it was not to take an oath, and in favour of any person whatever who might choose to say, perhaps for the first time, that he had an objection to swear to the truth of his statements. It appeared to him perfectly reasonable to establish a distinction in that case between criminal and civil proceedings, for the life of a human being was a matter of far more importance than any mere question of property. The criminal law of the country was in general well administered, but there were not as many opportunities of correcting mistakes as in civil proceedings, and it was consequently most desirable that any safeguard at present existing should not be removed.

The House divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 31: Majority 34.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>d</sup>, and committed for Wednesday next.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 3 to 6 were agreed to.

Clause 7 struck out.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Bond may be substituted for Deposit),

COLONEL DUNNE moved to leave out the words "Order in Council," and insert "presentment." He strongly objected to the system of centralization proposed by this measure.

Mr. BUTT said, that his hon. and gallant Friend's proposition would involve a recasting of the whole scheme of the Bill. He appealed to his hon. and gallant Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

Clause struck out.

Clause 10 agreed to.

Mr. BEAMISH moved the following proviso:—

"Provided always that it shall not be competent to make application for a tramway or tramways under the provisions of this or the said recited Act, to unite places between which a railway or railways directly connecting the same, shall have been constructed under the authority of Parliament, or between which statutory powers for the same purpose shall have been granted, and be in force."

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY objected to the proviso. It would give an unfair monopoly to railways, and would impose an undue restriction on the construction of tramways. The proviso amounted to a proposition to refer the legislation in regard to tramways to persons who were interested in maintaining railways and suppressing tramways.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the proviso was to be found, with a slight alteration, in the Act of last year. The main object of these tramways was to connect railway stations, and they were confined to horse-power. The proviso was not thought of at first; but afterwards an appeal was made by the railway interest to the promoters of the Bill, pointing out that it might possibly be in the power of the constructors of tramways to unite places by these means to the injury of the railway interest, without having recourse to an Act of Parliament. The present proviso, if he understood right, was intended only as a slight extension and explanation of the clause to the same effect which was passed last Session.

LORD NAAS said, he had not been aware until that moment that a clause resembling the one then under the consideration of the Committee had been passed last Session. He could not approve of the clause in the former Bill, and he was still more strongly opposed to the present clause, which would be one of a still more restrictive character.

Proviso, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUTT then moved the insertion of a clause, giving any person entitled to appear on the inquiry before the grand jury, in the event of their approval of the undertaking, the right to traverse that approval.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee (Supply) read;

Motion made and Question proposed,

THE GALWAY CONTRACT—CONDUCT OF THE IRISH MEMBERS.

COLONEL FRENCH: Sir, I am sorry to observe that such high authorities as The Times newspaper and a noble Lord who has filled the highest legal office in this country, are both of opinion that further explanation is required to vindicate the honour and gentlemanly feeling of the representatives of Ireland on a recent occasion. When the charge in question was made by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I felt it incumbent on me, as early as possible, to declare that it was totally destitute of foundation. The statement of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary was that, at a moment when an important Motion was pending in this House, the Irish Members had sought an interview with my noble Friend at the head of the Government, with the view—which they must have been madmen to entertain—of intimidating him. When I gave a denial to that statement, the noble Viscount took upon himself to make a reply, which was certainly very amusing, but by no means satisfactory to the honour of those Gentlemen whose conduct had been impugned. My noble Friend, however, admitted that the Rev. Mr. Daly had never asserted to him that he was authorized to request an interview, or to speak in any manner on the part of the representatives of Ireland; and, further, that he himself did not believe Mr. Daly to have received any authority from the Irish Members to make any communication.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No; I did not express any belief either one way or the other.

COLONEL FRENCH: I understood my noble Friend to state that Mr. Daly told him he had no authority to speak for the Irish Members. Notwithstanding that reply, I suppose we must infer from the remark which my noble Friend has just made that he had a suspicion that the Irish Members had given Mr. Daly authority for what he said. I have stated positively, on my honour, that every Irish Member I was able to see declared the charge to be utterly groundless; and it is not very complimentary to us that my noble Friend should still seem to harbour a suspicion that it was our desire to have had an interview with him on the subject. I put it to the House whether my noble Friend—unless he placed implicit belief in the statement, which I do not think he will venture to assert—was justified in commissioning my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary to make a charge implicating the honour and gentlemanly character of a certain portion of the Irish Members. I should be sorry to say that it was for the purpose of influencing votes on another question that my noble Friend desired that charge to be made. It is perfectly certain that it materially influenced the decision of a number of Members, especially on the Opposition side of the House, who, with the independent spirit of English gentlemen, would not in any way assist an attempt to coerce the Prime Minister by intimidation. Under these circumstances sixteen Members, who, had they voted, would have been more than sufficient to turn the division against the Government, and who were opposed to the repeal of the paper duty, left the House. If we had retorted upon the noble Lord the rumours which are going about that communications have passed between the Government and a number of Scottish and English Members who represent certain steamship interests, we should, to a certainty, have received from the noble Viscount not only an indignant repudiation of any such negotiations, but a severe censure for bringing forward a charge affecting the honour of the Government. And let me tell my noble Friend that the honour of the Irish Members is as dear to them as that of the Government can be to himself and his colleagues. On the part of the Irish Members I again declare that there is not the shadow of a foundation for the statement that they desired an interview with the noble Viscount on this question. I believe, from the communications I have had with them, that no one could so far forget his own character and position as to ask for an interview with my noble Friend under such circumstances. Indeed, such, I believe, is the opinion we all entertain of the noble Lord that we could not anticipate from his independent spirit anything but a refusal to such a request. We certainly never even dreamed of asking him to do anything of the sort. Yet we see in some of the public journals a daily renewal of the accusation, and an assertion that it has been proved to the satisfaction of a great majority of the public. In "another place," also, it has been asserted that we have yet to clear ourselves from the charge. The Rev. Mr. Daly has, in the most distinct manner, both publicly and privately, denied that he pretended to the noble Viscount to have any authority from the Irish Members; and that the noble Lord must be much mistaken in his impression in that respect.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am sure that every one will do justice to the motives and feelings which have induced my hon. and gallant Friend to make the statement he has just made; which, indeed, I think was rendered unnecessary by the disclaimer of my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Esmonde), who on a former evening declared, on behalf of the Irish Members, that they gave no authority to Mr. Daly to submit to me any proposal or suggestion on their behalf. I am sure that every one will accept in the most unreserved manner the statements of my hon. and gallant Friend, and of my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford; but in regard to what passed in the interview between Mr. Daly and myself, I abide entirely by what I said on a former evening. My noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs expressed the inference which he drew from the communication in writing which I made to him almost immediately after the interview with Mr. Daly had taken place; and I am bound to say that a similar impression was produced upon my mind at the time—because when Mr. Daly told me that the Irish Members should take some action in the matter, and that it was important they should know on Monday morning what was the decision of the Government in reference to the Galway Packet contract, in order that they might determine what course they were to take in the evening, I had no reason to suppose that he was not authorized to represent those on whose behalf he spoke. It is now quite clear he was not so authorized, and that with that zeal which has distinguished him upon other occasions he constituted himself as an authority for those for whom he was in no way empowered to appear. As to any further attempt to exculpate the Irish Members I believe that it is wholly unnecessary after the statement of my hon. and gallant Friend. I am sure that every Member of the House will unhesitatingly accept the assertion of my hon. and gallant Friend; and, therefore, whatever blame may arise from any misunderstanding upon this subject must rest entirely with Mr. Daly, who, it seems, in his zeal for a cause in which it is only natural that he should be very zealous, gave me to understand that which, in point of fact, he was not authorized to convey. When I stated a few minutes since that I had no belief one way or the other, I was not in any way referring to my present conviction. I was merely acting my hon. and gallant Friend right as to what I believed at the moment when Mr. Daly had been in communication with me; and, as far as I had any belief at all at that time, I inferred that he was authorized to speak in the name of the Irish

Members; but I now find that I have no ground for drawing any such conclusion after the statement which has just been made by my hon. and gallant Friend.

LORD NAAS said, he thought the statement now made by the noble Lord must be perfectly satisfactory to all the Gentlemen who are specially interested in the question, and whose conduct had been impugned. He must, however, express his regret that an explanation such as had been now given was not made earlier; and that at the interview between the noble Lord and Mr. Daly it did not occur to the noble Lord to ask the rev. gentleman on whose authority he had come, and whether he had any commission from any Member of this House to make a communication on the subject? He (Lord Naas) thought that would have been a very natural question for the noble Lord to put to a gentleman coming upon so important a mission, and it would naturally have tended to prevent those unpleasant remarks which had been made in that and in the other House of Parliament, as well as in the public press. He could not help further stating that he believed the impression which had prevailed upon that subject had materially affected a recent important division, and that many Members had been influenced upon that occasion by the connection which they supposed to exist between the Galway contract and the particular question at issue. But after the declaration of the noble Lord that matter might be taken to be wholly at an end. He regretted that so much undue prominence had been given to it, and that language had been used by very eminent individuals tending to corroborate the views which had been expressed in the public press. Without wishing to anticipate the discussion which must take place in reference to the Galway contract, he wished to take that opportunity of giving a very decided contradiction to some statements he found published that morning in one of the leading journals. Those statements reflected to a very considerable extent on his personal character, and on the character of many Members of that and of the other House of Parliament who were his colleagues when that transaction took place. It was stated that the Galway contract had been given because a general election was at the time impending. That statement had been made and over again, and had over and over again been refuted. A Select Committee had inquired into the whole of that subject; the doors of that Committee were open for many months to any person who desired to give evidence before it; and yet the Committee was never told that an election was imminent at the period when the contract was granted. So far was it from being the truth that the contract was given with a view to a general election, that the document which finally closed the contract was signed by the Treasury on the 2nd of February, and the general election did not take place until the end of April. The two events could not have had any connection, for the Reform Bill, which led to the general election, had not been introduced at the time when the contract was signed; and no one could then have imagined that a general election would have taken place at so early a period. Again, it was said that this was an electioneering contract, and that the chairman of the Galway Packet Company had entered Parliament as a supporter of the Government of Lord Derby. But a more unfounded statement was never made. He had no doubt that the person thus referred to was the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Lever). But it so happened that that hon. Member had never been the chairman of the Company. The first chairman and the first vice-chairman of the Company were both at present Members of that House, but neither of them had ever been a supporter of Lord Derby's Government. The chairman was the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. H. Lewis) and the vice chairman was a noble Lord (Lord Bury), who sat on the Treasury Bench, who held an office in Her Majesty's Household. I have also seen it stated that justice to Ireland did not require that the country should expend £72,000 a year for work which was not performed. But the terms of the contract expressly provided that no money should be paid until the contract was fulfilled, and it was impossible that a single shilling should be paid for services that were not actually rendered. He did not wish to anticipate the discussion which was to take place upon the Galway contract, but he had thought it right to take the very earliest opportunity of giving the fullest contradiction to these calumnies which had been often and often repeated and often and often confuted. Their confutation might not be as fresh in the recollection of the public as was the constant repetition of them; but wherever they were met they would necessarily be confuted, and he had only to add that he believed their perpetual repetition could only serve to throw discredit on their authors.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he should not attempt to defend himself against the imputations made in the House and in some of the English papers, which had been made, because, independently of the Galway Packet Contract, no one would doubt that he should have voted against the abolition of the paper duty. But he protested against the assertion which was made by some portion of the press and by some Members of the House, that Irish Members were actuated by other motives than those which actuated English Gentlemen. It was said by an hon. Member who had spoken in this debate, that sixteen hon. Gentlemen had left the House before the division on the paper duty, because they suspected that force was being used by the Irish Members to induce the Government to reconsider the Galway contract. Now, after the statement that had just been made, he recommended those hon. Gentlemen to look for the future after their own honour, and to leave to the Irish Members to do the same duty to themselves. He thought they had quite enough to do to defend their own conduct without imputing misconduct to other people. It was the same with the press. The leading journal stated that seventy-five Irish Members voted against the Government for the sake of £72,000. Now the number was sixty-nine, and the assertion as to the influence under which they voted was untrue, for of the seventy-one who had voted, sixty-nine had voted in precisely the same way on the first division before the question of the Galway contract had been raised at all, and the others had not voted at all in the first division. An insinuation of corruption in this contract had been levelled against Lord Derby and Lord Eglinton. He was private secretary to Lord Eglinton at the time. He saw the communications which passed between Lord Derby and Lord Eglinton, and he could undertake to state that they proved that no contract was ever made with more caution. All the friends of Ireland pressed the Government to do something to assist direct communication between Ireland and America. They conceived that they had a right to that assistance, and that if ever there was a case for a subsidy this was it. The country was a poor one, and had not the internal resources necessary for getting up a steam-packet company. It was said, why was not the service thrown open to competition? The point was not overlooked by the Government of the day; but the answer was obvious that if they attempted open competition there would be no company at all—that the contract would be taken in England for the purpose of preventing it being carried out. It was impossible to have competing companies in Ireland, because they had not the wealth; and if an English company were admitted to tender, the contract would be taken for the purpose of not performing the service proposed; and thus by non-performance, preventing the establishment of any Irish packet station, which would be the real object of such a tender. He assured the noble Lord that if Ireland had a right to have direct communication with America, it could never be accomplished by any other means than by making a bargain without competition, either with a new company, or with this company resuscitated. The reason there was such a strong feeling in Ireland towards this company was scarcely understood in this House, but he would tell them that this was not a company in the ordinary sense of the term, or rather was not formed in the way in which companies were formed in this country. There were few large capitalists in Ireland, and in England capitalists would not subscribe to it. But the sympathy of Ireland being enlisted in favour of the company, people of small means invested small sums in the undertaking. Their feelings were now roused by the consciousness that if the contract did not go on they would lose their money. From the moment the present Government came into office, the Galway contract was used for the purpose of attacking Lord Derby, and they determined in one way or other, per fas et nefas, to break it. They began by the Chancellor of the Exchequer attacking it, and the Government granting a Committee to impeach its validity, and thus by their own acts they made it impossible for the company to perform the conditions into which they had entered. He did not impeach the conduct of the Postmaster General. There had been, no doubt, breaches of contract, but those breaches were caused by the acts of the present Government. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer held the subsidy in doubt for sixteen months was it any wonder that the company had failed in their engagements? Could any one suppose that a capitalist would subscribe to a speculation which depended on the decision of a Committee of the House of Commons moved by a hostile Ministry? As to the accusation of corruption made against the Irish Members, he despised it. As to Mr. Daly, he had done a great deal for Galway; but to say that he had any authority to go in the name of the Irish Members and make a bargain for them was too contemptible to notice. He then thought it possible that Mr. Daly, totally regardless and thoughtless of the impending division, went to procure an interview for some Irish Members. Whether he thought that the juncture would have any effect he could not tell, but at least this was certain, no one gave him any authority to speak in the name of the Irish Members. He protested against it being supposed that Irish Members acted differently from English Members; and as to the sixteen Members who were so chary of the honour of the Irish Members, as he had said before, they had quite enough to do to look after their own.

MR. GREGORY: I do not intend to make any observations whatever on the Galway contract—that is a matter which had better be discussed when we can enter into it more fully. But as my noble Friend the Member for Galway (Lord Dunkellin) is not in his place, and as I took a prominent part in the transactions which have called forth all these explanations, I wish to say a few words on the subject of the meeting which was called of Irish Members. There have been two charges thrown out—first, that we endeavoured to tamper with the Prime Minister, and by means of a threat to extort a promise from him; and secondly, that we endeavoured to make terms with the Opposition. As to the last, I utterly deny that there is a shadow of a foundation for it. My noble Friend opposite is aware that we never, either directly or indirectly, held the slightest communication with Gentlemen on the other side of the House. As to the endeavour by means of threats to extort concessions from the Minister, I give that an equally emphatic contradiction. If the subject was ever mentioned at that meeting it was solely for the purpose of repudiating such a course, not merely as derogatory to our own honour, but as the most unwise course which could be pursued to obtain the end in view. So chary were we at the meeting of taking any step which could give occasion for such an imputation that we determined not to go as a deputation to the Prime Minister, although at that moment our constituents were most anxious to know how the case really stood. We determined that we would not go to the Prime Minister, lest our motives should be misconstrued. But not only that; so careful were we that in calling this meeting we only addressed those Members who usually supported Her Majesty's Government, lest any course savouring of intimidation might be suspected. Had we for a moment imagined that the Government, however great the emergency, would submit to dictation of this kind, we must have known that the indignation which would be called forth would utterly overthrow the object which we had in view. When, therefore, the noble Lord the Member for the City of London came down to the House and said "better that a hundred Ministries should be overthrown, better that a hundred dissolutions should take place, rather than any Government should submit to such dictation," I think I may say that the noble Lord's indignation was utterly thrown away, if such indignation was not entirely simulated. It was nothing more nor less than an energetic battle with phantoms invoked for the occasion and for a purpose, in which purpose, I regret to say, the Minister succeeded. Allow me to add that, if we had not been influenced by the lower incentives of prudence, I trust that we should not be so forgetful of the position in which Irish Members stand as part and parcel of the whole Legislature, as to lend ourselves to such a proceeding. I entirely approve the abstract propriety of the sentiments of the noble Lord, because I know that no course is so calculated to bring the House of Commons into contempt and disrepute as to make it possible that its decision could be influenced by concessions or subsidies on the eve of a great emergency. I have seen the working of that system in another country. I have seen it in full blow in Canada, where majorities are obtained by expenditure for local purposes, or the Government is sustained by a grant to this or that municipality; and that is one of the principal causes of the Legislature of Canada having been brought into discredit. I can only say for myself, that last Session I voted against the third reading of the Paper Duties Repeal Bill for reasons into which I am not going to enter now, and that in the present Session I refrained from voting. Although I was most anxious not to sacrifice a large amount of revenue, I was at the same time most anxious not to be instrumental in producing a Ministerial crisis. But when the Government did, in a harsh and unnecessary manner, close a contract which was not the affair of a locality, or of a company, but of a nation, I voted against that Government. I thought the vote perfectly consistent with my previous conduct, and I considered the vote which I then gave as a vote of want of confidence. I conceive that although the vote was on "paper," we had a perfect right to express our confidence or want of confidence in the Government, and that such a course was justified by Parliamentary precedents. In 1846, the majority by which Sir Robert Peel was thrown out was upon a Coercion Bill. That was the issue before the House; but the cause of Sir Robert Peel's Government being upset was not the merits of the Coercion Bill, but because he had forfeited the confidence of his followers by his conduct in regard to the Corn Laws. Again, in 1857, a vote of want of confidence, which drove the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government from office, was taken upon the question of a Conspiracy Bill. It was not any difference of opinion as to the right of the French Emperor to protection against assassination, but private piques, small ambitions, and sectional jealousies, which drove the noble Lord from office in 1857; and the vote on that occasion had as much reference to assassination as our vote had the other night to paper. When gross imputations are being cast upon Irish Members, I wish some Members would look at home. It was only yesterday that a Liverpool paper was put into my hands containing a letter addressed to the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall), in which he was appealed to to vote for the Government in spite of his position in this House as a Member of the Opposition, and he was told that the issue was not paper—the question was Liverpool or Galway. He was told that, not only was it a steam-packet question, but a question for the whole shipping interest, and that he would be called to account for any vote which might give sanction to an opposition inconsistent with the interests of the town which he claimed to represent. The appeal is put in the broadest manner—"Liverpool or Galway—Galway or Liverpool—for which will you vote?" I know the Member for Liverpool to be the last man to be influenced by any appeal against what he considered to be just and right; but I quote the Liverpool papers to show how readily in England the attempt is made to force Members of Parliament to be guided by local interests rather than by the merits of the case submitted to them. When all these stories are being told of the pressure put by Irish Members on the Government, it is fair to mention that other stories affecting Members of a sister country are afloat. There was a story about town that a deputation of Scotch Members waited on the Prime Minister, previous to the late division, to indurate the inflexibility of the noble Lord with regard to the Galway contract, and threatening him with defection should he make any concession to Irish Members. I never for one moment believed that rumour, and I only said and claim for ourselves that same charity which we extend to others.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I do not rise to discuss the question of the Galway contract. I think the hon. Member who last spoke has exercised a very wise discretion in abstaining from that discussion. Neither shall I make any remark for the purpose of controverting his right to express by his vote his want of confidence in Her Majesty's present Government. I rise merely because the hon. Gentleman in the course of his remarks stated that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs exhibited "simulated indignation" upon a recent occasion, and appeared rather to intimate that my noble Friend used undue means for the purpose of influencing the votes of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I wish to call attention to what took place on that occasion. Early in the evening questions had been addressed to my noble Friend at the head of the Government with respect to negotiations on the subject of the Galway contract. My noble Friend was unable to state anything more than that a communication had been recently addressed to the Postmaster General on the part of the contractors; that that communication was under consideration; and that an answer would shortly be given to it. My noble Friend did not state what answer would be given, because it was impossible for him to do so; and, therefore, he may have been understood to have left the House in uncertainty as to what answer would be given and as to whether negotiations with this company would not be opened. It must also be in the recollection of the House that a statement was made by a widely circulated newspaper on that morning, that the Government had made a bargain with the Galway Company, the details of which were mentioned and specified. I believe, myself, from what came to my knowledge, that an impression prevailed in this House most derogatory, as it seemed to me, to the honour of Members of Her Majesty's Government, that negotiations were going on with the Galway Company, and that it was sought to purchase the support of Irish Members by concession on that subject. As reports had been circulated in London to that effect, and in the House to my knowledge, after my noble Friend gave his answer to the questions, it became absolutely necessary that my noble Friend the Secretary of State should give a distinct denial to the truth of those reports. I can only speak as to my own feelings. I conceived my honour personally implicated in a distinct denial being at that moment given to what I considered most injurious reports which were then in circulation, and I confess I never heard any statement with greater pleasure than I heard the declaration of my noble Friend, which put an end to all uncertainty upon the subject. So far from the indignation being simulated or resorted to as an unfair contrivance for the purpose of influencing votes, my noble Friend took a course which he was actually forced to take by the state of belief in the House, and he did not in the smallest degree exceed the bounds which were his strict duty, and which were incumbent on him as a man of truth and honour.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had no wish to prolong this discussion, but his attention had been drawn to the statement in The Times newspaper, that it was incumbent on the Irish Members to clear up the matter. So strongly had he felt this imputation that it had been his intention, but for the notice of the hon. Member for Roscommon, to call the attention of the House to the matter as a breach of privilege. It was an old French proverb that Qui s'excuse s'accuse; and, therefore, he felt extremely indignant that the noble Lord should have said he was glad the Irish Members had exculpated themselves.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Allow me to interrupt the hon. Member, for the purpose of preventing my being misunderstood. What I said about "exculpated" was as to the Irish Members having authorized Mr. Daly to introduce a deputation.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY was happy to find the objectionable word either explained or retracted. It was said that the indignation of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary was induced by the prevalence of certain reports. Who put those reports in circulation? They were circulated by an organ of the Government, The Times newspaper, and not by the Irish Members. The purpose was to gain votes, and they did gain votes by rousing a natural feeling of indignation among English and Scotch Members. It was the Government who required to be exculpated from lending themselves to such slanders on the Irish Members. He found he had used an expression to which he ought perhaps to except, because he objected to their being called Irish Members. They were as much the representatives of the whole country as the Scotch or English Members. No one was more entirely free from these imputations than himself. He had expressed no opinion in the House, either on the paper duties or on the Galway contract. His opinion on the Galway contract was very well known out of doors. He did not think Galway the best of Irish ports, but that the contract had been useful in bringing the steamers to Cork. If one of the 105 Irish Members was liable to imputations, it was the habit to take the one black sheep as the type of the whole flock; but if the English had a black sheep they drove it out of the flock remorselessly. He thought the noble Lord might have easily ascertained whether Mr. Daly had any authority or not; but it seems to have suited him better to remain in a state of blissful ignorance. And then, when called upon for an explanation, his conduct towards the Irish Members had been characterized by so much finesse, and he gave such unintelligible answers that it was necessary to put up the next in command to explain. He did not, however, intend to insinuate that any Member of the Government wrote the article in question. He was not fond of going upon deputations, but he had once accompanied a deputation to the noble Lord, as to Cork Harbour, because it was less trouble than to give an explanation to his constituents why he had absented himself; and upon that occasion he told the noble Lord he did not think any good would be derived from the deputation except the pleasure he must always feel in paying his Lordship a morning visit. The noble Lord was very facetious in his description of the interview with Father Daly. He knew less of Father Daly than either the noble Lord or the leader of the Opposition; but upon one occasion he had seen Father Daly in conversation with some hon. Members outside. One of them said, "I hear you had a very satisfactory interview with the Premier." "Yes," said Father Daly, "very satisfactory indeed, and, therefore, I ask all you Gentlemen to go at once and vote against him." "Was he civil to you?" was the next question. "Oh yes," said Father Daly, "all great men in eminent positions are civil and courteous; he was exceedingly civil, and I have nothing to complain of in that respect." Thinking to take a rise out of the poor parish priest, the Gentleman said, "Have you been to any of his Lordship's 'evenings at home?'" but Father Daly was ready with his answer—"No, Sir, I don't care for high society at all; I would just as soon sit at the board of an humble man like yourself." He himself had had an interview in the lobby—it was with a Member of the House connected with the Government, and he would not look round the House lest he should see him in his place—who said, "Surely, you will not lend yourself to this dirty work?" He replied, "I was born an Irish gentleman, as you were born an English gentleman; and I do not understand expressions of that kind being addressed to me." The Member said, "You Irish are very hot; you take in earnest what is meant in joke." He answered, "No Irish gentleman would use such expressions either in jest or in earnest."

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he had attended the meeting alluded to, firmly convinced that those who went to it would vote against the Government on the same evening. So far from thinking that course derogatory, he believed it was the one which it was their duty to take, and which was in accordance with the wish of their constituents. He put it to Irish Members whether it was not the course their constituents wished them to take, irrespective of any considerations as to tea or paper? There seemed to be an attempt made to bind Members to vote on abstract considerations without reference to any other considerations. For himself, he did not mean to be bound by such a rule, nor did he think it was one which had before been recognized and acted upon in the House. He had no doubt that his vote on the occasion in question was influenced by the conduct of the Government on the Galway contract, and that it would, on future occasions, be equally influenced if similar circumstances arose. He trusted that some pressure would yet be brought to bear upon the Government in reference to that contract.

CAPTAINS ON THE RESERVED LIST: RESOLUTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in rising to bring the claims of the Captains on the Reserved List under the notice of the House, said it was quite understood by these officers when they were placed on the Reserved (not on the Retired List) that they were to be on the same footing as officers on the Active List, in regard to rank, seniority, and the Greenwich out-pensions, the difference being that they were not to expect active employment unless in case of war. It was most important that good faith should be kept with naval officers by the Admiralty. He could not do justice to the list, but the services of these captains averaged an active service of thirty-five years each. The advantage they had obtained by the minute had been 6d. a day. They had protested against the treatment they had received, and a certain number last year obtained an increase of pay. But so far as he could learn they would not have their flags and seniority and their Greenwich out-pensions as captains. As the hour was now so late (half-past five) he must content himself with moving the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'the Captains of the Royal Navy, who were placed on a Reserved as distinguished from a Retired List, on account of their having served long and well, in accordance with the Orders in Council, of the 25th day of June, 1851, and the 30th day of January, 1856, have great reason to complain, that the arrangement entered into with the Board of Admiralty has not been fairly carried out; and that the injustice with which these Officers have been treated is most prejudicial to the Public Service,'"—instead thereof.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT seconded the Amendment. He must do the right hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Baring) who drew the minute the justice to say he was under the impression he had excluded these officers from the advantages they now claimed, and which they believed, when they accepted the Order in Council, they were to enjoy. There was, however, an ambiguity in the Order in Council that entitled to the generous consideration of the House officers who had served their country faithfully and in posts of great responsibility during a long war.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he quite concurred with the gallant Admiral in his assertion that these captains were a body of able and excellent officers many of whom had served their country with distinction. He greatly regretted the misunderstanding under which these officers laboured as to their position as officers on the reserved list; he must, however, fall back on what was done by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Baring), who was First Lord of the Admiralty when the Order in Council was issued in 1851. That Order was made in the interest of a certain number of commanders who had no prospect of employment or promotion, and to whom an offer was made that they should be promoted to this reserved list. Whether these officers thought at the time they were to rise pari passu with officers on the active list was a matter on which he could offer no opinion. The Admiralty of that day, however, and every successive Board of Admiralty considered that it was the bond fide intention of the Admiralty that these officers should not rise pari passu with officers on the active list. This distinctly appeared from the rates of half-pay published in the Navy List. The Admiralty, however, deeming that the Order in Council was considered by these officers as rather ambiguously worded, had, by an Order in Council, last year allowed these officers to count their sea-time both as lieutenants and mates. The effect of this order had been so favourable to them that their grievance was now more imaginary than real. Very few had arrived at that point in the Navy List where they would be entitled to an increase of pay; so that if the majority of them were on the active list they would only be in the lowest class, and in the receipt of 10s. 6d. per diem. Out of ninety-nine of these officers seventy-seven were receiving an increase of pay in consequence of their services under the Order in Council of last year. [Mr. COCHRANE: But they will not rise to the rank of Admiral.] That was true, but was the House prepared to increase the Admirals' list to this extent? He did not see on what principle the Admiralty could grant to officers on a reserved list—who were not liable to serve—the same position as officers on the active list. The case of these officers had been so often under the consideration of the House that it might now be considered as exhausted. Considering the boon recently granted to them he did not think these officers had any real grievance to complain of.

MAJOR EDWARDS was sorry to hear the noble Lord state that this question was exhausted. Many of these officers had been in action, and had distinguished themselves before some of the members of the present Board of Admiralty were born. He had been assured, and had no reason to doubt the statement, that when these officers accepted a position on the reserved list they expected they were to rise to their flags. The case was one which the Admiralty ought to take into their favourable consideration, for the claim of the officers was only just and proper.

The House divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 19: Majority 8.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £460,835, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of New Works, Improvements, and Repairs in the Naval Establishments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he had given notice of his intention to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £3,225, proposed for additional accommodation for spinning machinery at Chatham; but it depended upon the explanation which the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty gave on the subject whether he would persevere with the Motion.

MR. WHITBREAD hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not persist in his Motion, as the question of the enlargement of Chatham Dockyard was to be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, that the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) stated the other night that the Vote for the extension of works at Chatham pledged the Government to an ultimate outlay of £1,000,000. A Vote of so much importance ought not, therefore, to be taken so late in the afternoon; and moreover, if the whole question was to be considered by a Committee the decision of that Committee ought not to be anticipated.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that it was in the opinion of the Government very advantageous that the extensions at Chatham should be referred to a Committee upstairs; and the particular Vote to which the right hon. Gentleman referred would be conditional on the report of the Committee.

MR. HENLEY could not see how, if the money were given hard and fast, it could be conditional on the Report of the Committee. It would be better to move for the money in a Supplementary Estimate if the Committee reported in favour of Chatham.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that the Vote now asked was in continuation of Votes granted for several years, in order to continue the great work of the embankment of St. Mary's Island.

MR. HENNESSY moved that the Chairman Report Progress.

MR. HENLEY suggested that the Vote should be struck out.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the extension of works at Chatham would be referred to a Committee. This was a Vote entirely independent of that question.

House resumed; Committee report Progress: to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at Ten minutes before Six o'clock.

DEATH OF COUNT CAVOUR.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: My Lords, I wish to call attention to a subject of very great interest. I wish to ask, Whether the Foreign Office has received any intelligence from Italy, confirming the melancholy report of the death of Count Cavour? If that melancholy event has really occurred, it is a calamity not to Italy alone, but to all Europe. Count Cavour was a statesman who, whatever opinions may be entertained of his political views, occupied too important a place in the politics of Europe for his death not to be regarded as a great calamity; and those who had the honour and advantage of his personal acquaintance must feel most deeply and painfully on this event. My Lords, if this loss has fallen on Italy and the world, it is one that at the present moment is irreparable. But I am sure he has left behind him a renown for patriotism, for personal disinterestedness, and for an ambition honourably directed, that will survive till the last period in the annals of his country.

LORD WODEHOUSE: I am grieved to say, my Lords, that the report referred to by the noble Marquess of the death of Count Cavour is too true. The Foreign Office has received a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Turin, stating that Count Cavour died this morning at seven o'clock. My Lords, it is not for me to pass an eulogium on the character of such a statesman as Count Cavour; I have no doubt that history will do full justice to him as a statesman and a patriot. But I entirely concur with the noble Marquess in the feeling that, whatever differences of opinion there may be among your Lordships—whatever differences of opinion there may be either in or out of this House—as to the policy he pursued, there can be but one opinion that at the present moment, and at the present crisis of Italian affairs, his death must be regarded as a great calamity.

LORD BROUGHAM: My Lords, I also entirely agree with the feeling that has been expressed that, whatever differences of opinion there may be among your Lordships on certain parts of the policy and conduct of Count Cavour, yet no one can doubt he was a man of great talents, of great skill, and that he rendered great services to his own country and the Kingdom of Italy in general. We must all join in deploring his death as a most calamitous blow to that great cause to which every one wishes well.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, having at two distinct periods, in consequence of changes in the Government of this country, had to carry an official correspondence and enter into official relations with Count Cavour, I should be sorry if I omitted to refer to the death of one who must be considered a very great man. I entirely agree with my noble Friend opposite that no differences of opinion as to his policy can make any difference in the feelings with which we have heard of the death of Count Cavour. I do not think those differences of opinion have been so great—they were rather differences on points of detail than on principle—as to render such a distinction of feeling on this occasion possible. Whatever they may have been, and whatever they may be hereafter, we must see, from the importance of the events pending in Italy, that the influence of the great minister and statesman who has just departed was of the most essential character. I do not look forward with such apprehension as the noble Marquess has expressed to what may be the results of the death of Count Cavour. We must hope that the Italians, having attained the point at which they have arrived, will continue to show the same resolution and the same prudence in their general conduct that they have hitherto displayed under the guidance of Count Cavour. His memory will be a beacon and an example to them which it is most important they should follow, not only for the sake of their own country, but for that of every country of Europe.

THE MARQUESS OF BATII: My Lords, while we must all regret the fact of any man being removed so suddenly and unexpectedly from this life, and while all your Lordships must deplore the death of Count Cavour as opening Italy again to fresh intrigues and fresh invasions, I am bound to say that, looking at his past history, whatever may have been the objects he had in view, the means by which he strove to obtain those objects, and their results, were certainly such as many of your Lordships cannot approve. He violated every law, human and divine.

TURCO-PERSIAN FRONTIER.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, he agreed with all the noble Lords who had spoken, that whatever might be the differences of opinion as to the policy of Count Cavour, or the means he had adopted to accomplish his objects, his death must be regarded as a great calamity. On one occasion he (Lord Stratford de Redcliffe) had himself called attention to what appeared to him to furnish matter of criticism in that policy; but at the present moment he should be sorry to allow any feeling to enter his mind inconsistent with the desire to do honour and also to do justice to the memory of so great a man. But his object in rising was chiefly to put a question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs upon a subject of great importance. The matter to which he wished to call attention had its origin about eighteen years ago, when negotiations were on foot with a view to prevent hostilities between Turkey and Persia arising out of the unsettled state of the boundary line between the two countries. England had great interests at stake, and, therefore, proffered her mediation together with that of Russia, which was, after some hesitation accepted. A Commission was sent out, and after a considerable time the matter came to a partial conclusion by the engineer officer, Captain Glascott, who was charged with carrying out the boundary line, being sent to St. Petersburg about three years ago. The reason of that officer being sent to St. Petersburg was that the Russian Government possessed considerable materials that could be useful in carrying out the object in view. He wished to know what was the present state of affairs, and whether there was any hope that in a short time the map which was in course of preparation would be completed?

LORD WODEHOUSE said, the subject had been mooted at the time he had the honour of representing Her Majesty at St. Petersburg. It was true that it had been found convenient to send an officer to that capital because of the nature of the materials in the possession of the Russian Government. A map was in course of preparation, of which he had seen a portion. That map was on an extensive scale, and there was reason to hope that the whole would be completed in the course of the present year. The officer who had been sent to St. Petersburg was even sanguine that it would be completed by August next. When the map was completed the negotiations properly so called would be removed to Constantinople, and with the map in their hands, the representatives of Russia and England, the mediating Powers, would have to consider, with the representatives of Turkey and Persia, the drawing of the boundary line between those two countries which had heretofore been the subject of disputes and difficulties.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD KINNAIRD moved the Second Reading of this Bill, the object of which was to enable Railway Companies in Scotland to make transfers of their bonds in an easy, speedy, and economical manner; in fact, to enable them to take advantage of the present law of the land by supplying an omission that occurred in the Act itself.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD REDESDALE, upon public grounds—but only on public grounds—objected to the second reading of the Bill. He certainly should concur in the principle of providing an easy mode of effecting transfers of these securities; but he thought the measure, if approved of, should not apply to Scotland alone, but to the whole of the United Kingdom. He objected also that the provision regarding the transfer of railway bonds free from stamp duty on a single payment of treble stamp duty would be seriously prejudicial to the interests of the revenue. He thought that every transfer should be subject to a stamp duty. Under those circumstances he moved that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and insert (“this Day Six months.”)

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, that he was not before aware that the noble Lord who had just spoken was Chancellor of the Exchequer in that House, or that he undertook to do the duty of that right hon. Gentleman in the House of Lords. The object of the Bill was simply to enable persons having railway securities to transfer those securities without being obliged to have recourse to a deed of transfer, or to employ lawyers and brokers. The Scotch people were anxious for the measure, and he saw no reason why their Lordships should not at once pass it into law without waiting until another Session for an English Bill to be brought in by the Government.

LORD REDESDALE remarked, that as he understood the Government intended to support the Bill in that House, he should not trouble their Lordships to divide. He had done his duty in calling attention to the measure, and pointing out the loss that would accrue to the revenue.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the Original Motion was agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly; and Committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND)

BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD KINNAIRD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to enable the counties of Scotland to establish or to contribute to the reformatories out of certain funds which were now lying in the Bank and which had been accumulating for some years. The Prison Board of Scotland, finding, soon after their establishment that it was necessary to increase the prison accommodation, proceeded to exercise the powers given under the Act and to assess counties for that purpose. It was found, however, that though they had power to assess the counties they had none to apply the assessment to any other purpose than the providing additional prison accommodation. The success of reformatory schools in diminishing crime had shown that to expend money in increasing prison accommodation would be useless outlay. The assessment collected for this purpose was lodged in the bank, and the object of this Bill was to enable the Prison Boards of counties, with the consent of the General Prison Board, to apply those funds towards the establishment of reformatory schools of which there were but three in Scotland, for young persons from the age of sixteen upwards.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN moved as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He thought that in a matter of such importance legislation ought to originate with Her Majesty's Government. The Bill would alter the whole of the Prison Acts of Scotland. Besides, in an Act passed last year power was taken to apply some portion of the county funds for the purpose of reformatories, and, therefore, he thought that this measure was wholly unnecessary. He objected to the appropriation of money raised under the powers of one Act of Parliament to proposes stated in another Act of Parliament. He regarded this Bill as an attempt to take out of the hands of the Commissioners the appropriation of funds originally designed for this purpose alone, and thought an opportunity should be given to the Commissioners of supply and to the borough authorities to have a voice in the matter if these funds were to be laid out as proposed.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

THE EARL OF EGLINTON was anxious that there should be reformatory schools all over the country, but he objected to this Bill upon the ground that it was wrong to dispose for one purpose of funds which had been voted for another. The money was got from an assessment for the purpose of building and improving prisons and now it was sought to apply the surplus of this fund to the building of reformatory schools. The second objection to the Bill was that it saddled the counties with the maintenance of reformatories whether they desired it or not.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL supported the Bill. Reformatory schools were intended to serve the purpose of prisons for a particular kind of delinquents, and, therefore, the building of such institutions was a strictly cognate purpose to that for which the prison assessments had been levied. Prison Boards had already the power of laying on a special assessment for the erection of reformatories; and, moreover, they were elected bodies, and not likely to act in opposition to the wishes and interests of their constituencies.

LORD POLWARTH remarked, that though reformatories were in some sense prisons, yet they were prisons for a totally different purpose than those for which the money was raised.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE thought that the Bill contained some very objectionable provisions; and he should, therefore, support the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, in addition to other objections, said, he objected that this was a general measure brought with the view of meeting two or three individual cases only.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, I wish to ask the hon. Member for Galway county, Whether he intends to bring forward the Motion of which he has given notice on the subject of the Galway contract on the day he has named, and whether he intends to take the sense of the House upon it?

MR. GREGORY: In reply, Sir, to the question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to say that it is my intention to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances attending the cancelling of the Galway contract, on Friday, the 14th, and shall take the sense of the House upon it.

PAUPER CHILDREN.—QUESTION.

LORD ASHLEY said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copy of any recent Correspondence between the Poor Law Board and any London or Provincial Unions on the subject of the removal of Pauper Children to the Manufacturing Districts?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, there had been no intention of laying the correspondence on the Table, but if the noble Lord had any public object to serve he should have no objection to produce it.

THE RIDE IN KENSINGTON GARDENS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, Whether he intends, as is reported, to open a part of Kensington Gardens for the use of Equestrians; and, if so, what portion of the Gardens will be devoted to that purpose?

MR. COWPER said, he believed that it was the wish of the House, as it was the pleasure of Her Majesty, that the Royal Parks should produce as much enjoyment as possible to all classes of the community. After the decision of the House last year in favour of a ride in Kensington Gardens he thought he should have been wanting in respect to the House if he had not opened a ride again this year; but, considering the loud and almost clamorous objections then made, he felt it his duty to endeavour to remove all just grounds of complaints against the ride. The objections which he felt most forcibly was that proceeding from certain fond parents and timid nurserymaids in regard to the dangers to children which might result from the want of experience or adroitness on the part of the equestrians using the ride; and he had, therefore, traced out a line by which the horsemen and horsewomen would have the advantage of shade from heat, and soft turf for their horses' feet, without crossing any frequented path or walk whatever. There could be no nurserymaid, he thought, who could object to the line he had marked out. Another ground of complaint was that the privacy of the gardens would be destroyed. He owned that he did not pretend to have the power—nor could any mortal man have it—of securing privacy in any park generally open to the public, in the centre of the Metropolis with nearly 3,000,000 inhabitants. At all events, the ride about to be opened would not interfere with the privacy, such as it was, of a great portion of the gardens. The entrance to the ride would be under the dry arch of the bridge which divided Kensington Gardens from Hyde Park—on the south side—and the first warm day after this suitable for a ride that gate would be opened.

UNITED STATES—CIVIL WAR.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Galway County, Whether it is his intention to bring on his Motion to-morrow with reference to the recognition of the Southern States of America, and also, whether the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary deems it desirable that the subject should be discussed?

MR. GREGORY said, it was his intention to bring on the Motion to-morrow, and he believed the Foreign Secretary was prepared to discuss the question.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: So far as the Government are concerned, having asked the hon. Member on several occasions to postpone his Motion, we can make no further objection to his bringing it on, but, looking to the interests of the public service, I cannot say that I think it desirable that it should come on.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS FOR THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in the latest telegrams from America, that a regiment of Canadian Volunteers has offered its services to the President of the United States to assist in coercing the Southern States, and that this offer has been accepted; and what steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent this violation of neutrality?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that on seeing the notice of the noble Lord, he had inquired at the Colonial Office whether any account had been received of such an offer, and was informed that no such report had been received. We have not heard from any diplomatic agent, either Lord Lyons or from any of the Consular Agents, of any such proceedings. Under such circumstances it was not necessary to give any answer to the latter portion of the question of the noble Lord.

THE LAKE IN THE REGENT'S PARK.

QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is with his leave and sanction that boats are allowed to go on the Ornamental Water in Regent's Park; whether he is aware that considerable annoyance has arisen to the families of owners of private gardens which abut on the same, from persons landing on or lying alongside of these gardens; and whether he intends to take any steps to remedy the grievance complained of?

MR. FOX said, he wished to put another question on the same subject, the permission for boats to row on the ornamental water in the Regent's Park. He knew, as living in the neighbourhood—"Order, order!" He merely wished to say that having had many opportunities—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman was clearly out of order in making the observation.

MR. FOX said, he wished to know whether anything had occurred which had induced the Commissioner to regret the licence granted, or that would interfere with the consideration of its extension, especially so as to allow the employment of boats on a Sunday?

MR. COWPER said, that last summer it occurred to him that the ornamental lake in the Regent's Park was not so conducive to the public recreation as it might be, or as the Serpentine was, and he, therefore, made arrangements to allow boats to ply. On that occasion he received an urgent remonstrance from the owners of property on one side of the lake, and, also, from persons living on the other side. Those persons stated that if boats were allowed the private gardens would be liable to the incursions of a miscellaneous London mob. The other allegation was that if the stagnant water were stirred up serious consequences would result to the health of the neighbourhood. He was happy to say that neither of those apprehensions had been realized. A miscellaneous London mob had not paid eighteen-pence an hour for boats, and had not landed in the private gardens. The only complaint that had reached him was a complaint of incivility towards a lady by a young man who was rowing in a boat. On the other hand he had received the strongest expressions of gratitude and satisfaction at this additional source of amusement, and he knew that a great many clerks and shopkeepers, young men employed all day in sedentary occupations, had found a source of healthful recreation by rowing on the water in the morning. It had also given a vivacity and picturesque appearance to the park which all persons of good taste must greatly rejoice in.

Orders of the Day,—Ordered, that the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the three first Notices of Motions, relative to East India.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

SIR CHARLES WOOD rose again and said: I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill of the greatest possible importance to our Indian Empire. It modifies to a great extent the Executive Government, and—what is of still greater importance—it alters the means and manner of legislation. I can assure the House that I never felt more responsibility than in venturing to submit to it a proposal of so important and grave a character. It is hardly necessary for me to mention that the power of legislating for 150,000,000 of people, and nearly 50,000,000 whose welfare it indirectly affects, is a matter of the gravest importance, and I am quite sure that to those who have ever studied India the inherent difficulties of the question will be no less apparent. We have to legislate for different races, with different languages, religions, manners, and customs, ranging from the bigoted Mahomedan, who considers that we have usurped his legitimate position as the ruler of India, to the timid Hindoo, who, though bowing to every conqueror, is bigotedly attached to his caste, his religion, his laws, and his customs, which have descended to him uninterruptedly for countless generations. But, added to that, we have English settlers in India differing in almost every respect from the Native population—active, energetic, enterprising, with all the pride of race and conquest, presuming on their superior powers, and looking down in many respects and I am afraid violating in others, the feelings and prejudices of the Native population; with whom, nevertheless, they must be subject to laws passed by the Legislative body in India. I have always thought that the gravest question in modern times is the relation between civilized and less civilized nations, or between civilized portions and less civilized portions of nations, when they came in contact. The difficulty is seen in America, in Africa, in New Zealand, but nowhere in the widely extended dominions of Her Majesty has it reached such a magnitude as in India. And in this particular case the difficulty is aggravated by the circumstance that the English, who form a portion of those who are to be subjected to this legislation, are not a permanent body. They go there for a time. Officials, when their term of service has expired, and persons engaged in commercial or agricultural pursuits, when they have made a fortune, return to this country, and though the English element in India is permanent as belonging to a nation, it is most transitory when we come to consider the individuals who compose it. Such are the circumstances under which we are to legislate, and I regret to say that the recent mutiny has aggravated these difficulties. The unlimited confidence which a few years ago was felt by the European population in the Natives of India has given way to feelings of distrust. Formerly there was, at all events, no feeling of antagonism between the higher portion of official persons and the great mass of the population. The latter looked up to the Government as to a protector, and if any feeling of antagonism or jealousy existed it existed only between them and those members of the service or the English settlers who were brought into antagonistic

contact with them. When I heard some time ago that the feeling of antagonism was extending itself lower among the Natives and higher among the officers I deeply regretted it, as the most alarming symptom of altered circumstances, which must obviously tend to increase the dangers of our position. I do not wish to dwell on this matter, but it would be folly to shut our eyes to the increasing difficulties of our position in India, and it is an additional reason why we should make the earliest endeavour to put all our institutions on the soundest possible foundations. It is notoriously difficult for any European to make himself intimately acquainted with either the feelings or opinions of the Native population, and I was struck the other day by a passage in a letter from one of the oldest Indian servants, Sir Mark Cubbon, whose death we have had recently to regret. He had been in the service for sixty years; he had administered the affairs of Mysore for nearly thirty years; he had been living in the most intimate intercourse with the Natives, possessing their love and confidence to an extent seldom obtained by an English officer, and yet he said "that he was astonished that he had never been able to acquire a sufficient acquaintance with the opinions and feelings of the Natives with whom he was in daily communication." Many of the greatest mistakes into which we have been led have arisen from the circumstance that we have been, not unnaturally, perhaps, for arranging everything according to English ideas. In Bengal we converted the collectors of taxes into the permanent landowners of the country, and left the ryots to their mercy. In Madras, Sir Thomas Munro, from the most benevolent motives, and to avoid the evils of the Bengal settlement, introduced the ryotwarry system. It is now asserted that a more impoverished population than that of Madras does not exist. When I was at the Board of Control it was said that the system of the North-Western provinces was perfect. In consequence of that opinion it was introduced into the newly-acquired province of Oude. We fancied that we were benefiting the population, and relieving them from the oppression of their chiefs, but in the rebellion the ryots of Oude took part against us and joined their chiefs in the rebellion. Subsequent to the rebellion the Indian Government, profiting by the circumstance, reverted to the old system in Oude, and happily with the greatest success; and recently at an interview between Lord Canning and the talookdars they expressed their gratification at the restoration of the former system, and the Governor General justly congratulated them on the fact that tranquillity prevailed in a district which had been so frequently the scene of violence and outrage, and that in the most newly acquired of Her Majesty's Indian dominions confidence existed which was not surpassed in the oldest settlements. The House can hardly be aware of the extraordinary and inherent difficulties in devising a system applicable to the whole of India. It behoves us to be most careful, as a rash step may lead to most dangerous consequences. It is easy to go forward. It is difficult to go back, and I confess I am disposed to err on the side of caution and to profit by the warning of one of the ablest Indian officers, Mountstuart Elphinstone, who said "Legislation for India should be well considered, gradual, and slow." The measure which I propose to introduce will effect some changes in the executive Government of India. About two years ago the Government thought it right to send to India a distinguished Member of this House, Mr. Wilson, in order to aid in putting the finances of that country in a more satisfactory condition. As far as I can learn, the changes which Mr. Wilson had the opportunity of inaugurating, and which have to a considerable extent been carried out, have gone a great way to convince the authorities of India of the mistaken way in which they were proceeding, and to lay the foundation of a sounder system of finance. Judging from the accounts which we have received by the last mail, I believe that a change has come over the financial affairs of India, and that we may look forward to a more satisfactory state of things than has prevailed for many years. There can be no doubt that the Council of the Governor General has suffered serious inconvenience from the absence of any Member thoroughly acquainted with the laws and principles of jurisprudence; and Lord Canning, in one of his despatches, points out how desirable it is that a gentleman of the legal profession, a jurist rather than a technical lawyer, should be added to the Council. I propose, therefore, to take powers to send out an additional member of Council. Although it is not so specified, it is intended that he should be a lawyer, and I must endeavour to find a man of high character and attainments, competent to assist the Governor General and his Council in framing laws. The main change proposed is, however, in the mode in which laws and regulations are enacted. The history of legislative power in India is very short. In 1773 the Governor General in Council was empowered to make regulations for the Government of India, and in 1793 those regulations were collected into a code by Lord Cornwallis. Similar regulations were applied in 1799 and 1801 to Madras and Bombay, and in 1803 they were extended to the North-West Provinces. The territory of Delhi, however, which was nominally under the sovereignty of the Great Mogul, was administered by officers of the Government of India, and with such good effect that in 1815, when Lord Hastings acquired certain provinces, he determined that they should be administered in the same way by Commissioners appointed by the Government. The same system has been applied to the Punjab, Scinde, Pegu, and the various acquisitions made in India since that date. The laws and regulations under which they are administered are framed either by the Governor General in Council or by the Lieutenant Governors or Commissioners, as the case may be, and approved by the Governor General. This difficult mode of passing ordinances for the two classes of provinces, constitutes the distinction between the regulation and the non-regulation provinces, the former being those subject to the old regulations, and the latter those which are administered in the somewhat irregular manner which, as I have stated, commenced in 1815. There is much difference of opinion as to the legality of the regulations adopted under the latter system, and Sir Barnes Peacock has declared that they are illegal unless passed by the Legislative Council. The Act of 1833 added to the Council of the Governor General a member whose presence was necessary for the passing of all legislative measures, and put the whole of the then territory of India under that body, at the same time withdrawing from Madras and Bombay the power of making regulations. In that way the whole legislative power and authority of India were centralized in the Governor General and Council, with this additional member. So matters stood in 1853, but great complaints had emanated from other parts of India of the centralization of power at Calcutta. The practice was then introduced of placing in the Governor General's Council members from different parts of India. The tenour of the evidence given before the Committee of 1852-3 was to point out that the Executive Council alone, even with the assistance of the legislative member, was incompetent to perform the increased duties which were created by the extension of territory. Mr. M'Leod, a distinguished member of the Civil Service of India, and who had acted at Calcutta as one of the Law Commissioners, gave the following evidence before the Committee:—

"The Governor General with four Members of Council, however highly qualified those individuals may be, is not altogether a competent Legislature for the great empire which we have in India. It seems to me very desirable that, in the Legislative Government of India, there should be one or more persons having local knowledge and experience of the minor presidencies; that is entirely wanting in the Legislative Government as at present constituted. It appears to me that this is one considerable and manifest defect. The Governor General and Council have not sufficient leisure and previous knowledge to conduct, in addition to their executive and administrative functions, the whole duties of legislation for the Indian empire. It seems to me that it would be advisable to enlarge the Legislative Council and have representatives of the minor presidencies in it, without enlarging the Executive Council, or in any way altering its present constitution."

Mr. Hill, another eminent civil servant, said—

"The mode of carrying out improvements must be by strengthening the hands of the Legislature. . . . It would be a great improvement if, after the preparation of laws by the Executive Government and its officers, when the Legislature met, they had the addition to their number of the Chief Justice and perhaps another judge of the Supreme Court, one or two judges of the Sudder Court, and the Advocate General, or some other competent persons—so that there should be a more numerous deliberative body."

I quote these two opinions only, because they are so clearly and concisely expressed. In consequence of the general evidence to that effect, I proposed, in 1853, a measure adding to the Council of the Governor General, when sitting to make laws and regulations, members from the different provinces of India, together with the Chief Justice and another Judge of the Supreme Court of Bengal. My intention was, in accordance with the opinions I have cited, to give to the Council the assistance of local knowledge and legal experience in framing laws. The Council, however, quite contrary to my intention, has become a sort of debating society, or potty parliament. My own view of its duties is expressed in a letter I wrote to Lord Dalhousie in 1853, in which I said—

"I expect the non-official members of your enlarged Legislative Council to be constantly employed as a Committee of Council in working at Calcutta, on the revision of your laws and regulations."

It was certainly a great mistake that a body of twelve members should have been established with all the forms and functions of a parliament. They have standing orders nearly as numerous as we have; and their effect has been, as Lord Canning stated in one of his despatches, to impede business, cause delay, and to induce a Council, which ought to be regarded as a body for doing practical work, to assume the debating functions of a parliament. In a letter which is among the papers upon the Table of the House, Mr. Grant bears testimony to the success which has attended their labours in framing laws; and I will quote the words of another able Indian civil servant to the same effect. He says—

"If it be assumed that the enlargement of the Council by the addition of two judges of the Supreme Court and four councillors of the different Presidencies of India was designed only as a means of improving the legislation of the country, the measure must be regarded as a complete success. The Council has effected all that could be expected, and may with just pride point to the statutes of the last seven years as a triumphant proof that the intention of Parliament has been fulfilled."

I think that is a very satisfactory proof that as far as my intentions—and what I believe were the intentions of the Legislature of this country—are concerned, the objects of the change in the position of the Governor General's Council, when sitting for legislative purposes, have been most completely fulfilled. I do not wish to say anything against a body the constitution of which I am about to alter, but I think that the general opinion, both in India and England, condemned the action of the Council when it attempted to discharge functions other than those which I have mentioned—when it constituted itself a body for the redress of grievances, and engaged in discussions which led to no practical result. So much has this struck those most competent to form an opinion, that I find that the first Vice President, Sir Laurence Peel, expressed a very decided opinion against it, and says of the Council, in a short memorandum—

"It has no jurisdiction in the nature of that of a grand inquest of the nation. Its functions are purely legislative, and are limited even in that respect. It is not an Anglo-Indian House of Commons for the redress of grievances, to refuse supplies, and so forth."

These obvious objections were pointed out to me by the Government of India last year, and it was my intention to have introduced a measure upon the subject in the course of that Session. I felt, however, so much difficulty in deciding in what shape the measure should be framed, that I deferred its proposal until the present year; and Lord Canning, who was very anxious that such a measure should be passed, consented to defer his departure from India in order that he, with his great experience of that country, might introduce the change. The present constitution of the Council for legislative purposes having failed, we have naturally to consider what should be substituted, and in doing so we must advert to the two extreme notions with regard to legislation which prevail in India. The notion of legislation which is entertained by a Native is that of a chief or sovereign, who makes what laws he pleases. He has little or no idea of any distinction between the executive and legislative functions of Government. A Native chief will assemble his nobles around him in the Durbar, where they freely and frankly express their opinions; but having informed himself by their communications, he determines by his own will what shall be done. Among the various proposals which have been made for the government of India is one that the power of legislation should rest entirely on the Executive, but that there should be a consultative body; that is, that the Governor General should assemble, from time to time, a considerable number of persons, whose opinions he should hear, but by whose opinions he should not be bound; and that he should himself consider and decide what measures should be adopted. In the last Session of Parliament Lord Ellenborough developed a scheme approaching this in character in the House of Lords; but hon. Gentlemen will see, in the despatches which have been laid upon the Table, that both Lord Canning considers this impossible, and all the Members of his Government, as well as the Members of the Indian Council, concur in the opinion that, in the present state of feeling in India, it is quite impossible to revert to a state of things in which the Executive Government alone legislated for the country. The opposite extreme is the desire which is natural to Englishmen wherever they be—that they should have a representative body to make the laws by which they are to be governed. I am sure, however, that everyone who considers the condition of India will see that it is utterly impossible to constitute such a body in that country. You cannot possibly assemble at any one place in India persons who shall be the real representatives of the various classes of the Native population of that empire. It is quite true that when you diminish the area over which legislation is to extend you diminish the difficulty of such a plan. In Ceylon, which is not more extensive than a large collectorate in India, you have a legislative body consisting partly of Englishmen and partly of Natives, and I do not know that that Government has worked unsuccessfully; but with the extended area with which we have to deal in India, it would be physically impossible to constitute such a body. The Natives who are resident in the towns no more represent the resident Native population than a highly educated native of London, at the present day, represents a highland chieftain or a feudal baron of half a dozen centuries ago. To talk of a Native representation is, therefore, to talk of that which is simply and utterly impossible. Then comes the question to what extent we can have a representation of the English settlers in India. No doubt, it would not be difficult to obtain a representation of their interests; but I must say that of all governing or legislative bodies, none is so dangerous or so mischievous as one which represents a dominant race ruling over an extended Native population. All experience teaches us that where a dominant race rules another, the mildest form of government is a despotism. It was so in the case of the democratic republics of Greece, and the more aristocratic or autocratic sway of Rome; and it has been so, I believe, at all times and among all nations in every part of the world. The other day I found in Mr. Mill's book upon Representative Government, a passage which I will read—not because I go its entire length, but because it expresses in strong terms what I believe is in the main correct. Mr. Mill says—

“Now, if there be fact to which all experience testifies, it is that when a country holds another in subjection, the individuals of the ruling people who resort to the foreign country to make their fortunes are, of all others, those who most need to be held under powerful restraint. They are always one of the chief difficulties of the Government. Armed with the prestige and filled with the scornful overbearingness of the conquering nation, they have the feelings inspired by absolute power without its sense of responsibility.”

I cannot, therefore, consent to create a powerful body of such a character. It must be remembered, also, that the Natives do not distinguish very clearly between the acts of the Government itself and the acts of those who apparently constitute it, namely, the members of the Legislative Council; and in one of Lord Canning's despatches he points out the mischiefs which have on that account arisen from publicity. He says that, so far as the English settlers are concerned, publicity is advantageous; but that if publicity is to continue, care must be taken to prevent the Natives confounding the measures which are adopted with injudicious speeches which may be made in the Legislative Council. I feel it, therefore, necessary to strengthen the hands of the Government, so as to enable them not only by veto to prevent the passing of a law, but to prevent the introduction of any Bill which they think calculated to excite the minds of the Native population, repeating the caution which I have before given, I say it behoves us to be cautious and careful in our legislation. I have seen a measure which I myself introduced in 1853, with one view, changed by the mode in which it was carried into execution so as to give it an operation totally different from that which I intended. The mischiefs resulting from that change have been great; and I am, therefore, anxious that in any measure which I may propose, and which the House, I hope, will adopt, we should take care, as far as possible, to avoid the likelihood of misconstruction or misapplication by the Government of India. It is easy at any future time to go further, but it is difficult to draw back from what we have once agreed to. The despatches of Lord Canning contain pretty full details of the scheme which he would recommend. Those despatches have been long under the consideration of the Council of India, and with their concurrence I have framed a measure which embodies the leading suggestions of Lord Canning. I propose that when the Governor General's Council meets for the purpose of making laws and regulations, the Governor General should summon, in addition to the ordinary members of the Council, not less than six nor more than twelve additional members, of whom one-half at least shall not hold office under Government. These additional members may be either Europeans, persons of European extraction, or Natives. Lord Canning strongly recommends that the Council should hold its meetings in different parts of India, for the purpose of obtaining at times the assistance of those Native chiefs and noblemen whose attendance at Calcutta would be impossible, or irksome to themselves. I do not propose that the judges ex-officio shall have seats in the Legislature; but I do not preclude the Governor General from summoning one of their number if he chooses. They were useful members of a body meeting as a committee for the purpose of discussing and framing laws, but I think it is inexpedient and incompatible with their functions that they should belong to a body partaking in any degree of a popular character. I propose that the persons nominated should attend all meetings held within a year. If you compel their attendance for a longer period you render it very unlikely that any Natives except those resident upon the spot will attend the meetings of the Council. This also is recommended by Lord Canning. Hon. Gentlemen will have noticed the great success which has attended the association with us of the Talookdars of Oude and of the Sirdars in the Punjab in the duties of administering the revenue, and Lord Canning has borne testimony to the admirable manner in which they have performed their duties. I believe greater advantages will result from admitting the Native chiefs to co-operate with us for legislative purposes; they will no longer feel, as they have hitherto done, that they are excluded from the management of affairs in their own country, and nothing, I am persuaded, will tend more to conciliate to our rule the minds of Natives of high rank. I have no intention of doing anything to make this Council a debating society. I wish, to quote an expression of Sir Laurence Peel, to render them a body for making laws. The Council of the Governor General, with these additional members, will have power to pass laws and regulations affecting the whole of India, and will have a supreme and concurrent power with the minor legislative bodies which I propose to establish in the Presidencies and in other parts of India. I come now to the power of making laws which I propose to give the Governors and Councils of the other Presidencies. Lord Canning strongly feels that although great benefits have resulted from the introduction of members into his Council who possess a knowledge of localities—the interests of which differ widely in different parts of the country—the change has not been sufficient, in the first place, to overcome the feeling which the other Presidencies entertain against being overridden,

as they call it, by the Bengal Council; or, on the other hand, to overcome the disadvantages of having a body legislating for these Presidencies without acquaintance with local wants and necessities. This must obviously be possessed to a much greater extent by those residing on and nearer the spot. And, therefore, I propose to restore, I may say, to the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay the power of passing laws and enactments on local subjects within their own territories, and that the Governor of the Presidency, in the same manner as the Governor General, when his Council meets to make laws, shall summon a certain number of additional members, to be as before either European or Native, and one-half of whom at least shall not be office-holders. It is obviously necessary that these bodies should not be empowered to legislate on subjects which I may call of Indian rather than of local importance. The Indian debt, the Customs of the country, the army of India, and other matters, into the details of which it is not necessary that I should enter, belong to a class of subjects which the local Legislatures will be prohibited from entering upon without the sanction of the Governor General. I propose that Councils rather differently constituted should be established at Bengal; and, if the Governor General thinks right, as he obviously does from his despatches, that he shall be empowered hereafter—but not without the sanction of the Secretary of State—to create a Council for the North West provinces, or the Punjab, or any other part of India which he may think desirable. It has been represented that the province of Pegu might, perhaps, be constituted into a separate Government, with a Council. I somewhat doubt whether it is at present ripe for such a change; but when it has acquired sufficient importance, no doubt the district will be better administered in that way than it is at present. By this means, while we shall attain a general uniformity of legislation, with a sufficient diversity for the differences of each part of India, we shall, I hope, adapt the system to the wants of particular localities. It is quite clear that the public works may be better dealt with by local bodies than by a central authority; but as each district might be disposed to repudiate liability to maintain its share of the army, on the ground that it would not be first exposed to danger, and as it is highly desirable that the distribution of troops should be in the hands of the central authority, I think that the army, among others, is a subject which should be left to the general Council. The Bill also gives power to the Governor General in cases of emergency to pass an ordinance having the force of law for a limited period. Questions might arise about the Arms Act, or the press, as to which it would be very injudicious that delay should occur; and we, therefore, propose to empower the Governor General on his own authority to pass an ordinance having the force of law, to continue for a period of six months, unless disallowed by the Secretary of State or superseded by an Act of the Legislature. I believe I have now gone through the main provisions of the Bill. They have been carefully considered by the members of the Indian Council, men drawn from every part of India, of every profession, and with the most varied experience. The measure has been prepared with their entire concurrence, and it has the approval of most of the persons with whom I have conversed on the subject. All I can say is that every precaution has been taken in the framing of the Bill to make it effectual for the accomplishment of the object which it is designed to achieve. Every one has been consulted whose opinion I thought ought to be taken. It has been carefully considered by the Government in India and the Government at home. I venture, therefore, to submit it to the House in the hope that, with such Amendments as may be made in it in its progress through Parliament, it may tend to the happiness of India and the prosperity of the Queen's subjects in that portion of Her Majesty's dominions. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend, in certain respects, the constitution of the Council of the Governor General of India, and to authorize making laws and regulations for the Presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay, and for other parts of Her Majesty's Indian territories.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR wished to express his hope that the right hon. Baronet would not press too quickly on the House the consideration of this matter. The despatches of Lord Canning were placed in the hands of Members only that morning, and he for one had not had time to read them. He approved entirely the principles of this Bill. It contained two principles which, in his opinion, promised to be eminently successful—one for the greater localization of the Government of India, and the other for the introduction of independent Members of the Council. Whether it would be possible to accomplish by the machinery of the Bill all that the measure proposed was matter for discussion, and he thought that time ought to be given to hon. Members to consider the provisions of the Bill, and to propose such Amendments as they might think it desirable to submit to the House.

COLONEL SYKES said, it was difficult to give a uniform legislation for a country composed of twenty-one different nations, speaking different languages, and having different habits and prejudices, but he did not think that that difficulty should prevent them from making any attempt to legislate at all. The local councils would bring legislation within a narrower sphere, and adopt it to the peculiar wants of the peoples under the respective presidencies; indeed, the Bill would only restore the power to the local councils possessed before the establishment of the Legislative Council of India, the difference being that formerly they could only pass rules and regulations; whereas for the future they would be enabled to pass laws. He hoped the legislation would be such as to insure a return on the part of the people to that attachment to this country which existed before the rebellion. He was not now about to enter into a discussion of the details of the measure; but would merely express a hope that ample time would be given to the House to consider with attention its various provisions.

MR. W. EWART thought that the legislation proposed by Lord Canning, and sought to be carried into effect by this Bill, combined the logical and central managements in a manner that deserved the praise of the House. It was quite true that the time must not be very remote when it would be possible to put in practice any scheme for the representative system in India; but we must adopt means to prepare the Natives for local self-government. He thought that the localization of India would be productive of great benefit. As far as he could understand the proposition from the Correspondence of Lord Canning, it had his approval, and he trusted that his right hon. Friend would succeed in bringing it to a successful conclusion.

MR. DUNLOP said, there were two interests which especially required representation, the trade and the agriculture of India, and he believed that that would be best attained by this combination of local with central government. Lord Canning had very skilfully laid down the distinction between the two; and he gave his cordial support to the Bill, which carried out the views of the noble Lord. He believed, however, that the credit of originating the plan was due to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who had suggested it many years ago.

MR. HADFIELD hoped the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India would turn his attention to the question of improving the laws in that country, especially in respect to the making and enforcing of contracts.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: The next Bill which I propose to ask leave to introduce is a Bill for the purpose of forming one instead of two Superior Courts in India. There is the Supreme Court, consisting of lawyers and Queen's Judges sent out from this country, which has complete jurisdiction over the three Presidency towns of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras, and exclusive criminal jurisdiction in important matters over Europeans, in whatever part of India they may be. There is also the Sudder Court. That is a Court of Appeal for all the Courts in the country, whether they are presided over by Natives or by Europeans; and it also exercises over those Courts a sort of superintendence, or what may be called the functions of a Minister of Justice. In the evidence which was given before the Committee that sat on East India affairs in 1852-53, a strong opinion was expressed by those most competent to give an opinion, that it was desirable, with a view to the better administration of justice in India, that those two Courts should be consolidated into one, which would unite the legal knowledge of the English lawyers with the intimate knowledge of the customs, habits, and laws of the Natives possessed by the Judges in the country. I was very anxious in introducing the Bill of 1853 to include a provision for effecting the object I now propose, and to empower Her Majesty to issue Her charter for the establishment of a united Court, and to lay down regulations for its guidance. But I found that the Members of the Indian Law Commission, though they were most anxious that this measure should pass, thought it would be useless to attempt to unite the Courts till certain forms of procedure were established, which would enable the amalgamated Court to do what the two Courts had been accustomed to do. I was, therefore, compelled to postpone legislation on the subject. In order to obtain the basis on which the form of procedure could be framed, a Royal Commission was issued in this country to a number of gentlemen of the highest attainments to report generally on the subject. I certainly considered myself remarkably fortunate in obtaining the assistance of the gentlemen who formed that Commission. They were Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls; Sir John Jervis, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Sir Edward Ryan, late Chief Justice at Calcutta; Mr. Cameron, late President of the Law Commission and Member of Council at Calcutta; Mr. M'Leod, of the Civil Service, Madras, also a Member of the Law Commission; Mr. Ellis, the accomplished reporter of the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench; Mr. Lowe, M.P., intimately acquainted with colonial courts of justice as well as English law; Mr. Hawkins, late Judge of the Sudder Court, Calcutta, and afterwards Secretary to the Law Commission; Mr. Baillie, whose practical professional knowledge of Indian law and Courts in the country districts there was of the utmost importance in such an inquiry. The Commission devised forms of both civil and criminal procedure, which I believe—if I may say so in the presence of gentlemen of the long robe—are superior to any that exist in this country. The House knows that more than a quarter of a century ago Lord Macaulay, assisted by many able gentlemen in Calcutta, framed a criminal code. That code was tossed backwards and forwards between this country and India; and I recollect that when I was President of the Board of Control it appeared to be no more likely to be acted upon than it had been twenty years ago. No doubt there was a necessity for some form of procedure for that criminal code, and the Commission to which I have referred drew up a form of procedure which has been under the consideration of a Committee of the Council in India. That Committee has reported in favour of the form of procedure recommended by the Commissioners, and I have no doubt that in the course of a few weeks it will have passed into a law. Lord Macaulay's criminal code has already passed into law, and I believe that at last, after so long an interval, the people of India will, from the 1st of January next, have a form of procedure and a criminal code which will bear comparison with those of the most enlightened people in any country in Europe. The Commission also recommended a form of procedure in civil cases, which is now in full force, and the result of its working shows that it has been most successful. The reports from the various districts prove that it has done much to diminish the expense, time, and amount of litigation. The Lieutenant Governor of Bengal says—

“The result of all the inquiries I have made from the Native Judges, by whom nearly all original suits are tried, and of whom I have now seen many in different parts of the Lower Provinces, is, that the new procedure, in working, has been successful, even above all hope.”

The Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Provinces

“Concurs with the Sudder Court of the North-West Provinces that Act VIII. of 1859 (the code of civil procedure) is one of the best Acts ever passed by the Legislature.”

A private letter from the Judge of Benares (Mr. W. Edwards) states that in his district, and he believes in all the districts of the North-West Provinces, the code of civil procedure has had a remarkable effect in expediting and improving the administration of justice. The number of cases pending at the close of certain periodical cras is given in the margin. These show that in 1835 the number was 1,475; in 1840, 1,640; in 1850, 1,699; in 1855, 955; in 1860, the first year of the new code, 175. The average duration of a case in each class of Courts in the district has been reduced to less than one-third since the code came into force. The total cost of 25 cases taken at random, under the old system, was 1,711 rupees, under the new, 687 rupees. The number of papers in each case under the old system was 27, under the new 11. The remaining part of the civil code to be dealt with is a work of no mean importance. Looking at the results that have arisen from the appointment of the Commission in 1852, and which ended its labours two or three years afterwards, I think I cannot take a course more advantageous for the improvement of the jurisprudence of India than to appoint a similar Commission now. I am happy to say that Sir John Romilly and others of the old Commissioners have agreed to act, and I hope they will be able to devise a civil code as good in character as the criminal code. The Commissioners also recommended the formation of district Courts in the country, a recommendation which is under the consideration of the Government of India. All the measures to which I have referred it is competent for the Government of India, there or at home, to carry out. The matter to which I wish to call the attention of the House more particularly is the crowning point of the whole, and the only one for which the sanction of Parliament is necessary. When that is done, so far as legislation goes, the whole of the recommendations of the Commission will have been carried into effect. The last of their recommendations was the formation of a high Court to exercise the functions now performed by the Supreme and Sudder Courts. The Bill I now propose to introduce has been sent to Bengal, where it has been submitted to the observation of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and the amendments suggested by them have been introduced into the Bill. The Judges of the Supreme Court of Madras were also in favour of amalgamating the Courts, and I have likewise received the suggestions of one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Bombay. The present Supreme Court consists entirely of Queen's Judges sent from this country, while the Sudder Court consists entirely of members of the Civil Service who have risen through the successive stages of the service, but who have not necessarily had the slightest legal training. With their great knowledge of local habits and customs will be united the legal training and knowledge of the English, Scotch, and Irish bars; their knowledge of Native habits and customs will be of the greatest assistance in guiding the opinions of the legal members of the Court; and the union of these two classes of Judges will constitute a far better Court than would be formed by either separately. We propose that in the new Court there shall be a certain proportion of barristers or advocates of the Scotch bar ; that there shall be a certain proportion of civil servants, and that the remainder shall consist either of one or other of those classes, or of barristers trained in India, or of Native Judges. An impression has gone abroad in India that the Government are adverse to the appointment of Native Judges. That is not so. Lord Canning has expressed a decided opinion that Native Judges, well trained, are as well qualified as any other persons to take their places by the side of English Judges in the high Court. That is provided for in the Bill, and the Judges will, therefore, be chosen from among those three classes. I do not know that I need go into any further detail respecting the Court. Its advantages are clear. We shall have one Supreme Court, one sole Court of Appeal, instead of two, and, inasmuch as the administration of justice in the minor Courts depends on the mode in which the appeals sent up from them are treated, the superior Court thus constituted will, I hope, improve the administration of justice generally throughout India. It is notorious that the greatest confidence is felt by the Natives in the administration of justice by the Supreme Court even at present. Now, according to the provisions of this Bill, the Judges of the Supreme Court may be sent on circuit throughout the country. The effect of this will be that in important cases occurring in the various districts, justice, as in this country, will be administered on the spot by a trained Judge. At present, if an Englishman commits a crime which may subject him to serious punishment, he and all the witnesses must be brought to Calcutta, and the case must be tried there. In future an English Judge going into the country will be able to try these cases. At present when a crime is committed up country by an European the necessity of bringing him to Calcutta amounts, in many cases, to an absolute denial of justice. It may be impossible in a country like India to bring justice to every man's door, but, at all events, the system now proposed will bring it far nearer than at present ; and where criminal offences are committed by a European—happily such instances are rare—the impartial administration of justice on the spot will produce a most desirable influence on the minds of the Natives. I think I need not trouble the House with any further observations upon this Bill. I trust that I shall be allowed to introduce it, and that, having some years ago, when President of the Board of Control, introduced various measures to improve the administration of the law in India, I may now be permitted to give a finishing stroke to that good work by carrying into effect the last recommendations of the eminent Commissioners who inquired into that important subject.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill “to confirm certain appointments in India, and to amend the law concerning the Civil Service there,” said,—I now have to move for leave to bring in the third Bill of which I have given notice, and I do not know that in some respects it is of less importance than the other measures which I have mentioned. I know that it excites lively interest among certain individuals, who conceive that their personal interests are affected by it; but I do not think that they will or can be affected to any such extent as should induce the House to interfere with that which I believe will be of great public advantage. The good of the public service ought, I think, to outweigh what I venture to call the imaginary injury apprehended by these persons. The object of the Bill is to legalize certain appointments which have for the last fifty years been made in India contrary to law, and to provide that in certain exceptional cases, to which I will hereafter allude, appointments may be made, notwithstanding the restrictions imposed by the old law. In 1793 an Act was passed, the object of which was to prevent jobbing in Indian appointments on the part of the Indian authorities ; and it provided that all vacancies occurring in the civil branch of the service, under the degree of Councillor, should be filled up from among the civil servants of the company. That was the law of 1793, and I am not now disposed to question that it was then a proper law. Since then, however, the state of things has undergone a considerable change. At any rate, there is not the slightest doubt that almost from the passing of this Act the Government of India found it impossible, consistently with a due regard to the public service, to adhere to its provisions. At all times the Indian Government, with the sanction of the Court of Directors, whose interest it was to maintain the rights of the Civil Service, deviated from the law to such an extent that I believe I shall not exaggerate when I say that at this moment one-third of the Indian appointments have been made contrary to law. There are three distinct cases in which the law has been departed from. According to the Act all civil appointments in India, such as existed in 1793, must be held by covenanted servants only. Now what is the case? All the civil appointments of this description that are held by military men, all that are held by Englishmen other than covenanted servants sent out from this country, and all the civil appointments held by Englishmen born in India, or by Natives are contrary to law. In the first place, in what are called the non-regulation provinces of India the Indian Government never for a moment supposed that they were bound by the law, and they have, therefore, bestowed the appointments largely upon military men and others. A few years ago, when I called the attention of the Indian Government to the salaries of the civil servants, Mr. Ricketts was desired to inquire into the matter, and reported fully upon a variety of matters, including this; and I will show, from documents quoted in that report, what are the opinions of various persons bearing upon this subject. In the non-regulation provinces, as I said, the Government never dreamed of being bound by the Act of 1793, but the fact is undoubted that in the application of this Act there is no real distinction between the regulation and non-regulation provinces, and that which is illegal in one is also illegal in the other. Perhaps there never was a more able administrator nor one who more effectually called forth the energies of those under his control than Sir Henry Lawrence. Though there is hardly any person in the world whom I should look upon as a greater authority in these matters than Sir John Lawrence, yet it is remarkable that all those who were acquainted with both concur in looking upon Sir Henry Lawrence as the higher authority of the two. Sir Henry Lawrence's opinion is given in the following words:—

"He thinks that both justice and expediency demand that military men and civilians should receive the same amount of salaries when employed on similar duties. It is for the public benefit that the present competitions for offices, especially in the higher grades, should exist."

Sir John Lawrence, himself a civilian, says—

"But a good sprinkling of military men is beneficial, especially in a new country; their presence excites emulation."

Again, Sir Henry Lawrence says—

"I go much further in my views of equalization, and strongly advocate that uncovenanted gentlemen be largely mixed with civil and military officers in the non-regulation provinces, and be paid at a similar rate. Such appointments to be by selection after approved service and strict tests from the ordinary uncovenanted ranks. Such competition would both strengthen Government and improve the tone of the services."

The above passages refer to offices in the non-regulation provinces, which have been elsewhere reserved for covenanted servants. I come now to the second class. The more general way in which the Government have proceeded has not been by appointing uncovenanted servants to fill the places of covenanted servants, but by abolishing covenanted places, and creating new covenanted places. This has been done to an extent of which hon. Gentlemen are, perhaps, not aware. In 1793, for instance, the assistant-collector must be a covenanted servant. There is no such person now of the same class as before; but there is a deputy-collector, who may be an uncovenanted servant. Sir George Clerk, in a minute drawn up while my noble Friend opposite was in office, says—

"Adherence being quite impossible with reference to increasing population, crime, and litigation, the restrictive law has been disregarded to a great extent—for instance, by uncovenanted servants being appointed Postmaster General, superintendent of police (Bombay), secretary in the Foreign Department, and by the appointment of 316 existing deputy collectors uncovenanted against sixty-four existing covenanted."

I do not blame the Government of India for this course. It was forced upon them by the necessities of the case. Sometimes they broke the law; sometimes they evaded it. It has been precisely the same in the judicial appointments. In former times the judicial officers were covenanted servants, but afterwards a new class of officials were created, called Sudder Amceens, and Principal Sudder Amceens, who are almost without exception Natives or uncovenanted servants. Here they did not break the law, but they turned the flank of it. This process is very clearly described by one well acquainted with the practice as to judicial matters of India. He says—

"The original jurisdiction in the administration of civil justice, which, in 1793, could for the most part be exercised only by civil servants, passed into the hands of the uncovenanted Judges, not by an absolute transfer of the authority of the covenanted Judge, but by a gradual augmentation of the power of the uncovenanted Judge. In like manner uncovenanted agency is now employed to a much greater extent than formerly in the administration of criminal justice, and in the revenue departments."

This, be it observed, is in the regulation provinces, to which nobody questions for a moment that the Act of 1793 strictly applies. Then we come to the last class of cases in which the Government of India has avowedly appointed uncovenanted servants to offices in the presidencies which, under the law of 1793, were held by covenanted servants. Nothing can be clearer than that in 1793 the Secretaries to the Government were exclusively covenanted servants. Now, two secretaryships—Military and Public Works—are held by soldiers, and the assistants in both cases are uncovenanted servants also. In Lord Cornwallis's time there was in the Political and Secret Department a secretary, an assistant-secretary, and eight assistants, all of them covenanted servants; at the present time the secretary and the under-secretary are covenanted servants, and the eight assistants are uncovenanted. The same has taken place in other departments, and there is no doubt that such appointments have been illegal. The assayer, the master of the mint, the military paymaster, the superintendents of police, all formerly covenanted servants, have for a considerable time been uncovenanted servants. A short time ago Sir Frederick Halliday, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, during the absence of a civil Judge, appointed an uncovenanted servant to perform the duties. The arrangement was the most convenient which could be made, but, unfortunately, he was an uncovenanted servant and the Government had to remove him. A short time before, however, an uncovenanted servant had been made a collector of revenue at Bombay, and the Court of Directors confirmed the appointment. On this, Mr. Ricketts very justly remarks—

"The same law applies to both offices. If it was illegal to appoint an uncovenanted officer merely to officiate as a civil Judge, it was at least equally illegal to appoint an uncovenanted officer to be permanently collector at Bombay."

I mention these matters not to blame the Government of India, because the necessities of the case justify them—and they are rather to be praised for making the public interest and the proper administration of the functions of Government first considerations. Lord Elphinstone not only approves this practice, but in his evidence before the House of Lords, he expresses an opinion that a Native might legally be made a collector or a Judge. Lord Auckland says—

"An absolute disqualification to all but those in the covenanted service from holding, or from even taking charge in time of emergency of the offices in question would be productive of very great embarrassment and inconvenience."

The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to refer to the authority of Sir George Clerk, Lord Hardinge, and others, pointing out the desirability of having in the public service some offices of emolument and position to which Native gentlemen of character might aspire. Lord Dalhousie, in a minute of the 26th of April, 1854, stated—

"It is a cause of constant regret with me that there do not exist in the public service some offices of large emolument and high position to which Native gentlemen of character and ability might rise, so that the office and pay of principal Sudder Ameen may no longer be the boundary of a Native gentleman's ambition in the British service."

Mr. Ricketts, notwithstanding that he might be supposed to have the prejudices of a covenanted servant, nevertheless, recommended that the uncovenanted service should be admitted to certain offices embracing Executive control. That gentleman's report stated—

"It will be observed that in the list given there are no offices embracing Executive control, but I would under each Government have a few such offices open to Natives and East Indians. If each Government were permitted to appoint three uncovenanted collectors, three uncovenanted Judges, and three uncovenanted magistrates, or Natives or East Indians thoroughly qualified for the offices, presenting themselves, choosing, of course, such districts as were best suited to the experiments, these classes would be provided with further opportunity of showing their fitness for such positions. I can see many advantages from such a partial opening of Executive offices, and no possible disadvantage, unless the advance of our native subjects towards fitness for offices of high responsibility is considered disadvantageous."

He did not think it possible that any man could consider such a result disadvantageous. With regard to the bench of the Upper District Court, Mr. Harrington, as chairman of a Committee of the Legislative Council, strongly recommended the appointment of uncovenanted servants and of Natives. That gentleman stated—

“I am bound, however, to admit that the Select Committee never contemplated, nor did they desire, that the bench of the Upper District Court should be composed entirely of Members of the Indian Covenanted Civil Service. What they hoped was that the senior or chief Judge of the Court would be a member of that service; that the second Judge would be a member of the English or Irish bar, or of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland; and that the third Judge would be selected from the uncovenanted judicial branch of the Service, which is composed chiefly of Natives of India.”

Lord Canning had recommended the admission of Natives to seats on the bench of the High Court. A case had arisen within the last few days exemplifying in the strongest manner the advantage to be derived from a provision such as he intended to propose. Lord Canning had written home proposing that a member of the Indian Council, Colonel Durand, should go out to India and take the place of Foreign Secretary, that gallant officer being most eminently fitted, in the opinion of the Governor General, for the office. Colonel Durand, at considerable personal sacrifice but from a sense of public duty highly creditable to him, responded to the invitation, and the whole of the India Council were perfectly willing that the Government of India should have the assistance desired, yet under the existing law the appointment could not be made. He had stated the reasons for taking the course which he proposed to pursue, because he was anxious to convince the House that when interfering, even to the smallest extent, with the vested interests of the covenanted servants, it was not without very strong and unanswerable grounds in the interest of the public service. His noble Friend who preceded him in the office of Secretary of State became impressed with the necessity of this change. He had found the records of his noble Friend's opinion in the office, and after careful inquiry he had come to the same conclusion. He had no intention to lower the covenanted service. That service had produced some of the ablest men whom the country had ever seen, and, no doubt, it was a great advantage that men going to India should know what prospects were before them. Those who supposed that he was about to injure to any extent the covenanted service had entirely misapprehended his views and intentions. But he thought there were exceptions in which a positive bar against the admission of uncovenanted services to office was a positive evil. The members of the uncovenanted service felt it to be a degradation and a stigma, and it was not fair to call upon them to perform laborious and onerous duties without any prospect of promotion. If they were not fit let them be excluded without a scruple, but let them not be excluded by law from the possibility of rising in accordance with their merits. In the case of Native servants, Mr. Ricketts recommended their admission. He said—

“The emulation would be useful in stimulating the exertions of both parties, useful in elevating the position of Natives generally, and making them more honest by showing trust in their honesty. The deeper the fall the greater is the fear of falling. Many a dishonest lerishtedar has made an honest deputy collector.”

He felt, therefore, that with due precautions against the power being abused the admission of uncovenanted persons, English, whether civil or military, and Natives, would be most beneficial to the public service, and he thought the request in the memorial of the uncovenanted servants expressed very fairly what ought to be granted—

“Your memorialists ask only that the supreme and local Governments be empowered to promote uncovenanted servants who have passed through a certain term of approved service in India to offices now reserved exclusively for members of the covenanted service.” * * * *

They further asked—

It was very remarkable that, although a number of distinguished men had been bred up in the covenanted service, many of the ablest administrators of India had not been covenanted servants. If one side quoted Mountstuart Elphinstone, Sir Charles Metcalfe, and Sir John Lawrence, the other could quote John Malcolm, Sir Henry Lawrence, and Sir Thomas Munro. A short time ago he was conversing upon the subject with an able covenanted servant, and he said that the change was quite right, and that he knew an instance of an uncovenanted servant who had been employed for years at a salary of £400 a year, who had seen his covenanted juniors rise to £700 a year, and who only the other day, when an officer was required for employment out of the regular course, was selected, such was his merits, for that employment at £1,200 a year. This measure had been considered by the Council. Many of them, of course, did not like breaking into the covenanted rule, but after discussion they authorized him to introduce it as a measure which had their general concurrence. It was honourable to them that with their natural predilections against the change they should have concurred in it, on the ground of the advantage to the public service. He proposed to legalize all those appointments which had habitually been made. He proposed, further, that when any authority in India should think it desirable, under the special circumstances of the case, that an appointment should be made, without regard to the Act of 1793, he should have authority to make the appointment, subject to such regulations as might be made from time to time by the Secretary of State in Council; that the appointment should be provisional; that it should be reported to the Secretary of State, with the special reasons for making it; and that, if not approved within a year by a majority of the Council, it should be void. The regulations would be laid down in England; the appointment would be made in India, and without the concurrence of a majority of the Council in England it would be void. The regulations had been prepared, and they would require, generally speaking, precisely the same qualifications as those of the covenanted service. In order to prevent the abuse of a Governor General taking out a number of friends and appointing them, it was proposed that the officers to be appointed should have resided in India seven years previously, and that they should be qualified in the language of the district to which they were appointed. Natives would be subject to the same tests as Europeans. He thought that with these restrictions no abuse could take place, and that although in an infinitesimal degree it infringed on the vested rights of the covenanted servants, they could not possibly complain of a change so eminently required by the demands of the public service. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving that leave be given to bring in a Bill to confirm certain appointments in India, and to amend the law concerning the Civil Service there.

MR. WHITESIDE believed that the

speech of the right hon. Gentleman would do a good deal to dissipate the impression which had hitherto prevailed in India in regard to this measure. He had received several letters requesting him to state to the House what were the feelings of the covenanted servants on this subject. In their petition it was set forth that the Act of 1793 contained, along with the rules of the covenanted service, a proviso that no man should be appointed to a situation with a salary of £500 a year unless he had been three years resident in India. The petitioners stated that in the territories which the Company then possessed that rule was almost universally acted upon, and pointed out the advantage to the Civil Service in inducing men of intellect to qualify themselves for the important duties of that profession. He thought that the law of the case was clearly in favour of the civil servants of the Company, because the Act just passed for the better Government of India declared that all contracts and engagements which bound the Company should bind the Crown. The petitioners, however, feared that offices which formerly could be held only by covenanted servants were to be thrown open to all persons without distinction, and prayed the House to prevent such injustice being done to them. But it appeared that the right hon. Gentleman did not contemplate such a course, because he understood that should any arbitrary act of that character be done by a Governor General of India, it would not be sanctioned by the Secretary of State. The petitioners set forth another ground of complaint, and he (Mr. Whiteside) thought it was a grievance which they were justly entitled to complain of, and that was the mode in which their retirement was regulated. They stated that they had to subscribe a large percentage of their salary to the Civil Service Fund and Annuity Fund, the objects of which were respectively to make provision for their families on their deaths, and for themselves after a certain fixed period in the service. These funds were supplied by the percentage deducted from their salaries, and they said, very truly, that if their salaries were curtailed the funds in question would of course suffer. They, therefore, claimed compensation on that account; but he did not hear the right hon. Gentleman propose to give them any. He had received a letter from a very clever and active young gentleman in the Indian service, who complained of the heavy deductions which were made from the salaries of civil servants, in addition to an income tax at the rate of 10½ per cent. The position of the covenanted servants, his correspondent showed, would be much prejudiced by the proposed change, as their promotion would be twice as slow as formerly, and their salaries much reduced. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour to frame the regulations so as to redress the grievances of the covenanted servants, and that, in conjunction with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would consider how the heavy income tax which the covenanted servants had to pay might be reduced, and less deductions made from the service money of those very useful and deserving officers.

MR. AYRTON said, he shared the belief of the right hon. Gentleman that the Act of 1793 was introduced for the purpose of suppressing jobbing; and held that there was just as much necessity for maintaining the principle of that Act at that day as when it was first passed. If he had any prejudice at all in regard to the Civil Service of India, it might be expected that, as he had been in India, but had had no connection with that service, he would adopt the prejudice against it which seized nearly all non-official residents. But, making every allowance for the short comings of the Civil Service, and the incompetency of individual members of it, he thought that, on the whole, no measure was ever passed in Parliament which had conferred so much benefit on India as that which established the Civil Service of that country on its present basis. He believed that it had contributed more than anything else to good government—as far as there had been any—in India, and, therefore, he thought it would be the duty of the House to watch with great care any proposal from the Minister of the Crown which would interfere seriously with that great institution. He entirely differed from the view which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood) took of the statute of 1793. It was a mistake to suppose that the statute prescribed that certain offices were to be filled with civil servants, and that one-third of the appointments which had been made since then were illegal. It would be very strange that such should be the case, and that it should never have been brought under the notice of Parliament. The provision in the statute was that all appointments in the civil line of the Company's service should be conferred on those only who constituted the Civil Service in India, but the statute did not specify what should be held to be the civil line of the service. Its object was to provide that the Court of Directors in England should decide what new appointments in India should be in the civil line of the Company's service, and that it should not be competent for the Governor General, or any of the Governors, to appoint their own friends to offices of such a character; but it never was contemplated by the measure that every person in the Civil Service of the Government of India or discharging any civil duties was to be a member of the Civil Service. At the very hour when the Act was passed there were a vast number of civil appointments in India which were not held by civil servants, and such had been the case to that day. There were two classes of appointments—those in the civil line of the Civil Service, and those in the line of offices held by Natives, and sometimes by Europeans in India. The former class was confined to the Civil Service, while the other was at the disposal of the Governor of India or the Governors of the Presidencies. But, after a time, attempts were made to make appointments to the line without first making representations to the Government in England, and it was to put an end to jobbing of this description that the Act of 1793 was passed. He was not at all anxious to see the Civil Service of the Government, as at present established, extended to all appointments in India. The Government here ought to consider what appointments should be confined to the Civil Service, and what should be thrown open to Natives. Claims for opening the Civil Service had always been made by Governments in the name of the Natives; but when the power of making the appointments was given it was not exercised for their benefit, but in favour of Englishmen who had the command of influence in the local administration. That was the difficulty with which the House had to deal. Ministers always said they were desirous to promote those whose claims were of the highest character; but no such considerations influenced them in the actual exercise of their power. It was used according to motives of which it seemed impossible for men to divest themselves in the discharge of their public duty. The House should take care that it did not open a new field for corruption. He would express no opinion on the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman; but, if he put forward claims on behalf of the Natives of India, there should be some guarantee given that the appointments should be open to merit, and that they should be given to Natives, and not to English adventurers, who set up comparisons between themselves and the covenanted civil servants, and complained that they did not receive the same compensation. If Englishmen were wanted to administer the affairs of India, they should be sent from this country in a regular manner; but if Natives were employed, they should be paid on a scale suited to them. The scale of remuneration to a Native of India was not more than one-fifth or one-sixth an Englishman would receive for discharging the same duty; and if the scale of salaries were fixed on this consideration it would, he thought be a strong guarantee that none but Natives would be appointed to the posts. He did not wish then to express any opinion on the measure of the right hon. Gentleman, which was one of considerable detail; but every one must feel that the course he had taken was intended to improve the public service, and was, therefore, so far deserving of support.

LORD STANLEY thought the House could not be too vigilant and cautious in considering measures of this kind, which, whether for good or for evil, must have a most important effect on the welfare of India, and he would be sorry, therefore, that the Bill should pass without full discussion. As reference had been made by his right hon. Friend to the part which he (Lord Stanley) took in the regulation of the Civil Service of India, he felt bound to take his own share of the responsibility which belonged to the preparation of this measure. Shortly after the transfer of the Government of India to the Crown an inquiry was instituted into the covenanted and the uncovenanted Civil Service; the opinion of the law officers of the Crown was taken; and he (Lord Stanley) then came to the conclusion that it was impossible to continue the exclusive privileges of the covenanted service as they had hitherto been kept up; and when his right hon. Friend became Minister for India, he ventured to sketch out the plan which he had in preparation on that subject. The plan which he was then about to introduce was nearly identical in principle with that which his right hon. Friend now brought forward. As to legislation on the past appointments in India that was a question on which the House had hardly any choice. The hon.

Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had expressed doubts whether they were illegal. But that doubt was not shared by the law officers of the Crown; and when grave doubts were raised as to the legality of so many past Indian appointments, he thought they were bound to lose no time in legalizing them and removing those doubts. As to the future, he did not think it was now worth their while to consider whether it was possible to return to the system constituted by the Act of 1793. He thought to any one acquainted with all that had taken place in India during the last twenty years, such a proposition would appear to be simply impossible. Since that time a great number of appointments had been created, and thrown open, in consequence of the insufficient number of covenanted civil servants and the enormous increase of expense which would be necessary if the covenanted service were increased in proportion. As far as these appointments were concerned, the service had been practically opened and must remain so. The practical question before the House now was, whether they would admit persons not of the covenanted service into those higher offices from which up to the present time they had been excluded. On that subject there might be said to be three different opinions. There was first the opinion of a considerable number of the members of the covenanted service, that their exclusive privileges in respect to these offices ought to be maintained. That, for reasons which he would give, he thought to be impossible, and, therefore, it was unnecessary for the present to discuss that view. There was next the opinion that a service with exclusive rights and privileges was unnecessary, and that all appointments should be thrown open; but that was a plan which, in the present state of things, he believed would lead to serious evil. It would create a vast amount of Parliamentary patronage, and special qualification for Indian duty would be neglected in the choice of Indian servants. Third, there was a combination of the two plans, on a principle like that contained in the present Bill, by which the covenanted service would, indeed, be maintained in practical possession of its present rights and privileges, without wholly shutting the door to others who fulfilled certain conditions of qualification. As to the maintenance of the covenanted servants in their present position, he believed, as he had said, they would find that it could not be done. The feeling of the Natives, and still more the feeling of the European residents, was such as to render the maintenance of an exclusive civil service impossible. It was not so much that any individual felt aggrieved at his own personal exclusion, but that the feeling of each was that he belonged to a class which by the law of India was not allowed to aspire to the conduct of the higher offices of the State; that was a position in which Europeans, at least, would never acquiesce. Again, it was impossible to say to members of the uncovenanted service, that, however useful and efficient they might be, there should be a limit beyond which they might not pass. Upon the whole he believed, with the right hon. Gentleman, that all the privileges of the Civil Service ought not to be swept away, but that energetic men now excluded from it should be encouraged to consider themselves as possible members of that body. This would put an end to the feeling of envy with which the covenanted service was at present, not unnaturally, regarded. In this settlement of the question there were, no doubt, two dangers to be guarded against; one was the danger of so diminishing the value of appointments to the Civil Service that men of intelligence and ability would no longer be induced to enter it; and you would thus be compelled to raise other men less intelligent and less able to a position in life to which they were not equal; the other, and the more pressing danger of the two, was that an opportunity would thus be given to the Governor General and other persons in high authority to raise their own friends and dependants to office to the exclusion of those who had gone through the training necessary to fit them for those stations. But these were dangers which might be guarded against, and he thought the securities provided in the Bill of his right hon. Friend were sufficient. In the first place, there was the term of residence in India which was required as a qualification. A Governor General rarely stayed in the country longer than seven years, so that by this provision he would not have the power of appointing any of his own friends, and it was not likely he would go out of his way to perpetrate a job in favour of the friends of his predecessor. Then the requirement of a knowledge of the language of the district to which an appointment was to be made did, though in a less degree, give a security that unfit men would not be chosen.

He did not know if these securities were to be inserted in the Bill itself; if not, they ought to be. These were matters of too great practical importance to be left to be dealt with by regulations which were continually liable to change. There was a third security, and he thought it the best of all. Supposing an appointment to have been made from nepotism, and in special favour of some individual, it was not likely that the Secretary of State for India would be willing to take the discredit of recommending the appointment for confirmation; and, if he did, it could not be reasonably supposed that a majority of the Indian Council would confirm it. Appointments would require the threefold sanction of the Governor General, the Secretary of State, and the Indian Council. If these securities were not sufficient, he knew not what would be. They were certainly stronger than any securities that at present existed. But what the House had chiefly to consider was whether the injury done to the members of the Civil Service would not be more than compensated by the increased security and popularity of the service itself to which the European residents in India would now be encouraged to look, instead of its being one from which they felt themselves hopelessly excluded. Under ordinary circumstances he would have reserved his opinion of this Bill till the second reading; but on this occasion, as he had some responsibility in framing it, he thought himself bound to take the earliest opportunity of expressing his opinion in its support.

COLONEL SYKES was somewhat amused that, after sixty-eight years' breach of the law, there should be so much anxiety to satisfy the minds of people in India on that point. The Act was, no doubt, passed to prevent jobbery and corruption, and he agreed that too many securities could not be taken against those evils; but these appointments were in so good hands that there could be little doubt that every care would be taken to guard against anything of the sort. He did not object to the Civil Service being thrown open to all comers who were properly qualified whether they belonged to the Civil Service or to what were called the "outsiders." But he thought to whichever class they belonged that they ought to be highly remunerated. They collected a large amount of revenue, and as judges they had cases before them involving sometimes half a million of money. They ought, therefore, to be placed above the reach of temptation and suspicion. He had no objection to the principle of the Bill.

MR. H. BAILLIE agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) that of the three Bills which the right hon. Gentleman had introduced this required the greatest caution on the part of the House. It was admitted that the Act of 1793 was introduced for the purpose of preventing jobs; and that that law had been shamefully evaded, and evaded for the express purpose of jobs, which had been carried on in India to an immense extent. He did not say that there were not cases in which the law had of necessity been evaded, as in the case of the non-regulation provinces; but in these cases it was doubtful whether the law applied, and so whether it had been evaded or not. To take the case of the Punjab for example, there were a great number of civil servants required, while there were none of the covenanted servants that could be obtained for the purpose. He had no opportunity of knowing what were the safeguards to which his right hon. Friend referred; but he had no hesitation in saying that some such Bill as the present was necessary in the condition into which the whole system of the Civil Service had fallen.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he agreed with the hon. Member that the Act of 1793 had been introduced to prevent jobbing, but he did not agree that it had been so shamefully evaded. The fact was, our Empire in the East had increased without a corresponding increase in the number of civil servants. He believed that in each of the three Presidencies the Governments had been in great straits, at times, for legally qualified persons to fill certain appointments when they became vacant. He believed that the Government had no power to reconsider appointments when once made, and he thought it would greatly facilitate a right understanding of this measure and the necessity for some enactment of the kind, if the Secretary of State would lay upon the table the correspondence which took place a few years ago in the case of Mr. O'Reilly. Independently of all considerations of justice, he thought some such measure was necessary to keep up the efficiency of the public service in India. There was always a large deficiency of public servants in India, and there was always a large number of uncovenanted servants. The hon.

Member for the Tower Hamlets had called those adventurers who went out to India to fill the situations which were vacant there; but surely they were perfectly justified in offering their services. The hardship was that this large number of civil servants, who had shown themselves equal in merit to the covenanted service, were debarred from filling the high offices to which their merits entitled them; and this Bill only enacted that a man who had distinguished himself in the public service should be competent to hold the high appointments to which his merits gave him a claim to aspire. As an instance of the injustice of the present state of things, he might mention the case of Mr. Venables, an uncovenanted civil servant, who during the mutiny remained in his district, and, unaided by any covenanted civil servant, exerted himself energetically and successfully. The merits of that gentleman were recognized by the Government, which regretted that it had not the power, because he was uncovenanted, to appoint him to the posts which he was justly entitled to fill. Mr. Venables could not be allowed to administer the affairs in a district in ordinary peaceful times, though he had shown himself able to do so in a time of mutiny, and the highest reward that could be conferred upon him as an uncovenanted civil servant was £1,200 a year. In order that the House might clearly see how the present regulations acted, he should move for the production of the correspondence concerning Mr. O'Reilly; and he hoped that the House would in the meantime agree that it was desirable to adopt means for advancing civil servants of extraordinary merits, and at the same time to adopt precautions against jobbing.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that as this country had now assumed the direct Government of India it behoved the House of Commons to be careful that they did not by precipitate legislation produce ulterior evil consequences. A sister Bill to the present one was introduced into the House last year, consisting of one clause only, and which excited very general alarm. That Bill simply proposed to suspend recruiting in the Indian army, and yet it involved the interests of a large service and the position of a large number of officers, who were anything but satisfied with the regulations which that Bill proposed. Although the present Bill was short, yet it might introduce a new principle, and be a departure from those sound principles of good government by which we had so successfully established the British Empire in the East. He was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman had spoken with the utmost moderation as to the extent to which he intended to interfere with the Civil Service in India. The Civil Service of India was composed of persons who had devoted themselves from their earliest youth to that service. Having once embarked in that service, no other was open to them; and having entered for those prizes which they looked to attain by long service, it was not fair to let in others over their heads to prevent them attaining that object which had induced them to enter the service, and for which they had exposed themselves to a trying climate and suffered a long expatriation. It would be unjust if the best prizes should be taken by civil servants who had not been entered in a regular manner. In the case of those who since the new regulations for opening the Civil Service to competition had entered the service it would be still more unjust, for it would expose the élite of the youth of this country to the risk of being shut out from the highest prizes by persons who had better influence and more powerful friends in this country. As Lord Macaulay had said, the civil servants of India were distinguished by integrity, disinterestedness, and public spirit, and their just rights should be respected. He agreed with the noble Lord below him (Lord Stanley), that the regulations which the right hon. Gentleman intended to establish ought to be embodied in the Bill. They ought not to be left to the judgment of the Secretary of State, as one Secretary might have different views with regard to them to those of his predecessor. If it was found necessary at home to lay down precise regulations in Acts of Parliament, how much more requisite must it be when we were dealing with the case of a distant empire. The right hon. Baronet had quoted very high authorities, most of whom were desirous of opening the Civil Service to Natives of India, in favour of his Bill; but he thought that the House ought to have been put in possession of the opinions of the Members of the Council of India on this Bill. A Special Committee of that Council had been appointed to consider this measure, and it was understood that they were not unanimous in their expression of opinion upon it. Some of them saw the danger of placing so much patronage in the hands of the Minister, and required certain safeguards to be introduced. He thought it was a dangerous principle to introduce a Bill of this kind with a few simple clauses leaving to the Minister of the Crown afterwards to fill in the details in any way he pleased, and denying to the Indian Council the opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the subject. Unless the right hon. Baronet produced the papers which he had declined to give the other evening, and unless he consented to introduce into the Bill the regulations to which he had referred, he should himself propose clauses which would prevent men being sent from this country to fill places of profit which were now reserved for the civil servants.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked whether the Secretary of State would introduce into the Bill a regulation requiring every man appointed under this Bill to have a knowledge of Hindustani?

MR. VANSITTART hoped from the speeches which he had heard that the apprehensions which he had entertained with regard to this measure were unfounded, and asked whether the Secretary of State would lay on the table the dissents of the members of the Special Committee which had considered this Bill? The right hon. Baronet had, with reference to the first of these three Bills, moved for Correspondence which in a great degree supported his measure, and he hoped that he would grant him a similar favour with regard to this one.

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, that it would be absurd to require a man who was to be employed in the Madras Presidency to be acquainted with Hindustani—a language which probably no one else in the presidency would understand. He would, before the second reading of the Bill, which he proposed to fix for that day week, consider the propriety of introducing the regulations into the Bill. He did not think it desirable to produce the Reports of Committees of the Council made to the Secretary of State. If the House insisted upon the production of such Reports, the only result would be that the Secretary of State would never appoint a Committee. He might, however, repeat what he had before stated, that he introduced this Bill with the general concurrence of his Council.

In reply to a question from Sir MINTO FARQUHAR,

SIR CHARLES WOOD was understood to say that the dissents which were to be produced to the House were such as were prepared by members of the Indian Council in cases in which they dissented from the decision of the majority of the Council, or from that of the Secretary of State, if he overruled the majority.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR inquired when the right hon. Gentleman intended to take the discussion on the Bills?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would fix the second reading for that day week.

Bill to confirm certain Appointments in India, and to amend the Law concerning the Civil Service there, ordered to be brought in by Sir CHARLES WOOD, Viscount PALMERSTON, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL.

Bill presented, and read 1<sup>o</sup>, to be read 2<sup>o</sup> on Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 164.]

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. AYRTON complained that one of the clauses would have the effect of extending hawkers' licences to a new class of persons. The words were "any tradesman or person who went to ask for an order for goods;" and, although commercial travellers and agents were specially exempted from the operation of the Act, it might be argued that shopkeepers themselves fell within the definition.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the law of hawkers was one not easy to construe and apply. The intention of the Bill was not to interfere with the established practice except in one particular case. That was the case of persons who, being hawkers in every other respect, yet escaped the licence tax through selling their goods by sample. The clause would not extend to any person who had a shop.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 15 (imposing a penalty on persons signing any agreement for the hire of a furnished house),

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the words of this clause were so loose that they might make the counsel who was instructed to draw a lease liable to a penalty of £20 for not presenting it with the proper stamp to the parties who were to sign it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the words to which objection was taken were, "And also any agent or person who shall prepare or be employed in preparing" the instrument.

- Sir Charles Wood

The intention of those words was to bring within the scope of the penalties of the clause the responsible person employed in the preparation of the agreement and who presented it to the parties for signature. The old principle of the Stamp Laws made attorneys and solicitors who prepared such agreements liable to a penalty for presenting a document to the parties which was not duly stamped. That was still the law of the land; but it was not usual to sue for these penalties, because the legal profession generally obeyed the law and presented to their clients documents with the proper stamp. But it was well known that house agents often framed these agreements without the intervention of a solicitor; and the object of the clause, therefore, was that the person whose business it was to present the agreement to the parties in order that it might be executed should be liable to a penalty if he did not present it duly stamped. The words of the clause were, he thought, not too wide, and any court of law would, doubtless, confine them within the plain reason and object of the enactment. No person would be able to sue under this clause except the revenue authorities.

MR. AYRTON was not aware that attorneys and solicitors were bound under a penalty, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, to see that every deed they prepared was duly stamped, and he should be glad to have the statute containing such a provision pointed out to him. One difficulty was this, that there was nothing to connect the default of the agent with the default of getting the agreement stamped. There was another difficulty, arising from the fact that it was not stamped paper exclusively which was to be used, because adhesive stamps might be applied. On looking at the whole clause, he could not but think that we were going far in the direction of penal legislation with respect to stamps. At present an agreement might be stamped six weeks after signing; but if this clause were passed a person could not sign a paper at the moment without the necessary stamp. The time might be late at night or early in the morning, and the place one at which a stamp could not be procured at the moment; and, therefore, it was going very far to say that a person must not sign the agreement without affixing the stamp. This was an abrogation of the present law for which there was no necessity, because the provision applying to the non-validity of unstamped agreements was sufficient for all purposes. It was not necessary that these agreements should be in writing at all, and people ought rather to be encouraged to make use of written agreements, in order to prevent misunderstandings, than be deterred from so doing by legal obstacles such as those now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. The House ought not to deal with a question like this as if penalties were matters of course. It was not sufficient to say that the authorities would not be likely to make any undue use of a penal enactment—it was the duty of Parliament to consider very carefully how far there was a necessity for any penalty before it consented to it. He was sorry to say that in this respect the reformed lost by comparison with the unreformed House of Commons. Previously to the Reform Act the Members of the House of Commons felt that they occupied a position in which they were jealously watched by the people, and in which great caution, when dealing with matters like that now under discussion, was necessary on their part; but now it seemed to be very much the custom to have a popular cry, and to pay but little attention to legislative details on subjects to which that cry did not apply. He begged to move as an Amendment to leave out the words, “and also any agent or person who shall prepare or be employed in preparing the same.”

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “Instrument,” in page 6, line 12, to the word “shall” in line 13.

MR. CRAUFURD thought the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton) applied to the whole clause.

MR. HADFIELD objected to the clause because it imposed the penalty on the person who prepared the document, and not on the offending person who got the signature attached.

MR. HENNESSY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether or not this clause altered the law which permitted the stamping of agreements with respect to the six weeks?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was not aware that there would be any alteration in the law of agreement with respect to subsequent stamping.

Question—“That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill”—Put, and agreed to.

On Motion that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,

MR. AYRTON said, he had not divided

VOL. CLXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

on his Amendment in deference to some hon. Members who preferred voting on the clause. He opposed the clause because it would introduce the singular anomaly of making it penal to do what the law allowed. A letter and its answer constituted an agreement in law with regard to letting apartments, if stamped, and the law permitted the stamping of one of these documents when the transaction was completed. The present clause abrogated that provision by requiring the stamp to be affixed before the agreement was completed under a penalty. Before they passed such a clause they should abrogate the whole law of agreements. He trusted this system of penal legislation would not be persisted in. He thought it most objectionable that the Board of Inland Revenue should have the power of imposing these penalties or not at their pleasure.

MR. HENNESSY said, the clause would impose the penalty of £20 on the second of two parties to an agreement who did not, because he could not, sign on the stamp, simply because the stamp had been already obliterated by the first signature.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that precedents of similar penalties were abundant, and they all rested on the principle of this clause. The objection of the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton), indeed, went far beyond the clause, and was directed against the whole provision of the law which required that documents should be written on stamps. The after-affixing of the stamp was the exception not the rule. In the case of policies of insurance, bills of exchange, promissory notes, proxies, &c., parties were liable to positive penalties for not making use of the proper stamp. It was said that many of these agreements were made by correspondence, and arose constructively out of the effect of correspondence. On that point he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. But with such cases this clause had nothing to do. It was meant to apply, and he was advised that it did apply exclusively to those cases in which formal agreements were drawn, intended to be signed in common by the parties. If words could be devised, unexceptional in themselves, and excluding these constructive agreements, the joint effect of correspondence, in order to make the intention of the clause more clear, although he was advised it was clear already, he should make no objection. He wished to act on the principle on which they had acted in regard to bills and parcels, to make a low charge, and to take security by means of a penalty against any evasion of the charge. These transactions were of a very fugitive character, and hardly ever came under the view of any person but those immediately concerned, and there would be no security for the payment of the charge without a penalty.

MR. HADFIELD said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was quite right in calling attention to the matter. He objected that where correspondence was going on, and the person letting apartments consented to accept the proposal, the agreement being thus made, by this clause the person sending the letter would be rendered liable to a penalty for not writing on a stamp. He hoped the clause would be withdrawn.

MR. HENLEY said, that half the transactions in life were matters of correspondence, and if a memorandum were made, and a penalty enforced because it was not stamped, it would be introducing quite a new law, which would be carried out into all the other descriptions of stamps. It appeared to him that this was a matter of very grave consideration. If a difference arose which had to be settled in a court of law it was usual to get such agreements stamped on paying the penalty, in order that they might be available as evidence; but there was nothing to compel people to stamp such agreements, if they did not wish to do so. If he understood the clause aright there was to be a penalty imposed if an agreement was not stamped, whether the parties wished to use a stamp or not. This was introducing a new state of things which might prove very serious indeed. He wished to know whether it was intended to enforce the penalty if the memorandum was not subsequently required to be stamped?

MR. CRAUFURD said, that by the old Stamp Laws a deed could be stamped on payment of the penalty and brought into Court for examination, but the Court took no notice of the previous omission of the stamp. Now, however, the Court took judicial notice of the want of a stamp, and inflicted an additional penalty. This, he thought, gave sufficient protection to the revenue. The effect of the clause might be to encourage verbal contracts, and thus the revenue would rather suffer by it than otherwise. The whole of the circumstances had evidently not been taken into consideration by the advisers of the Inland Revenue, because it was clear that it would make almost every letter a constructive agreement. He thought the clause should be withdrawn.

MR. PULLER said, that there was no other case in which an immediate penalty was inflicted when liberty was given to the parties to stamp the agreement afterwards. The penalty which was inflicted upon the parties for not obliterating stamps was quite sufficient to meet the case.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he was quite prepared to amend the clause by inserting words to this effect, "provided that nothing herein contained should be considered to render persons liable to a penalty on account of any letters or correspondence by post, containing proposals for the letting or taking of a house." He must say that if the objections to this clause were so strong as to ensure its rejection, he must also drop the clause which provided for the reduction of the duty, taking his chance of getting the present high duty where he could upon agreements for letting houses.

MR. SPEAKER stated that the Proviso could not be added unless the Amendment were withdrawn.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he would bring it up at a subsequent stage.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause 15, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 38: Majority 34.

Bill to be read 3<sup>o</sup> To-morrow.

QUESTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I wish, before the House goes into Committee, to address to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question, of which I have given him private notice in writing. I think it, in the first place, due to myself to say that I had no wish to intrude on the attention of the House in the early part of the evening—[previous to the postponement of the Orders of the Day]—and that in rising then I simply desired to give the noble Lord intimation that it was my desire to suit his convenience in drawing attention to the subject to which I am about to advert. The Speaker, however, having, in the courteous discharge of the duties of his office, called me to order, I at once

gave way, and, though I am reluctant now again to trespass on the time of the House, yet I am quite sure hon. Members will perceive, from the contents of a letter which, with their permission, I will read to them, that the question to which it relates is one deserving of serious consideration, affecting, as it does, not one, but 700 of our fellow-countrymen in a foreign land. The inquiry which I have to address to the noble Lord is, What steps, in consequence of a pledge which was given some nights ago by the Prime Minister, have been taken by Her Majesty's Government with reference to the religious persecutions to which British merchants, 700 in number, resident in the South of Spain, are subjected, notwithstanding the assurances that indulgence would be extended towards them which have been received by the noble Lord from the Spanish Minister? I wish also to learn whether the noble Lord has any objection to lay on the table copies of any Correspondence on the subject which may have passed between the English Government, their agents in Spain, and the Spanish authorities? Now, it will be in the recollection of the House that I put a question about three weeks ago to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Foreign Secretary, with regard to the outrages which have been committed with the official connivance of Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Xerez, against a number of British subjects resident within the official district of the Consulate of Cadiz. The noble Lord at the head of the Government gave upon that occasion an explanation of that satisfactory nature to be expected from the frankness of his character; but I received a letter only yesterday from the South of Spain, on behalf of a numerous body of merchants, informing me of facts of which I was not before aware. We were told by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on the 17th of April last, that the Spanish Minister had given assurance that every indulgence would be extended to the British merchants and families resident in the south of the Peninsula; but I did not then know that which I can now affirm, that those merchants were in possession of direct and positive authority from the British Minister at Madrid, to hold the services of the Church of England in their own houses in that part of Spain. It appears, however, that, in direct violation of the sanction thus given, this privilege has been withdrawn, and I feel assured I do not appeal in vain to the House of Commons when I ask them whether the fact that 700 of their fellow-countrymen are forbidden, not only in the Consul's house, but in their own private residences, to pursue the exercise of that religion which is the faith of the country to which they belong, is not one which calls for some expression of opinion on their part? The information which I have received shows, I regret to say, that the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs has not acted up to the assurances which were given us by the Prime Minister, because, up to the 27th ult., no proceedings had been taken on this subject by our Minister at Madrid or the Consul at Cadiz, so far as I am informed from credible sources, in consequence of any despatch received by them from the Foreign Office. I will now, if the House will allow, read the letter to which I have alluded, which has not been got up for the purpose, of creating a fictitious sympathy, but which comes from an honest English merchant, representing a large number of his fellow-countrymen. The letter is as follows:—

“Up to the present Mr. Brackenbury has received no communications either from the Foreign Office or from the British Legation at Madrid as regards this case; and, consequently, he does not feel himself justified, as I learnt from an interview I had with Mr. Brackenbury yesterday, in referring to the British Government the whole case as it stands. It may be interesting for you to know that by the late census we have under our Consul's district (Mr. Brackenbury's) no less than 700 British subjects—namely, 400 males and 300 females—all of whom are deprived of the services of our Church. A large number of these are families of engineers, with young families, among whom our late curate had commenced a steady and useful work, by devoting three days in each week to visiting them and teaching the young children. Were Mr. Vice-Consul Gordon to allow us protection of our flag, all might go well. In this hope I address you.”

Now, it is, I contend, rather too bad of the noble Lord, who can exert himself actively enough in party and political squabbles, to neglect in this respect the duties of the office which he is charged to administer. Those merchants whose cause I am pleading are surely entitled to some respect, and the noble Lord must be aware that the reports, as well from our Minister at Madrid as from our Consuls in other parts of Spain, clearly prove that a system of persecution is carried on in that country to an intolerable degree, not against Spaniards only—of them I will say nothing now—but against our own fellow-subjects, who expect to be supported by the British Government in the enjoyment of those privileges which they are unquestionably entitled to exercise. In finding fault with Vice-Consul Gordon, I am happy to be able to say that he is an exception to the general practice pursued by our representatives in Spain. For example, our Vice Consul at Seville is a Roman Catholic. Nevertheless, his drawing-room is open to British residents in that city—and there is a large glass factory there in which numbers of Englishmen are employed—for the purposes of Divine service. Another of our Consuls has actually fitted up a chapel for the celebration of the services of the English Church. Yet, notwithstanding these examples, Vice Consul Gordon forbids our fellow-countrymen within his jurisdiction not only to enter his house but to exercise the rites of their religion under the British flag. This is a case, Sir, which it clearly becomes the House of Commons carefully to consider. I do not mean to trespass upon the time of hon. Members now by entering into further details with respect to it, but I would ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs if he would seriously direct his attention to a matter which these merchants whose cause I am advocating declare to be of vital importance to them—namely, that facilities for holding Divine service on the Sabbath should be afforded them—a privilege, with an earnestness with which we must all sympathize, they maintain to be of as much importance as the free exercise of civil rights. I trust the noble Lord may be able to give us some assurance that the severity which has hitherto been resorted to in the case of those gentlemen is likely to be abated, and that the promises of greater indulgence in their regard given by the Spanish Minister may be carried into effect.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The hon. Baronet has come down to the House, and, without any notice to me that he was about to make such a charge as the present—

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wrote to the noble Lord.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In the evening, after I came into the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The noble Lord was not in his place yesterday or the day before.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: That is true, but the usual mode of proceeding is to give notice in the Votes. The course, however, which the hon. Baronet took was to inform me about five o'clock this evening that he intended to introduce to the notice of the House the question of the persecution of the Protestants in Spain, giving no intimation of his intention to bring the charge against me that, my noble Friend at the head of the Government having given a pledge that certain matters should be inquired into and certain grievances as far as possible redressed, I entirely neglected to do anything towards redeeming that pledge.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg the noble Lord's pardon—

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: That was the hon. Baronet's statement.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg the noble Lord's pardon. What I said was this, that the communication to which I referred was written to me from Cadiz on the 27th of May; that the writer stated he had, on the previous day, seen Consul Brackenbury, who informed him that up to that time he had received no communication on the subject from either the British Minister in London or the British Legation in Madrid; and, therefore, I think I was justified in saying that the noble Lord had not paid that attention to the matter which I was led to believe he would have given to it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I have no doubt that when the gentleman wrote the letter he thought Mr. Consul Brackenbury had not received a communication; but the hon. Baronet is hardly entitled to say that I entirely neglected the matter. The fact is that, my noble Friend having informed me what had passed in the House, I examined and considered the papers relating to the subject, and immediately took steps to remedy the evil complained of. Those steps were taken a very few days after the hon. Baronet had put his question. It is quite true, as the hon. Baronet has stated, that Mr. Gordon, our Vice Consul, had acted quite unjustifiably, because though, being a Roman Catholic, he would not allow his house to be used for Protestant worship, yet when the British merchants and inhabitants pointed out another person, a British merchant, as being willing to give up his house for that purpose, Mr. Gordon said that that proceeding would be against the law of Spain—that Protestant worship was only permitted in Spain under the flag and in the house of the Consul or Vice Consul, and that he could not be a party to such an infraction of the law as was suggested. I make some allowance for Mr. Gordon saying that he did not choose to have Protestant worship in his own house, but then I think he was bound to give every facility for the performance of Protestant worship elsewhere. Sir Andrew Buchanan, when this letter came to his knowledge, suggested to Mr. Brackenbury that it would be well, as Vice Consul Gordon felt bound by his conscience not to allow Protestant worship in his house, for him to point out some other person who would act as vice consul without having the same scruples in respect to the service of the Church of England. That letter was written some months ago, but Vice Consul Gordon did not offer any resignation of his position. What I did after reading the correspondence was this—I wrote to Mr. Brackenbury, desiring him to point out some fitting person to act as Vice Consul at Xerez, and I ordered that proper communications should be prepared in order that an exequatur might be obtained from the Spanish Government for the person so appointed. It is quite true that a short time elapsed before this was done, for owing to a multiplicity of business the matter escaped my notice; and, therefore, it is quite possible that Mr. Brackenbury might not have received it up to the 27th ult. But as soon as I receive from Mr. Brackenbury the name of a fit person to act as Vice Consul at Cadiz I shall immediately apply for an exequatur for him. I think this but fair, because, considering the circumstances in which not only Protestant but Roman Catholic vice consuls have allowed Protestant worship to take place, there appears to be some peculiar hostility to the celebration of Protestant service on the part of Mr. Gordon. With regard to what has been taking place of late years in Spain, Sir Andrew Buchanan, who has been some time in Spain, does not share in the opinion expressed by the hon. Baronet. Sir Andrew Buchanan says that, so far as the Spanish Government are concerned, they do not wish to execute the law in a manner at all oppressive and injurious to British merchants; and he mentions as an instance, that when Lord Howden was at Madrid, that noble Lord wrote word that in consequence of the exertions of my noble Friend near me (Viscount Palmerston) who was then Secretary of State he had obtained permission for the formation of a cemetery at Madrid, where Protestants might be buried; but it was cautiously provided that there should be no procession, and that the clergyman should not wear his surplice or other ecclesiastical habit; whereas, shortly after his appointment as Envoy, there took place at Madrid the funeral of a Protestant, followed by a procession of a great number of persons who had known the deceased, and a Protestant clergyman, wearing his surplice, performed the funeral service; and this, Sir Andrew Buchanan thinks would not have been allowed several years ago. I will not enter further upon the general question, but when I receive a letter from Consul Brackenbury, and the Correspondence is complete, I will produce the papers, and the hon. Baronet will then be able to judge of the case from a knowledge of all that has passed.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I do not mean in any way to cast any imputation upon the noble Lord, but I wish to point out that as it takes only five days to communicate with Cadiz, and four weeks have elapsed since the answer of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was given, I thought upon the receipt of this letter of the 27th May that the noble Lord might in the hurry and flurry of political discussions have forgotten the subject. But I wish to make this further observation—perhaps by way of explanation—with respect to the statement of the noble Lord, that in Lord Howden's time there was a certain amount of liberty of conscience allowed to Protestants, that since that time laws have been passed abolishing all that took place in Lord Howden's time.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: What I said was that Sir Andrew Buchanan had stated that, whereas in Lord Howden's time certain things were not permitted by Spanish law and by the Spanish Government, some of these things were now permitted.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN GAOLS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth had referred to a subject affecting 700 British subjects in Spain; but the subject to which he now wished to call the attention of the House referred to thousands of British subjects in this country, and involved a case of much greater oppression and religious persecution. He was told that quite close to that House there stood the Tothill Fields Prison; and in that prison, as in all others, the unfortunate Roman Catholic inmates were debarred from all religious worship, and that a priest was not allowed to minister to them. Some months ago the Roman Catholic clergyman was allowed to meet the Roman Catholic inmates of Tothill Fields Prison in a cell, a dozen at a time. The privilege was afterwards extended, and the Roman Catholic clergyman was allowed to meet them altogether in a corridor; but, as that arrangement was considered to interfere with the discipline of the prison, the clergyman was again obliged to address them in batches of ten or twelve. This privilege was afterwards withdrawn, and he could not blame the prison authorities, as the Solicitor General had given it as his deliberate opinion that, according to law, the Roman Catholic clergyman could only address the prisoners individually. He hoped the hon. Baronet would succeed in his object; but he thought that when their attention was called to the grievances of British subjects abroad, they ought also to look a little at home. He hoped the hon. Baronet would assist in relieving his own countrymen confined in English prisons from this sort of religious persecution.

Mr. WHALLEY agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that it was to be regretted that his co-religionists were deprived of the services of their priests, and especially that their unfortunate position prevented them from attending their regular places of worship; but there might be good reasons for this, which did not at all apply to the case of the Protestants in Spain, which had called forth the remark. Prisons were places intended for reforming criminals; and as he had not been contradicted, and could not be contradicted, in the statement which he made the other night, that Roman Catholic priests were enjoined, as part of their religious duty, to teach contempt and disobedience of the laws of this Protestant land, and which duty they were often known most zealously to perform, it appeared natural enough that the poor prisoners while under the public charge should be saved from the risk of such teaching. Add to which, if Roman Catholics could demand admission for their priests, every person of every other denomination of Christians could, with far more reason, demand like admission for their spiritual teachers. Moreover, Roman Catholic priests also almost invariably attempted some proselytism or some breach of the law if admitted within gaols or workhouses, and no wonder, for it was their positive duty to violate rules which prevented their effecting what they believed to be for the good of their Church. Thus, in addition to the general difficulty of admitting ministers of any creed to gaols, there was a special objection to the Roman Catholic priest.

Mr. CLIVE said, he believed it was not the case that Roman Catholic inmates in Tothill Fields Prison were debarred from religious worship. He would, however, inquire into the facts, and if the hon. Gentleman would give notice and ask him a question on the subject he would be prepared to state exactly what the facts were; and he would ask his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General to give his legal opinion on the subject.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, that having been a visiting magistrate for twelve months at Tothill Fields Prison, he could state that during that time no complaint had been made by the Roman Catholic prisoners that they were deprived of the opportunity of religious instruction.

ANCHORS AND CHAIN CABLES.

QUESTION.

Mr. LINDSAY said, that the other night he called the attention of the House to the price paid by the Government for anchors. He then showed that the Admiralty were paying three times more than the market price for anchors, and that the contract for anchors had been for twenty years in the hands of one firm, and was not open to competition. Since then he had received a letter from a large manufacturing firm of iron chains and anchors in the north of England, stating that the Spanish Government were paying them £20 per ton for anchors less than the Government were paying, and that these anchors were to be exactly the same as the Admiralty anchors, and to be proved by the same tests. They further stated a fact of which he (Mr. Lindsay) was certainly not aware before; and this only showed the advantage that was gained by discussions in that House. It was this: that the contracts for chain cables as well as for anchors were not thrown open to public competition, but were placed in the hands of a particular firm. He hoped the noble Lord would state what were the prices that were paid by the Government for chain cables. Out of 792 anchors supplied in 1855 125 were rejected, because they would not stand proof; whereas another firm which had supplied anchors for fifteen years had only one rejected. He wanted to know how it was that that same firm which supplied the anchors had the exclusive opportunity of supplying cables also?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had distinctly told his hon. Friend that the same firm supplied both the anchors and the cables. In 1841 there were two firms which contracted for chain cables and anchors as well as Mr. Lennox Brown. Those firms had since failed, and since then Mr. Brown alone had supplied them. He would now state that if any firm would make a proper offer to the Admiralty they would be prepared to consider it, both as regarded anchors and cables. The prices charged by the present contractors were occasionally revised, according to the market prices of the day, and, therefore, it was not fair to say that the Admiralty were paying at an excessive rate for their anchors and cables.

IRON SHIPS.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE wished to call the attention of the House to the improvidence of using timber which had been already cut, in the construction of the frames of iron ships. These timbers had been cut for ships with "rising floors," and it was not yet settled what was the best form for iron ships. He objected to iron ships being constructed until the previous question as to their form was settled. He intended at the proper time to move that no contract for iron-clad vessels be entered on, by converting timber ships or otherwise, until the form best calculated for efficient men-of-war be decided on by a committee of men of science and men of practical knowledge. He objected to any "reconstruction" of the navy until this preliminary question were settled, for otherwise great and useless expense would be incurred. The reason for using those timbers already cut seemed to be to keep out of the Estimates for the present every item of expense possible; but it would be the height of folly for the purpose of keeping the expenses of this iron fleet out of the current expenses of the year to run the risk of having to reconstruct our navy.

MR. BENTINCK thought that it deserved consideration whether the application of these already-cut timbers to iron ships would not result in a complete failure, and the House should also consider whether the object in keeping out of the present Estimates every possible item of expense was not, by keeping down the Estimates, to bolster up an unfortunate Budget.

He should be glad to have an assurance from the Government that the real intention was not to make the figures meet, and to throw dust in the eyes of the House as to the likelihood of an augmentation of the Navy Estimates being needed.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH thought, that the Admiralty were placed in very great difficulty in the matter. One set of Gentlemen called on them to get up as rapidly as possible a fleet of iron-cased ships, and another blamed them for endeavouring to make the best of the resources at their command. They could not prepare such a fleet as seemed to be necessary immediately if they did not cut down some of their three-deckers. While on this subject he would beg permission to remind the House that they were at the present moment in perfect ignorance as to whether the Warrior would or would not be able to resist the description of shot to which she would be exposed in the event of being engaged with an enemy's ship armed with rifled cannon. Some officers of great experience were of opinion that she would not. He thought the questions of thickness of the iron-casing; of the midship section of the ship which would regulate the general shape; and of the power of resistance of the bow and stern to heavy shot should be determined as soon as possible.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET in explanation said, that in constructing the five ironships it was intended, whilst using the already cut timbers, to lengthen the vessels twenty feet amidships, so that they would get rather flatter floors and great additional displacement, in order to enable them to carry their armour and their guns. With regard to the question of cutting down line-of-battle ships, a measure which probably ere long will have to be undertaken with a view to casing them with iron, it must always be remembered that their displacement, particularly the smaller ones, is not sufficient to enable them to bear the weight of a very powerful armament, and that they will only be available for coast defences, with very light masts and small stowage of provisions.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £460,835, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of New Works, Improvements, and Repairs in the Naval Establishments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH asked for an explanation of an item of £160,000 which appeared in reference to works at Chatham. He wished to know whether it was included in the total of £902,000 with regard to which a Committee was to be appointed? He also wished to know whether the Committee would have the power to consider other plans besides those proposed by the Admiralty, and select that which they deemed the best; because he was sure that eminent civil engineers would not entirely approve the plan of the Government? He was of opinion that £902,000 would not be sufficient for the works contemplated unless convict labour only was used, and in that case the delay would be so great that no Member of the House would live to see them completed. He complained that only £1,400 was taken for the naval barracks at Devonport, estimated to cost £80,000. It was a pressing service, and they were told the plans were not yet matured. If a civil architect had been asked to supply the plans they would have been ready in six weeks or two months; but with the great amount of business in the department of the Director of Works, delay was inevitable, notwithstanding the great ability and industry of that excellent officer Colonel Greene, who is now at the head of that Department. He asked for several explanations of small items, and concluded by moving, in pursuance of notice, to reduce the Vote by £3,225 for additional accommodation for spinning machinery at Chatham, which he believed to be unnecessary, the more especially, as he understood, that the machine spun rope was vastly inferior to that spun by hand.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that Government had agreed to strike out that item. As to the £160,000 put in the first column, it was the estimate which had stood for years for the embankment of St. Mary's Island and the erection of a malthouse. It did not include the docks or basins, or any of the large works for which the estimate amounted to £902,000. The sum voted by Parliament last year for new works, &c., had been more nearly exhausted than usual. Only a small sum was taken for the naval barrack, because a site had not yet been acquired. He hoped, however, that they would soon get one.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the item of £3,225, for Additional Accommodation for Spinning Machinery at Chatham, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

Put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £400,610, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of New Works, Improvements, and Repairs in the Naval Establishments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR asked for explanations as to the naval barracks at Devonport. He hoped that accommodation would be given alike to officers and men.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was expected that the barrack would accommodate 2,000 men and officers, very much upon the system of military barracks. He was not prepared to say that it would possess all the room and convenience of a permanent military barrack. Economy would have to be studied, but every moderate comfort would be provided for both officers and men.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the continued expenditure on Keyham dockyard, which, up to the 31st of December amounted to £1,334,000, and greatly exceeded not only the original but the supplementary Estimates.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE thought that a sailor had as much right to be well lodged as a soldier, and he objected to anything like a reduced system of accommodation. These barracks ought to be part of a system, and ought to be built in relation to the duties the men would have to discharge in connection with their ships. He wished to know what had been done towards dredging out the bar at Portsmouth harbour? The Government had acted most wisely in beginning the principle of salting their own provisions, for he was sure that if the measure was carried out a very superior article might be served out to the seamen.

MR. CHILDERS objected to the ordinary annual expenditure for dockyards being brought into this Vote, which was especially for new works.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the question of converting the Naval Hospital at Yarmouth into a lunatic asylum for the reception of the patients who were now kept at Haslar Hospital was under consideration. There were, he knew, some objections entertained to the proposed asylum, but he believed the site was an eligible one. As to the Vote for machinery, it had been the practice of late years to introduce hydraulic cranes and other mechanical appliances into the dockyards, in order to supersede manual labour; and those changes were, of course, attended with a considerable outlay.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT hoped the Admiralty would reconsider their determination with respect to the hospital at Yarmouth.

MR. WHITBREAD admitted that the water at that hospital was not the very best, but other water of a very good quality could be easily obtained in the neighbourhood.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that his question had not been answered relative to the works at Keyham.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE asked whether the Government would lay on the table the papers respecting the establishment of a lunatic asylum at Yarmouth? Yarmouth would, he was afraid, be an inconvenient situation for such an institution, which ought to be in close proximity to our great naval establishments. It was rather alarming to hear that the asylum intended for invalids was not provided with good water.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET had no objection to the production of the papers in question if his right hon. Friend moved for them. With regard to the works at Keyham, no doubt they had cost more than was originally expected; but, as we had been increasing the size of our ships, it was necessary to enlarge our basins, dock-gates, slips, and, in fact, everything else in proportion.

MR. LINDSAY had great doubts whether Chatham was the right place to provide additional basin accommodation. This ought to be left to the decision of the Select Committee; and till that Committee had given in its Report he thought they ought to pause. He would move, therefore, that the Vote of £15,000 for these works at Chatham be omitted.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, an increase of basin accommodation for the English navy was urgently required. The French, with a smaller number of ships, had a much greater acreage of such accommodation. For this purpose Chatham was the best naval port in the kingdom; it was the most difficult of access, and the best protected by nature. It was, therefore, the safest position for works of this kind. The next question in connection with such great works was where they could be executed cheapest. St. Mary's Island was public property, and the narrow creek running between the island and the dockyard could, by very little engineering skill, be scooped out into basins. At Chatham there was a large convict establishment, and bricks could be made there. About £10,000 of the Vote was required to close up the creek.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that one of the greatest arguments in favour of Chatham was that it was a good place for making bricks, which was a singular recommendation for shipbuilding. It was certainly secure, and likely to be more so, for he believed it would soon be high and dry. In a few days public opinion would be much enlightened on this subject, when he believed the whole scheme must be abandoned.

MR. LYGON said, the question as to convict labour had been practically decided by a former Vote.

MR. DALGLISH doubted if it was desirable to employ convict labour at such expense on the embankment. If the Medway was to be deepened the expense would be still more enormous. What advantages had Chatham over other ports for building iron ships? They could be built cheapest where coal and iron were nearest. For iron ships the Admiralty should have chosen the Mersey or the Clyde. He should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that Chatham was not selected for the purpose of building iron ships. This plan was adopted before iron ships were thought of, and its great recommendation was that it was an inland port, and instead of requiring to be fortified like Portsmouth, it could be defended against any enemy at little cost by a few ships. He hoped that the Committee about to be proposed would be granted; but in any case, this extension of basin accommodation would be necessary, and he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £451,610, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of New Works, Improvements, and Repairs, in the Naval Establishments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

HIGHWAYS BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS hoped there would be no objection to the second reading of this Bill, which had been frequently postponed. There was no opposition, he believed, to the principle, and the whole subject could be fully discussed in Committee.

MR. HODGKINSON said, an hon. Friend of his, who intended to move an Amendment, had left the House, believing that the Bill could not come on to-night.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed that the only Amendment that could be moved on the second reading was that it be read that day six months.

MR. HODGKINSON said, that was precisely the Amendment his hon. Friend intended to move.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 110; Noes 31: Majority 79.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 9 (Description of Children liable to be sent to School).

MR. HENLEY expressed an opinion that the wording was too vague, and asked how it was intended that the commission of "an offence punishable at law" should be proved? Was it by the record of a previous conviction, or by hearsay evidence of some person, who had been told by somebody else, who had heard from the relieving officer that an old woman had informed him that the child had stolen an apple? The description "frequents the company of reputed thieves" was likewise vague and objectionable. These institutions were really doing a great deal of good, and the managers of them would do well not to make the drag-net too wide,

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied that if the wording of the clause was confined to previous convictions it would limit the operation of the existing law, which conferred on magistrates a power of committing under the Vagrant Act, though, in practice, that power was inoperative, as magistrates felt afraid to exercise it. The definition having regard to "reputed thieves" had been introduced with the same object, of increasing the discretionary power of magistrates. "Reputed thieves" was a phrase having a perfectly recognized meaning in the police courts. But if it was feared that these words were so loose that they might be used arbitrarily he had no objection to their being altered.

MR. LIDDELL, as a magistrate, bore testimony to the difficulty which was felt in administering the existing law.

MR. KINNAIRD hoped the clause would be retained in its present shape, as it was very desirable that the class referred to should be brought within the provisions of the Act. "Reputed thieves" were, in fact, very well known characters. Their appearance was as familiar to the police as that of any hon. Member. If any Gentleman chose to accompany a police-officer to their haunts he could point them out one by one. They were, in fact, as notorious as the leaders of that House.

MR. HENLEY was glad his hon. Friend had so explicitly stated the operation of the clause. The objection which he felt was levelled precisely at this discretionary power of locking everybody up. He had no doubt the policeman at the door entertained his own opinion of every hon. Member who passed him, and that not in all cases of a complimentary character. Policemen were like mad doctors, who thought everybody mad, and would prove it too, if they were paid for it. He felt sure, if they accompanied a policeman, as proposed, they would hear him say of a good many persons, "That feller ought to be locked up." "As for such a one, he ought to be hanged." How were they to know anything, about "repeated thieves," unless they lived with them? He supposed the fathers and mothers would be "reputed thieves," and would be locked up too.

MR. HENNESSY moved to omit the third paragraph of the clause, "Any child apparently under the age of twelve years that has committed any offence punishable by law or frequents the company of reputed thieves."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that those only were to be sent to an industrial school who had been brought within the cognizance of the law. In point of fact, the provision was a mitigation of the present state of the law. The justices would have a discretionary power, and it was not likely that they would send all the children brought before them to these schools. He wished the first part of the clause to be retained, but the other portion might be very well omitted.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH supported the Amendment. The Committee had not been told that this was a substitution of industrial for reformatory schools.

MR. HENLEY said, that children could not be sent to a reformatory until they had been convicted. But they might be sent to industrial schools under this clause, if they had committed an offence punishable by law, which might be felony or even murder.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS must remind the Committee that to reject this paragraph would be to destroy the efficiency of the Bill. It was left within the discretion of the justices whether children of this tender age were to be committed for trial or sent to an industrial school. The object of the clause was to withdraw from corrupt influences and from association with reputed thieves children who might otherwise become the inmates of prisons and reformatories.

MR. CAVE thought the clause as it stood of great value. Any one familiar with reformatories must have been struck with the small and trifling character of the offences with which the children were usually charged. He considered that these industrial schools would be the proper places for many of these children; they would be kept at a smaller expense, and, therefore, so far from increasing the Estimates would have a tendency towards economy.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought the Bill offered a premium to crime, inasmuch as a child would only have to commit a crime punishable by law, to be at once provided for by the State, without punishment, and without loss of character. He hoped the clause would be rejected.

COLONEL STUART thought it worthy of consideration whether the managers of these schools should not come upon the parents for a certain amount where they were able to pay.

LORD NAAS thought that the clause gave too large a discretion. It would be better to define the sort of offences with which the magistrate should be allowed to deal.

MR. HENLEY asked, was the magistrate to convict the child before he could send him to school?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS apprehended that the magistrate would not convict unless there was an information laid before him.

MR. HENLEY observed that, in cases of petty theft, when the offender was brought up by a policeman, there was no information.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there was what amounted to an information in the cases referred to by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, a statement on oath before the magistrate. In the cases to which this clause was intended to apply the magistrate should be satisfied on credible evidence that there had been an offence against the law.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN observed that such evidence could only be evidence on oath.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the intention was to avoid the stigma of a reformatory.

MR. WHALLEY thought that the wording of the clause was too wide.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the clause was only intended to apply to children under 12.

MR. AYRTON suggested that the sum to be paid by the parent should be, not "such as the justice shall think fit," but "sufficient for the child's maintenance at school."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS promised that words to that effect should be introduced.

MR. HENNESSY moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 63: Majority 43.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

LORD BROUGHAM trusted his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would be able to give the same answer which had been given in the other House to his inquiry whether a Commission was prepared and would be forthwith issued for examining the state of the great public schools. He trusted that such inquiry would be subject to no exceptions of establishments under the Universities, or Cathedrals, or other Collegiate body, or of institutions having special visitors. The necessity of inquiry now arose from such exceptions having been introduced into his Bills of 1818 and 1819, and which had prevented the inquiry into, and correction of abuses at that time and ever since. But for the inquiry having thus excluded the great schools, the evils now complained of would long since have been remedied. He had most reluctantly allowed these exceptions to be introduced into the Bill of 1818, but as the second reading of that Bill had only been carried in their Lordships' House by a sort of political miracle in these days, against the opposition of Lord Eldon and the Government, he felt certain that unless he agreed to the exception, the measure must have been lost in its subsequent stages. The year after 1819, he had attempted to get rid of the exception and without success. But the Education Committee had while it sat, after the Bill with its excepting clause passed, inquired into some of these institutions, and had found that the cases where the greatest abuses and errors prevailed were in those institutions which came within the exception. Therefore, he trusted that the inquiry about to be instituted would have no exceptions whatever.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR could assure his noble and learned Friend that the Commission was general and without any exceptions. But he was happy to state that the greatest readiness had been certified by the great schools to further and assist the inquiry by every means; so that it was found unnecessary to introduce any Bill for the purpose of giving powers to the Commissioners.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise, according to notice, to move the second reading of this important Bill. I had last year the honour of proposing for your Lordships assent a portion of this measure, but under circumstances of a different character. Notice was then given by a noble Lord, whose former connection with office as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and his present connection with the Treasury gave weight to his opinions on a subject of this kind, for the rejection of the Bill. On that occasion your Lordships' House was crowded and great excitement prevailed. I, therefore, thought it necessary, even at the risk of being very tedious to your Lordships, to go at great length into all the details of the Bill, to endeavour to anticipate all the objections which I thought might possibly be urged against the proposals of the Government, and to make every appeal, as urgently as I properly could to your Lordships, to take the course which seemed to me expedient and prudent with regard to so important a measure. And I cannot help believing that the arguments I then used have had some effect, for we find ourselves this year met to discuss the same Bill upon a somewhat different footing. My Lords, it was not until this morning that notice was given of any Motion adverse to the Bill; indeed, from statements made in "another place," if I may advert to them, I drew the conclusion that it was not likely any opposition would be raised to it in this House; and if I am not mistaken the noble Earl the leader of the party opposite, stated at a City entertainment that it was not his intention, should the Bill pass the Commons, to offer to it in this House any further opposition. For these reasons I do not now certainly anticipate the rejection of the Bill. A noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) has, it is true, given notice of a Motion for its rejection; but I can hardly believe him to be serious in so suddenly adopting what your Lordships must feel would be a most serious step for this House to take, by thus placing itself in opposition to the other House of Parliament, and on grounds which, until I hear them again stated and heightened, I can hardly believe to be tenable. The notice of the noble Duke has, I believe, already excited great alarm among the mercantile community. But I cannot believe that alarm to be well founded—I am rather inclined to assume that the noble Duke put his notice on the paper merely with the intention of infusing spirit into the debate, or possibly with a view of showing that his confidence was not quite unbounded in the noble Earl who is generally regarded as the leader of his party. The noble Duke, perhaps, wishes to show that he can take his own course with respect to a great question; but I can hardly imagine that he means to press his Amendment to a division. With this conviction I shall confine myself to a very simple statement of the substance of the Bill, and of the principal reasons which have induced the Government to recommend it to the adoption of this and of the other House of Parliament; reserving to myself the right of replying at greater length should any argument be put forth in the debate requiring in my judgment more detailed observation and remark. I beg to say, however, that I do not take this course with any view of deprecating discussion. On the contrary, I think it most desirable that the measure should be most fully debated; but I think that, in the first instance, the course I have indicated will be the most convenient to the House. It is not my intention to go over the financial plans of Her Majesty's Government in detail; I will merely recall a few circumstances connected with the Budget of last year. I will merely state that the results were not altogether satisfactory; that there was a deficiency, as compared with the anticipated revenue, of £850,000; and adding to that the extreme sum of £800,000, as saved by the non-repeal of the paper duties, there would have been a total deficiency, as compared with the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of above £1,600,000. To explain this deficiency we have only to look to one fact, and it is one of extreme importance. It was Mr. Huskisson who, speaking of a deficiency in a year following a bad harvest, stated, without meeting contradiction, that the average diminution of revenue likely to be produced by a bad harvest in this country amounted to 7 per cent upon a revenue of £60,000,000. Upon that calculation last year, instead of a deficiency of £1,600,000, the sum ought to be, with so bad a harvest as we unfortunately had, something like £7,000,000. I think, in addition to the estimate of Mr. Huskisson as to the effects of a bad harvest, it is hardly necessary to appeal to the fact that more than 20,000,000 quarters of corn have been imported into this country within the year, nor to appeal to the personal experience of any noble Lord who is connected either directly or indirectly with agriculture, that there was a great deficiency last year in the production of food for man and beast. Therefore, while on the one hand I think it is a satisfactory proof how recent commercial legislation, by enabling us to obtain a sufficient supply of food, has tended to the advantage of the revenue and the comfort of the country, I may also say that to my mind it also shows that if the last harvest had been, not a good one, but an average one—that sort of harvest upon which calculations are always based—the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have exposed himself to the charge, not of over-estimating, but of under-estimating, the produce of the revenue. As to the provisions of this Bill, I may say that the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been made, not in any fanciful manner, but in the mode in which all past Chancellors of the Exchequer have made their calculations, and the same which, probably, all future occupants of that office will continue to adopt—namely, careful comparison of the opinions of the heads of all those departments which are especially conversant with the facts:—and this appears to me the most sensible mode of approaching the question. From those calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer it appears that there will be a surplus in round numbers of about £2,000,000. Although some doubts have been thrown upon that surplus, yet I think I may say that the time is now past for calling in question the existence of a surplus. It is quite clear that, if there are doubts upon such a point, those who entertain them are justified in seeking to turn out the Government or that particular Minister whose calculations they believe to be mistaken; but as a general rule, so long as the Executive Government are permitted to retain office their calculations are accepted as correct; nor, indeed, could they be held accountable to legislative control unless their statements be accepted as the basis on which their propositions are to be founded. And it seems that in "another place" all the hon. Gentlemen formerly connected with office who took a prominent part in the discussion frankly admitted that they considered the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were correct, and that was still more proved by the fact that a large and important section of the other assembly proposed to reduce the surplus by an amount greater than was proposed by the plan of the Government. Having, then, this surplus to dispose of, we come to the question as to the manner in which the Government propose to deal with it, and which is embodied in the Bill which is now before me. In the first place it is proposed to reduce the income tax from 10*d.* to 9*d.* in the pound. I am very glad to have to propose such a reduction, and I am sure that satisfaction is shared by all of your Lordships, and I am also sure that we should all be very glad if a still further reduction could conveniently be made. The feeling, however, is so general upon this subject that I have heard no practicable mode suggested on either side for the further reduction of this tax. Then comes the question of tea and sugar. Upon these articles the Bill proposes to continue the same duties as were levied last year. It would have been agreeable to Her Majesty's Government—as it would beyond doubt have been agreeable to many out of Parliament—if they could have proposed a reduction of duties upon articles which tend so much to the comfort of all classes of the community. Some attempts have been made to prove that the tea and sugar duties press more heavily upon the poorer classes than upon the richer. ["Hear."] A noble Earl cheers the observation; but my answer to it is that four years ago the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir George Lewis, made a statement to the other House, founded upon very careful calculations, showing that in round figures about 60 per cent of the duties upon those articles was paid by the richer classes, leaving about 40 per cent to be paid by the poorer classes. That statement was adopted by the present leader of the Opposition in the other House, who has himself filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The reasons which have induced the Government not to propose any reduction in the tea and sugar duties are these. In the first place, all experience has shown that a small reduction of duty does not produce to the consumer that proportionate decrease in the price of the article that a larger reduction would do, and it is quite clear that a small reduction in the amount of these duties is all that the revenue at present could afford. In the second place, by diminishing the amount of these duties we should not in the slightest degree diminish the cost of collecting the duties; and also, although it is certainly most desirable to reduce these duties whenever an opportunity shall occur, yet the increasing revenue derived from these articles of consumption proves that there is not that urgency for a reduction which would otherwise exist. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, did not think that there was any urgency for such a reduction in the duties on tea, as we could possibly have proposed: and with regard to sugar, I do not think any proposal with reference to that article was made in any quarter. There is another smaller item in this Bill which it is not necessary to dilate upon. The only reason for raising the Excise and Customs' duties upon chicory is to protect the revenue and to prevent adulterations of coffee by means of that article. I now come to the question of the abolition of the Excise duty upon paper. Last year I detained your Lordships for nearly an hour, pointing out what I considered to be the imperfections and impolicy of that tax. However feebly I may have urged those opinions, they must have had, I think, some effect, as, with the exception of one or two casual remarks, no answer was attempted to be given to the statements that this was a tax which impeded the manufacture of paper; which affected all who had the sale of that article in this country; that it was a tax which pressed in a slight degree upon every article that was sold, an export duty upon all articles sent abroad which were necessarily wrapped up in paper. I showed, too, how injurious it was to commerce, and how it operated to check the diffusion of cheap literature. I showed, most conclusively, I believe, that it operated most injuriously upon the diffusion of cheap literature, and that the tax operated a hundredfold more to the injury of cheap publications intended to spread political and educational knowledge than it did upon that deleterious literature which has too wide a circulation among the people. I do not intend to go over that ground again: the arguments for and against the repeal have been long before the public. I will merely state the position in which the Government found themselves when they attempted to deal with this tax. They were aware of the amount of authority in favour of its repeal. During an agitation of thirty years what has happened? A Commission which was presided over by one of the most able financiers upon this question condemned the tax in strong language. An abstract Resolution, recommending its abolition, passed the House of Commons. The speeches of private persons—of almost all the leading men of both parties, including the noble Earl opposite; the present leader of the Opposition in the other House; Lord Stanley, Sir Bulwer Lytton—who, notwithstanding political associations, has recently shown how strong an opinion he entertains upon the subject—all have condemned the tax. That condemnation has been conveyed in words such as these, “morally and physically wrong, “bad in theory and in practice.” Upon this tax the Government, upon its responsibility, proposed to legislate. The House of Commons passed the Bill after many discussions and divisions. It then came up to this House, and your Lordships rejected it; but on what ground? Nobody, as far as I can recollect, spoke in favour of the tax, or expressed any abstract dislike of its repeal. The language held was that the state of things either at the time of its first being proposed or subsequently made the repeal improvident; that there was no surplus to deal with in the way of remissions; and that, therefore, as a measure of prudence, and with a view of keeping sufficient money in the Exchequer, it would be wise to retain the tax for the present, and give the House of Commons another opportunity of considering the subject. Surely, then, the Government would not now be warranted, believing that they have more money at command than they had last year, when they proposed to repeal this tax, if, other circumstances remaining unchanged, they did not renew their proposal to abolish it. Had they refrained from doing so, I scarcely know how they could have met the remarks which your Lordships might have made upon their inconsistency. It might have been said that the rejection of the repeal of the paper duty having taken place, not upon the merits of the tax, but upon other grounds, and those other grounds no longer existing; and as, moreover, they were in justice to the people going to propose the remission of taxation, it would be unfair that the only bone of contention between the two Houses, and which might at any moment bring about a difference of feeling between them, should not at the earliest opportunity be removed. There is only one other point to which I will refer before I sit down. I have spoken as to the substance of this Bill. Let me now say a few words as to its form. The principal parts of the financial scheme of the year are on this occasion included in one measure. I think hardly anybody here will suggest that such a course is not perfectly constitutional and consonant with precedent. In 1787 Mr. Pitt—certainly no enemy to the established institutions of this country—introduced a comprehensive financial scheme founded on no less than 3,500 distinct Resolutions, and containing a schedule of sixty pages. Objection was raised in this House to the measure, on account of the multiplicity of the provisions which it combined; the question was fully debated, and on a division your Lordships adopted the Bill in the shape in which it stood. On another occasion Mr. Pitt took the same course. In fact, in 1808, 1809, 1810, and every subsequent year up to 1822, similar precedents were established; so that as to the strictly constitutional and regular character of the present Bill there can no possible doubt. Your Lordships, as I have said, threw out the Paper Duty Repeal Bill last year. I will not now argue whether that proceeding was constitutional or wise; but all will, I think, acknowledge that whether the reasons for it were sufficient or insufficient, it was at least unusual. Some excitement was, doubtless, created in the other House of Parliament by that result; but I must say that the conduct of the House of Commons—both last year and this, singularly moderate as it was—was, I believe, owing, in a great measure, to the calm, sagacious, and temperate manner in which the Government proposed that the matter should be dealt with. A Select Committee of the other House sat on the subject, of which Mr. Walpole, formerly Home Secretary in the Ministry of the noble Earl opposite, was the Chairman, and that Gentleman himself proposed a Resolution declaring that the House of Commons had lost much of its power by the recent habit of enacting taxes for an unlimited time, and that that power might be recovered by the House if the different parts of the financial scheme of the year were combined in one measure. [The EARL of DERBY: That Resolution was moved, but not carried in the Committee.] But a Resolution in strict analogy with the passage contained in the draught report was moved in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister, and unanimously agreed to. Her Majesty's Government thought it the only course respectful at once to the House of Commons and to your Lordships to act in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, concurred in as those recommendations were by the leaders of all parties in the other House. This Bill was accordingly introduced, and while it places the House of Commons in the position which it ought to maintain in respect to the taxation of the country, it certainly offers no sort of affront or insult to your Lordships. On the contrary, it was thought more respectful to your Lordships, instead of bringing in again separately the measure which you before rejected, to bring it in coupled with the other portions of the Budget, inasmuch as it was more likely to be agreeable to you to consider and adopt it in that form than to deal with it in a manner having anything like the appearance of the retraction of a previous decision. I think, my Lords, we are all agreed that whether or not you were justified, in circumstances of supposed emergency, in arresting the alleged rash financial measures of the other House of Parliament, it is not for this House to be constantly interfering with the details of public finance. And if that be so, it must be more convenient to your Lordships to have the whole fiscal scheme before you in one view and to discuss it in its entirety, instead of piecemeal. It seems to me that that course leaves the rights of both branches of the Legislature, whatever they are, very much as they were before; your Lordships retaining intact the power of rejecting, if you cannot alter, Money Bills. I will now only express my earnest hope that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Rutland) will withdraw the Amendment of which he has given notice, or that, if unfortunately he persists in it, he will not be assisted by the majority of your Lordships. I believe that by adopting this Bill we shall undoubtedly attain three great objects. In the first place we shall complete that commercial legislation which has been so universally useful in developing the industry and unshackling the enterprise of this country, thereby increasing to an almost incredible degree that revenue from direct, and still more from indirect taxation which has enabled us to meet our present large expenditure. In the second place, we take away the only irritating question which I firmly believe now remains between the two Houses of Parliament, and which is likely to engender a bad feeling between them; and, thirdly, you will record a practical protest, by passing a measure partly for a reduction of the income tax, and partly for the repeal of the paper duties, that it is not the intention of the Legislature to sanction a project which I hold would be injurious to this country — namely, the adoption of a system of direct taxation alone as the only means of supplying the wants of the national Exchequer. For these reasons, my Lords, I beg to move the second reading of this Bill.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND: My Lords, in rising to move the Amendment of which I have given notice I feel I must throw myself on the indulgence of your Lordships for that kindness and consideration which you have ever evinced towards me. I can assure your Lordships that in putting myself forward on the present occasion I am solely influenced by the fact of seeing no notice on the paper to undertake the task of moving the rejection of this Bill, which I believe to involve a very great injury to the Constitution. When the noble Earl taunts me with having put my notice upon the paper only yesterday, I must be allowed to remind your Lordships that the second reading of the Bill was only announced on the notice paper of the previous day. I should have thought that for a Bill of this vast importance the noble Earl would have given your Lordships a much longer notice. Under the circumstances I have not been enabled to discuss the question with that complete information I would otherwise have obtained. I think, my Lords, that this is a question, both politically, financially, and constitutionally, of the very greatest importance. My principal objections to this Bill are threefold:—In the first place, I object to it because I venture to doubt whether you have any real or substantial surplus. In the second place, I object to the Bill, because, even if you have a surplus I am prepared to maintain, with the concurrence of the majority of your Lordships, of the majority of the House of Commons, I believe of the majority of Her Majesty's Ministers themselves, and certainly of the majority of the public out of doors, that a greater amount of benefit would be conferred in the reduction of the taxes on tea and sugar than by the abolition of the tax which this measure proposes. I have a third objection to the measure. I consider that it comes before us in such a shape as paralyses your Lordships' action and prevents your giving that consideration to the subject which a proposition of this magnitude demands. In reference to my first objection, I must say I think it is much strengthened by the doubtful and hesitating way in which the noble Earl who moved the second reading alluded to the existence of a surplus. In addition to this, since the Customs' Bill has been introduced, there is already £175,000 to be deducted from any surplus that may be said to exist—namely, £150,000 for the Stade Dues, and £25,000 for the increased interest during the next six months on Exchequer Bonds. And when the noble Earl referred to the deficiency of the late harvest, as not having entered into the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his last Budget, I ask your Lordships whether you are more secure this year against the occurrence of such a calamity than you were the last? I hope and trust that the harvest may be a good one; but who can be so bold as to say that he can prognosticate with certainty that our harvest this year will be more abundant than the last? Now, my Lords, with regard to the second objection—what duties should be taken off, supposing you have a real and bond fide surplus. I will put it to your Lordships whether any person who considers this subject in a fair and impartial spirit must not at once admit that the labouring classes consume more tea and sugar than they do paper, and whether, therefore, they would not benefit more by the reduction of the duty on tea than by the repeal of the Excise on paper? I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will himself agree with me on this point, because I remember that last year when introducing his Budget he felt the difficulty of his position, and distinctly admitted that directly the labouring classes would benefit more by the reduction of the tea and sugar duties than by the abolition of the paper duty; but, then, he added, they would benefit indirectly, because it must be remembered that every pound of tea and sugar must be wrapped in paper. Now, however, with that boldness for which he is so remarkable, with that subtlety which is so startling, with that ingenuity in which no one surpasses him, he comes forward with a different plea, and recommends your Lordships to repeal the paper duty, not because their repeal would directly benefit the consumer—for he has now discovered what we on this side of the House have been telling him for the last twenty years that the consumer does not benefit in anything like the proportion the revenue loses by a repeal of the duties of Customs and Excise; in fact, the right hon. Gentleman admits that one-fourth only of the reduction of duty went into the pockets of the consumer—therefore, he now urges the advantage that will arise to trade, and the expansion of commerce which will be the consequence of the repeal of the paper duties. As to the benefit to commerce, I should be glad to know how or in what manner the repeal of the paper duty will assist commerce more than a reduction of the duties upon tea and sugar? The noble Earl, in alluding to the tea duties, said that 40 per cent of tea was consumed by the lower classes, and 60 per cent by the upper classes. I will not venture to contradict the noble Earl, but I maintain, that if the duty upon tea were lowered so as to bring the article more within the reach of the consumption of the labouring class, that more people would be enabled to consume that beverage, and that they would receive more benefit from the reduction of the duty than from the repeal of the whole Excise on paper. But what is the time at which we are called upon to take off the paper duty? Is it a time when all around appears tranquil and secure? Are there no indications of approaching difficulty? Are we quite certain we shall not require this tax we are now called upon to abandon? If we look abroad, across the Atlantic, what did we see? A nation plunging into civil war. The cannon has already sounded, and is reverberating on our own shores. We know not whether we may not be drawn into that contest; we know not what demands will be made upon us; yet this is the time when we are called upon to give up, without any benefit, some million and a half of revenue. Again, if we looked at Italy—that country which had but lately emerged from a revolution—what do we behold? Monarchy destroyed, with hardly any settled Government; authority overthrown, a generous and excitable people given up alternately as the prey to a victorious army, a disbanded soldiery, and a desperate brigandism. Only yesterday we heard, with the deepest regret, however much some of us may differ from his political views, that the great mind that has hitherto kept together the elements of that divided and unhappy country has passed away; and who can tell what the future of that country will be? Then if we look nearer home—if we look to the two countries which stand so close to each other—divided, or, as Mr. Cobden happily expressed it, united by a few miles of sea—what do we there find? While each with one hand signs a treaty of commerce, with the other both nations are convulsively grasping the hilt of their swords, each doubtful of the other's intentions. Mr. Cobden, who is looked up to as a great authority on all occasions, has lately come from Paris, and your Lordships will, therefore, look to his testimony with the greatest possible interest. And what does Mr. Cobden say? In his speech yesterday, on the occasion of his receiving the freedom of the City, the hon. Gentleman stated that he viewed with the greatest alarm the naval preparations that are going on in France and England. His speech is so remarkable that if I were not afraid of wearying your Lordships I should very much like to read a short passage from it. Mr. Cobden said—

“ Even now there is much that is doing by the Governments of the two countries which is calculated to fill us with disappointment, if not with dismay. Probably at no time in our history—and I say it advisedly—had France and England so large a warlike preparation in the only means of war by which they can be brought into collision as at this moment in a time of peace. It was not too much to say that at no period of history were ever France and England so prepared by formidable naval forces for hostile operations against each other as at present; and this is going on—if we may believe what we read and hear—at the present moment simultaneously with this commercial treaty which is intended to facilitate the intercourse between the two nations. There is something saddening and inconsistent in this fact.”

The speech goes on in the same strain; and at the close Mr. Cobden says that even if France were preparing for war we should prepare for peace, and we should have it. These are Mr. Cobden's sentiments; but, my Lords, I am sure that while France is the initiator of these great naval preparations—while she is building these leviathans of war—there is not one of your Lordships who will not concur with me in the opinion that if this great commercial country has any regard for the maintenance of her position and the security of her colonies she must be, at all events, equally prepared to defend herself as that great and powerful Empire of France. I trust I may be allowed to express my admiration, in common with all patriotic loyal Englishmen, at the spirited address which the Prime Minister of this country made to the House of Commons the other night on the occasion of the discussion upon the Navy Estimates. The noble sentiments expressed by the noble Viscount thrilled every patriotic breast in England. My Lords, I come now to the third objection I have made, and I approach it with the strongest possible desire to say nothing that can in any way provoke any spirit of rivalry or hostility in the remotest degree between the two Houses of Parliament. I come now, I say, to the constitutional part of the question—to the position in which your Lordships have now been placed by the manner in which the Bill has been sent up to your Lordships' House. A proposition for repealing a tax and also for the imposition of taxes has been sent up in one Bill. My Lords, when I see so many noble and learned Lords around me so much more capable by their learning, their ability, and their experience, to guide and instruct your Lordships on so delicate and difficult a subject, I will not venture to dive into the depths of this part of the question; I will not venture to do more than to draw your Lordships' attention to this subject, in order that we may be favoured with their opinion of the position in which we now stand, in consequence of the step that has been taken—I will not say by the House of Commons, and I will not say by Her Majesty's Government—but I will say by that overruling and powerful mind which seems to guide both the one and the other. Now, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) said we are now placed in a very different position to what we were last year. Then the Bill was sent up to repeal the duty, which Bill your Lordships decided not to assent to, not in consequence of its merits, but in consequence of there then being no surplus: but the noble Earl says we are now in a different position, that we cannot now reject the proposal to repeal the paper duty on the ground and for the reason we rejected it last year, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer has now shown that there will be a surplus at the close of the current financial year; and he, therefore, hoped your Lordships would not divide upon the matter. But, my Lords, if this is the case, I want to know why the present proposal has not been sent up from the other House in such a shape as would have enabled your Lordships to consider and pass a deliberate judgment upon the repeal of the paper duty apart from the other details of the Budget? I apprehend, notwithstanding all the noble Earl has said about the certainty of a surplus, that it was a suspicion that your Lordships would again throw out any proposition for the repeal of the paper duty that has induced the Government to adopt the underhand course of "tacking" their proposition with respect to the paper duty to a Bill containing other provisions, and so sending it up to this House in a shape which should prevent your Lordships from resisting it, without at the same time interfering with the other financial arrangements for the year. Almost every constitutional authority—and amongst them Lord Macaulay—had concurred in condemning the practice of "tacking" Bills. Lord Macaulay in his History, vol. 5, p. 274, gave the following striking condemnation of the practice:—

"Not only—such were the just complaints of the Peers—not only are we to be deprived of that co-ordinate legislative power to which we are, by the constitution of the realm, entitled. We are not to be allowed even a suspensive veto. We are not to dare to remonstrate, to suggest an amendment, to offer a reason, to ask for an explanation. Whenever the other House has passed a Bill to which it is known that we have strong objections, that Bill is to be tacked to a Bill of Supply. If we alter it we are told that we are attacking the most sacred privilege of the representatives of the people, and that we must either take the whole or reject the whole. If we reject the whole public credit is shaken; the Royal Exchange is in confusion; the Bank stops payment; the army is disbanded; the fleet is in mutiny; the island is left without one regiment, without one frigate at the mercy of every enemy. The danger of throwing out a Bill of Supply is, doubtless, great. Yet it may on the whole be better that we face that danger, once for all, than that we should consent to be, what we are fast becoming, a body of no more importance than the Convocation.

Now, my Lords, I will call your attention for one moment to the position which the noble Earl (Earl Granville) asks us to occupy. And I will ask what is the use of a debate which is to have no practical end? If the whole thing is already settled, because the House of Commons have sent up the whole financial arrangement for the year in one Bill, which your Lordships cannot alter or amend, I ask what is the use of my wasting my breath and your Lordships' time in addressing you? We are even placed, by the course which has been pursued, in a worse position than any other class in the country. We are told that we are not competent to have an opinion, and if any one of us ventures to give expression to our views, as the noble Earl below me (the Earl of Derby) did at the Mansion House, we are told that we should wait till the Bill is before us before offering even an opinion in reference to it. I would briefly call attention to the views entertained by the people of France in regard to retrospective debates. I perceive from the correspondence of The Times that in an article in the Revue des deux Mondes they condemn the practice of debating questions in the French Chambers after they have been practically decided, and remark on the happier condition of this country, where all-important questions are decided by the Legislature. Yet this is the very position your Lordships are now invited to occupy. I have now, briefly, my Lords, and I fear, very inefficiently, laid my reasons before you for the course I have pursued, and I hope your Lordships will consider this measure is one which ought not to become an Act of Parliament. I have only taken the part I have done because I could not find that any other noble Lord proposed to move an Amendment, and, therefore, I ventured to move one, as I think this Bill is so adverse to the interests of your Lordships, and to those of the country at large, that I venture, at all events, to enter my protest against its passing your Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, no one who has the pleasure and the honour of the personal acquaintance of my noble Friend who has just sat down can, for a moment, doubt that any step he takes in this House, as elsewhere, is dictated by the most conscientious motives; and no one who has listened to the manner in which he has brought forward his Motion this evening can fail to perceive that he is capable to deal with the great questions that come before us with an ability, good judgment, and moderation, which make me regret that he does not more frequently take an active part in our proceedings and join in our debates. I must, my Lords, preface the few observations I am about to offer by saying, in the first instance, that notwithstanding the high respect which I entertain, and which I believe your Lordships all entertain, for the opinion and character of my noble Friend, and notwithstanding the clear and able manner in which he has submitted his views upon this question to our notice, he has not induced me to come to the practical conclusion to which he has arrived. But I must at the same time express my concurrence in a great part of the objections which he has urged against the measure now under your Lordships' consideration—if, indeed, on such a question it is permitted to us to have any deliberative consideration at all;—I concur with the noble Duke in thinking that the Bill is objectionable in point of substance as well as in form—in point of substance, because, if that surplus does exist which the Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipates with so much confidence, but of which serious doubts are entertained by a very large proportion of the Members of the other House of Parliament, and in which doubts I confess I share—even, I say, if that surplus does exist, in my judgment, and, I believe, in the judgment of many others, and in the deliberate judgment of the House of Commons, and I am not sure I am incorrect in saying in the deliberate judgment of Her Majesty's Government—there are other taxes which have a greater claim for remission than the paper duty. There are other taxes which press far more injuriously on the springs of industry, which press with far greater hardship upon the comforts of the great mass of the community—there are taxes which have been imposed for special and temporary purposes, to meet a temporary exigency, and which have, consequently, a far preferable claim over the paper duty to be taken off, or, at all events, reduced, so soon as the temporary exigency for which they were imposed has ceased to exist. I think the Bill objectionable in point of form, on the grounds stated by my noble Friend—because it is sent to your Lordships, and sent deliberately, with the view and intention of precluding your Lordships from exercising upon it that deliberate judgment which I think it is for the benefit and advantage of the Constitution as it is for the honour of your Lordships' House that you should be able to exercise on all matters submitted to you. The noble Earl who moved the second reading of the Bill stated that last year we stood in a very different position from that in which we do now; inasmuch that last year it might be a question open to doubt whether we had or had not a surplus; whereas, on the present occasion, that fact is universally admitted. I will not here stop, my Lords, to take exception to the assumption of my noble Friend that the existence of a surplus is universally admitted. The fact is that it is agreed in the House of Commons that in these matters it is to be assumed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the best authority as to the facts, and that upon his statement we must be prepared to rely in our legislative capacity—whatever personal and private opinions may be as to the soundness of the reasoning or the validity of the conclusions to which he has arrived. My Lords, I accept this principle; but as the noble Earl took great pains to show that if it had not been for the very bad harvest last year the anticipations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the revenue would have been entirely realized, I may be permitted to point out that the noble Earl did not take into account the £800,000 additional and unexpected Customs' revenue which the Chancellor of the Exchequer received, and which we may regard as some set-off against the falling off of his receipts from that cause. Moreover, although in ordinary cases it is perfectly fair for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reckon, not on circumstances of an unparalleled prosperity, but upon a fair average revenue, yet I find at the period when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his first Budget—which I presume is the one to which we are directed—about the period when we were discussing the measure relative to the paper duty, and before the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his second or supplemental Budget—it was perfectly clear that we could expect nothing but a very bad harvest. Perhaps the noble Earl will permit me to remind him also that, at the period when the Budget was under consideration, Her Majesty's Government were in doubt—a doubt in which no other person shared—as to whether or not there would be a war with China, and the provision taken in the Budget for the China war last year only reached the very modest amount of £500,000. Subsequently the Chancellor of the Exchequer found out that that had taken place which every one had foreseen, but to which he had wilfully shut his eyes; and consequently he found himself under the necessity of coming down to the House of Commons and asking for a Supplementary Vote of £3,800,000. That appeal, however, had not been made when we discussed the question; but I hope your Lordships will do me the honour to recollect that I found it to be my duty to fatigue your Lordships with a very lengthy analysis of the estimates of the revenue and the expenditure of the country, in which I assumed, for the purpose of argument, that the whole of the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were perfectly correct, that he was not wrong in any of his figures, that no unexpected circumstances would occur to derange his calculations. And I took the liberty of showing—on the faith of that statement—to your Lordships, and, as I believe, proved to your Lordships, that if circumstances remained precisely the same, the provisions of the Budget were so contrived as to secure, not for the year 1860-1, but for the year 1861-2, a deficiency to the amount of £2,800,000. In short, I rested my support to the Motion brought forward by my noble Friend the Comptroller of the Exchequer, not upon any supposed error in the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but upon the fact that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, assuming the correctness of all his figures, involved us in a certain deficiency of £2,800,000, at the very least, for the year 1861-2. Under those circumstances your Lordships were induced—and I think very advantageously for the country, and I believe that the country generally now feel that it was to their advantage, and that your Lordships acted very wisely—to exercise your indubitable right to refuse to assent to this lavish and imprudent sacrifice of the permanent revenue of the country. My Lords—I do not quite know about Her Majesty's Government—but I am afraid the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not shown himself sufficiently grateful to us, because we certainly contributed very largely to reduce or diminish the enormous deficiency there would have been upon the revenue, not of 1860-1, but of 1861-2, by the present we made to him of a million and a quarter of money by continuing the paper duty. The right hon. Gentleman made no difficulty about accepting this present; but he took advantage of the amount, eloquently protesting that there never was a Government, there never was a people, so ill-used and so grossly affronted as that Government, the House of Commons, and the country had been by your Lordships' House. But, my Lords, with a meekness worthy of all praise, the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeded to frame his new Budget to meet the altered circumstances of the year, and he at once took credit for the million and a quarter secured to him by "the unparalleled conduct of the House of Lords." How was the remainder made up? The remainder of the deficiency—by a course of proceeding which, certainly, is of an exceptional character, but justified by the circumstances of the time—was made up by withdrawing the sum of one million and a half from the balances in the Exchequer—that is by diminishing the assets prepared to meet the liabilities of the country. That was the mode—in addition to what he got by the relief afforded him by the retention of the paper duties—in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer contrived to make ends meet for the service of last year. The revenue, in short, of last year, was made up of waifs and strays, odds and ends, pickings here, anticipations from another quarter, and throwing into the service of one year that which belonged to another—a combination of casualties which might occur that year but could never occur again, and anticipations which, unless circumstances changed favourably, would leave the revenue of another year in a deficiency to the amount of two or three millions. But when we come to this year, and when every one is thinking how the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make up the deficiency in his revenue, the right hon. Gentleman comes down to the House and deals with the Budget of the present year with the same courage and dexterity as he exhibited in dealing with the Budget of last year. Last year he astounded the House by announcing that they had to provide for a deficiency of £9,400,000, and, nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman proposed a remission of taxes that would increase the deficiency to £12,400,000. He provided for that deficiency by the anticipation of revenue from a variety of sources, partly on the faith of £250,000 to be received from Spain, and partly from other windfalls, but principally by the addition of a penny to the income tax—or rather by the imposition of an income tax of 10*d.* in the pound—and of this income tax the right hon. Gentleman contrived not only to get four quarters in the year, but he arranged so that five quarters should be paid within the year. That, of course, was an operation that could not be repeated, and their Lordships and the public were anxiously asking, "What will the Chancellor of the Exchequer do with his deficiency of £5,500,000?" Many resources were wanting which last year he possessed—the prospect before him, in short, seemed as black as possible—when the right hon. Gentleman comes down to an admiring and wondering House of Commons and declares that there was no deficiency at all, but a surplus of £1,900,000. And it is just as simple as the case of Columbus and his egg. The deficiency last year was £9,400,000, assuming that the income tax was to expire, and that the tea and sugar duties would be reduced to their ordinary amount. This was the right hon. Gentleman's demonstration of last year. This year he proceeds upon a different assumption, that all these duties are to continue, and not only to continue, but that they are to continue with the additional penny income tax imposed last year, and distinctly imposed for one year only. If you assume, in the first instance, that the taxes have expired which produced between £10,000,000 and £11,000,000, and, thereby show a deficiency of £9,400,000 in the one year, it is not very difficult to come to the conclusion that if those taxes are to be continued in their full amount, as they produced a surplus for last year, they will also provide a surplus for the year to come. And then the House of Commons lifts up its hands and its eyes in admiration, and says, "What a wonderful man this Chancellor of the Exchequer is!" I say that also; but I likewise say, what a wonderful body is that House of Commons to be cajoled and juggled by this transparent fallacy of creating a deficiency last year, and having a surplus this year. I must be permitted to say, in passing, that this solution gives a very easy explanation of an extraordinary discrepancy which appears between a statement I made and one made by the Comptroller of the Exchequer, in which I anticipated a deficiency of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000, and my noble Friend a deficiency of between £10,000,000 and £11,000,000. The difference consists in this: I said, if these taxes are continued there will be a deficiency of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000; and my noble Friend said, "There will be a deficiency of between £10,000,000 and £11,000,000 unless you break faith with the country and continue those obnoxious tea and sugar duties, and also the income tax at its present high rate." Our statements, therefore, precisely tally, and our estimates would have been perfectly correct, as a general rule, if it had not occurred in the meantime that the China war came to an end, and consequently it was in the power of the Government and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make some reduction of the expenditure, the effect of which was to give a small apparent surplus. As I said before, I shall assume that the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are all correct, and I shall not dispute the fact, whether £750,000, which he calculates to receive from China, is likely to come into the Exchequer or not, or whether he has not made a most extraordinary miscalculation with regard to the military and naval expenditure of the country. I take the facts as I am told them; and then the question arises how this surplus shall be disposed of most advantageously for the country? I will not say whether it is for your Lordships to-night to decide, but it is a question for Parliament to decide. I will assume the version of those who say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has dealt most fairly and impartially in dividing the relief between direct and indirect taxation. If, on the one hand, it is said, he takes off the paper duty, on the other hand he takes off an equivalent amount from income tax. That is true; but the relief given in respect of direct taxation consists in taking off the individual penny he put on the year before, and the relief in respect of indirect taxation consists in depriving the country permanently [The Duke of ARGYLL: Hear, hear!]

—I am glad to hear that my observation is gratifying to the noble Duke—you are taking off a tax which, from the nature of things, when once taken off cannot be reimposed. I am not going to discuss the merits of the paper duty. I always admitted, and I am quite ready now to admit, that it is an objectionable tax, and one which, with an overflowing Exchequer, it might be desirable to relieve the country from the pressure of; but I do not believe that its repeal will have those marvellous effects that have been predicated, or will give any extraordinary relief to commerce or to any portion of the community. With regard to cheap literature, and to the various applications of paper, and the immense spread of knowledge which are to follow from the repeal of this duty, these arguments may do very well for Parliament, but I have not the least faith in them. My noble Friend, I hope, will not repeat these stale arguments about cheap literature, which have been all controverted long ago. [Earl GRANVILLE: Where?] Why, in every house, in every conversation, in Parliament, and in every society where the question has been argued. Look at the most important publishers. Look at the authority of Mr. Bohn, who ought to have some knowledge upon the subject. Look to the assertions made in every society and every place where the question is discussed. I know one class to whom the relief will be considerable, and that is the class of proprietors of penny newspapers. I do not know that they will get all the benefit they expect, but they will get the raw material of their business cheaper, and certainly they will not make the least reduction in the price to their consumers. Neither do I see that so great a benefit will be given by the remission of the paper duty to those tradesmen who sell groceries, tea, sugar, and other articles on account of the paper in which these articles are wrapped—or to use my noble Friend's peculiar phraseology "wropped." I believe that the main argument for taking off the paper duty consists of an argument introduced for the first time this year, and which I may call "the great bandbox argument." Next to the proprietors of penny papers the makers of bandboxes will derive the greatest benefit from the remission of the duty; but as to all the other classes of the community, I believe its benefits will be found to be nearly nil. I will say utterly, nil as compared with a proportionate reduction of the income tax or a proportionate reduction of the tea and sugar duties. My noble Friend will surely not deny that these reductions would be more beneficial to the working classes than the repeal of the paper duty; and when he says that the tea and sugar duties are paid in higher proportion by the higher and middle classes than by the lower, surely, that circumstance constitutes a strong reason for reducing those duties and so cheapening the articles to the lower classes. I only wish to enter my protest against being supposed to concur in the great benefit to be derived to the community at large from taking off the duty on paper. It is, however, a financial question upon which the House of Commons has a second time expressed an opinion to the effect that it is desirable that that duty should be taken off. I will not stop to examine what may be the various motives that induced the House of Commons to come to the conclusion at which they have arrived. It will be sufficient for me to say that to my certain knowledge that conclusion was not simply guided by the merits of the tax itself, or the degree of relief to be afforded to the community. It was carried, undoubtedly, by a somewhat larger majority than carried the third reading last year—a majority of fifteen; but it is perfectly notorious that that majority, small as it is, was obtained by the votes of a certain number of Gentlemen sincerely opposed to the removal of the paper duty, but more opposed to running the risk—not a great risk, I think—of disturbing Her Majesty's Government, or compelling them to resign or to dissolve Parliament. I am not in the secrets of the Government; and I am not averse to having something strong in hand to meet an emergency; but looking to the complacent manner in which they took the check by the House of Lords last year, I confess to entertaining a very strong opinion that the only resignation Her Majesty's Government would have shown would have been that calm and placid resignation with which they submitted to the benefit we conferred upon them last year; and as to the dissolution of Parliament, I have too high an opinion of the prudence, sagacity, and wisdom of the noble Viscount at the head of that Government to think that he would appeal to the country on any such question as whether paper was to be preferred to tea. But, whatever the motive, a majority of the House of Commons has decided in favour of the repeal of the paper duty, and I am perfectly ready to admit that, upon a question of the repeal of a duty and the financial arrangements generally, it is not expedient that your Lordships, except in very exceptional cases, should interfere with the discretion of the House of Commons in that matter. Suppose, therefore, there is a surplus, and that the House of Commons, on full and deliberate consideration of all the circumstances, have come to the decision that it is expedient that this paper duty should be repealed, I certainly should not wish to take on myself the responsibility of advising your Lordships, whatever might be your opinions as to the merits of the case, to set yourselves upon such a point in opposition to the deliberate judgment of the House of Commons. Last year the question was widely different. The question then was whether, upon the showing of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, that there would be no surplus in the following year, you would not give to the House of Commons a further opportunity of considering the policy of sacrificing that which was in point of form at least a permanent tax? But the question arises now; not so much with regard to the merits of the case as with regard to the amount of interference which might be justifiable or desirable on the part of your Lordships' House. And here is a point on which I feel myself compelled to differ in some degree, though not altogether, with my noble Friend (the Duke of Rutland) as to the discretion to be exercised on this occasion. With regard to the right of the House of Lords to deal with questions of taxation, and with regard to the privileges of the two Houses generally, I think it is extremely desirable that there should be no mistake as to their respective limits. While there is undoubtedly debateable ground between the two Houses there is certainly one point which admits of no debate and no discussion whatever. With regard to those other matters, they must be settled as they arise, by the prudence and discretion of each House individually. But there is nothing more clearly laid down and recognized than that to the House of Commons belongs the initiation of every Money Bill; and on the other hand nothing is more indisputable—and that is the vindication of your Lordship's conduct last year—than that the House of Lords have the power of accepting or rejecting any Money Bill. The debateable point is whether the House of Lords has power to alter a Money Bill submitted to them by the House of Commons? What is the meaning of having power? The privileges of the two Houses depend upon the mutual recognition of their respective powers, and on the power of enforcing that recognition. The House of Commons would not look at a Money Bill originated by the Lords; and their remedy is obvious—they would refuse to deal with it. The Lords, on the other hand, reject a Money Bill coming up from the Commons that they do not approve of; and the result is clearly the same—the Bill falls to the ground, and there is an end of it. But the question is as to the right of the House of Lords to alter a Money Bill which the Commons have originated. Let us see upon what the claim of the House of Commons to refuse to entertain a Money Bill so altered is founded. It rests upon a Resolution of 1671, passed by the House of Commons,

as to the privileges and rights of that House, and incidentally as to the limitation of the rights and privileges of the other House. With regard to the privileges of the House of Commons, their Resolution may be perfectly sufficient to bind them; but as to what is the privilege of your Lordships' House a simple Resolution of the House of Commons, with all due respect to that high authority, except so far as they can themselves act upon it, is a piece of waste paper. The rights of your Lordships' House cannot be restricted by a Resolution of the House of Commons; and, however prudence may have induced your Lordships' House to refrain from altering Money Bills, you have never at any time repudiated, rejected, or resigned the right of making Amendments in those Bills, although you have tempered the exercise of that right by discretion, and by the knowledge that if you do make such Amendment it is equivalent to the rejection of the Bill. Every constitutional authority concurs in giving to the House of Lords this right of amending Money Bills if they choose to exercise it. Mr. Hallam and Lord Macaulay have so laid it down; but I will only trouble your Lordships with a short extract from a work recently published by my noble Friend (Earl Stanhope), the Life of William Pitt, in which I find the opinion of Mr. Fox thus stated—

“Pitt proposed a measure to regulate our commercial intercourse with America. The views of Pitt upon this question were of the largest kind. The Bill was complicated and extensive. It was several times committed and re-committed with a variety of Amendments, and at last, under the next Administration, was further altered by the Lords. It was, no doubt, a Money Bill. [‘Hear.’] ‘But I am of opinion (said Fox) that the Order of the House respecting Money Bills is often too strictly construed. It would be very absurd, indeed, to send a Loan Bill to the Lords for their concurrence, and, at the same time, deprive them of the right of deliberation.’”

This is the judgment of Mr. Fox—a great constitutional authority—upon the Resolution of the House of Commons in 1671. This privilege depends upon the power of enforcing it; and if you send down a Money Bill to the Commons altered the Commons reject it, and it falls to the ground. In former times—I do not know whether the practice is still continued—it was usual for the House of Commons to kick such a Bill out of the House, or to throw it under the table—which does not appear to me to be a very dignified mode of proceeding, more especially when it was frequently followed by the introduction of another Bill embodying the Amendments of the Lords. No doubt the House of Commons, if you choose to act on your constitutional right, may refuse to entertain the Bill so amended by your Lordships, in which case it falls to the ground; or they may introduce another Bill or Bills carrying out the same object, and send them to the Lords in a form that they believe to be more acceptable. These, my Lords, are the real limitations of the rights and privileges of the two Houses of Parliament—namely, the manner in which these rights can be enforced, by either the one or the other, by the rejection of the measure in one form or the other, the result of which is that the proposed legislation falls to the ground. In Bills, however, which are for the special purposes of taxation, not Bills in which money clauses may be introduced incidentally, this is a matter of the highest consequence, because whenever either House insists on the maintenance of its strict privileges, in that case, according to the circumstances of the case, the matter would be judged of by the supreme judge of all in this country—public opinion; and that House of the two which pushes its assumed privileges to the utmost, and which shows an unreasonable and unconciliatory spirit towards the other House, will be the one, in the case of a great national calamity, such as the stopping the Supply of the means of carrying on the Government, which will be visited by great public indignation; and that is the real control and the real means by which the apparently conflicting privileges of the two Houses are prevented from bringing the working of the Constitution to a dead lock. That is the position in which we find ourselves at present. There is one point more to which I must advert—the mode in which the Commons have dealt with this question and with regard to “tack Bills.” In former times it was the habit of the Commons to introduce the most conflicting and incompatible things into the same Bill and send it up to the House of Lords. According to the interpretation of their privileges by the Commons, that Bill, if it contained some money provision, could not be amended by the House of Lords, but the whole measure must be swallowed by this House or rejected altogether. It is apparent that such a practice excludes the House of Lords from the exercise of their deliberative and legislative functions. There never has been any doubt as to the inadmissibility of “tacks;” in the strict sense of the word—that is the introduction into a Money Bill of matter wholly different from and unconnected with the main object of the measure. But a more difficult question comes when you have to deal with a large financial scheme, in which nothing is introduced that has not reference to finance but in which various matters of finance are introduced and submitted to your Lordships’ consideration. I do not hesitate to admit to my noble Friend opposite that there are repeated precedents for the introduction of whole fiscal schemes into one measure, and of that measure being sent up by the House of Commons and acceded to by the House of Lords. On the other hand, there are repeated cases of financial measures being amended by the House of Lords, and the Amendments being accepted by the House of Commons. Supposing one Bill had been sent up last year for imposing 1*d.* income tax and repealing the paper duty, no one could complain of excess of authority on the part of the Commons; and, likewise, nobody could complain that the House of Lords had not the opportunity to exercise their judgment by accepting the whole or rejecting it, and the thing could be fairly counterpoised by the action of the House of Commons. But the case is totally different where, by the action of the House of Commons, it is proposed to take away a permanent tax and to substitute for it a purely temporary one. This point has been urged in the House of Commons by a right hon. Baronet, a Member of great weight and experience, and was referred to by my noble Friend opposite, as having been laid down in a draft Report which was not accepted by the Committee, and which Report was drawn by a right hon. Friend for whom I have the highest esteem and regard (Mr. Walpole), but both these Gentlemen, I think, have come to an opinion on this question which is most fallacious in its origin and dangerous in its conclusions. The argument is this—that if, after the House of Commons has declared against it, you allow a large portion of the Revenue to be raised by permanent taxation that cannot be taken off without the consent of the House of Lords—and it is admitted that it cannot be taken off without their consent—you weaken the power of the House of Commons—that power, it is allowed, has been weakened—and it is argued that it would be expedient, and good policy, to recover that power even at the expense of the permanent revenue of the country. I say that this is a gross fallacy in argument—I say so with the greatest respect for the right hon. Gentleman—it is a perfect fallacy in argument to say that dealing with a portion of the permanent taxation of the country can affect the control of the House of Commons over the revenue from whatever source derived. It might, no doubt, have been necessary in the early days of our history, at a time when the necessities of the Crown alone compelled it to call Parliament together, and when measures were always attempted to enable the Crown to dispense with the Parliament and to enable it to carry on the Government without summoning Parliament at all, to take precautions that Supplies should only be voted in such a way as not to make the Sovereign independent of Parliament. But all apprehensions of that kind have long ago fallen to the ground, and ceased to have any practical effect. What is the control which the House of Commons now exercises? The army, the navy, all the great services of the country, are voted from year to year; and without the sanction of the House of Commons to the application of the Ways and Means, the payment of these services at once falls to the ground. The Army Estimates, the Navy Estimates, the Miscellaneous Estimates, are all provided for by annual Votes; and this enormous proportion—amounting in fact to almost the whole—of the Ways and Means of the country are entirely and absolutely under the direct control of the House of Commons. And even after these Estimates have been provided for, the House of Commons has complete and absolute control not only over the levying of the taxes but over their application. Not a single shilling of the taxes—not even of the permanent taxation of the country—can be applied to the purposes for which they are required without an Appropriation Act, which, as your Lordships know, must originate in the House of Commons, while it must receive the sanction of your Lordships' House. The control, therefore, of the House of Commons over the finances of the country consists, first, in the absolute control it has over the Estimates for the support of all the great services of the country; and, next, in the fact, that after these Estimates are voted not a step in regard to the payment of those services can be taken without the introduction of all the items of that expenditure into an Act which must originate in the House of Commons. Let us look, my Lords, at what the consequence would be of acting on the opposite principles. Let us suppose the principles that have been put forward in the House of Commons carried out to the uttermost, and that you do away with the whole permanent taxation of the country—and, observe, that if this precedent is to be followed up, the Supply for the year may be purchased by the abolition of some permanent duty, then permanent taxation will be gradually reduced to a minimum; and if permanent taxation be reduced to a minimum—if all the great permanent services of the country are to be provided for by the annual Votes of Parliament—and, moreover, I say, if all the taxes that affect trade and commerce financially are to be made dependent on the annual Votes of Parliament; if, above all, the payments for the National Debt are to be made wholly dependent on the annual Votes of Parliament—then, I say, the most serious and even ruinous consequences may result from the substitution of the system of annual for the system of permanent taxation. Therefore, while I do not say I am disposed to object to the present exercise of the discretion of the House of Commons, I do say it is a very serious question, not only for your Lordships' consideration, but for those of the House of Commons—and they are, I believe, the great majority—who value the institutions of the country, to beware of the danger and temptation that lurk in the policy of substituting annual for permanent taxation—of the danger of unsettling the great institutions of the country, shake the stability of our engagements, rendering uncertain all matters that affect the course of trade and commerce, and producing in all these matters an uncertainty that must be most prejudicial to the highest and best interests of the country. Why, my Lords, within my own recollection, there was one great tax—that of the sugar duties—which was voted annually; but such was the paralysis caused to trade by the uncertainty of these duties, whether they might be diminished or increased from one year to another, that it was found absolutely necessary to make those duties permanent. It was this, I suppose, that the right hon. Baronet to whom I have referred complained of as an infraction of the privileges of the House of Commons. But it is unnecessary for me to say that on that occasion the House of Commons acted not in deference to the privileges of House of Lords, but from regard to the necessities of the commercial interests of the country. Therefore, I hope that this question of substituting annual for permanent taxation will be deliberately and carefully weighed both by this and the other House of Parliament, before we proceed on it to an extent that may be dangerous to the best interests of the country. From what I have said your Lordships will infer that it is not my wish or intention to recommend your Lordships to interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the House of Commons in determining to abolish the paper duty. I think that Resolution an imprudent and improvident one, especially in the face of the future difficulties which menace us. But it is proposed purely as a financial measure; as a financial matter it is within the province of the House of Commons; and I should be sorry to see your Lordships set your authority and opinion on ordinary occasions at variance with the opinion of the House of Commons in a matter that is strictly within their province. But the question remains as to the power of the House of Lords—not putting itself in opposition to the vote of the House of Commons, but taking the step which, in a constitutional point of view, we have an undoubted right to take—of dividing this Bill into two and sending the two Bills, both of them agreed to, down to the House of Commons for them to accept or reject as they please. That is a course which has much to recommend it in point of principle. But, in point of prudence, I doubt whether it would be desirable. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) has repeated to-night, what has been said elsewhere, that in sending this Bill to your Lordships' House, the Commons intended it as a measure of a conciliatory character, as one intended to remove from the way a subject of controversy between the two Houses. It is certainly an odd way of conciliation for a man, when we have refused to accept his proposition, to turn back and tell us, "You may adopt or reject it as you please; but if you don't accept it you will expose the country to the most serious inconvenience; you may do as you please, but I take care to send it up to you in such a form as practically to prevent you from the free exercise of your judgment." I repeat I cannot see how this proposition is to be regarded in a conciliatory point of view. Moreover,

I am inclined to the opinion that if the majority of the Government thought and desired this to be regarded as a conciliatory proposition, I doubt if that was the view of the right hon. Gentleman who proposed the measure. I cannot but believe that the right hon. Gentleman, unfortunately for his own reputation, has allowed himself to be influenced by feelings of mortification at the rejection of his measure last year by the House of Lords, and that he has indulged in what I consider the wounded spirit of mortification in a manner which is not consonant with the right hon. Gentleman's high eminence or reputation. But the question is this—the House of Commons has sent up this measure, and in a form which, I must own, is fairly within their competence. And without placing ourselves prominently in opposition to the House of Commons we have it in our power to divide the Bill which has been sent up to us by that House; and, so divided, we have it in our power to adopt it, and to send it back to the Commons for acceptance or rejection. By that course we always have a remedy in our hands by which we can vindicate our privileges when we so please; and should circumstances ever arise so extreme as to justify us in taking that course, I hope your Lordships would not be slow to vindicate your rights. But I think it would be an act of power that would undoubtedly be extreme on the present occasion. We should, I think, only be imitating an example that we deprecate and blame, and should take a course likely to excite angry feelings and animosity in the House of Commons. We should lay ourselves open to the charge of having it said, "You have no objection to these propositions, and yet you send them down to the House of Commons in such a manner that it is a challenge and defiance to the House of Commons," and I think the merits of our case would thus be brought forward at the greatest disadvantage. Therefore, while I protest against the policy of this measure—while I think you are making a sacrifice of the resources—and again I say of the permanent resources of the country, because they are secured by permanent Acts of Parliament, and that at a time when you require to husband all the available resources of the country—at a time when, as my noble Friend (the Duke of Rutland) has said, the state of affairs abroad is too critical to allow us to tamper with the finances of the country, or to place them in such a position where they are not at once available, but where for the ordinary expenses of the country you must rely on extraordinary efforts—while I think that this policy is unwise and improvident, and the form of the Bill, notwithstanding all the noble Earl has said of its conciliatory character, objectionable—still, I cannot advise your Lordships to separate the Bill, and to send it back in such a form as will render it necessary to reintroduce the whole question, to re-discuss every part of the measure, and to induce a feeling of irritation in the House of Commons which I should be the last to excite, but which I would rather endeavour to allay. It is very far from our desire, my Lords, to curtail the privileges of that House. While I uphold the privileges of our own House, I yield to no man in my desire to maintain those of the House of Commons, which are as essential to the right balance of the Constitution as the privileges of the House of Lords. I hope, therefore, my noble Friend will not call on us to divide on his Motion; and I hope that no proposition will be made at a subsequent stage of the nature which I have indicated, and which, however consistent with your Lordships' privileges, would place the country in difficulties and expose your House to merited censure. I concur with my noble Friend in many of the objections he has made; but I hope your Lordships will allow this Bill to pass as it has been introduced, and leave to the Government the responsibility—and I think it is a heavy one—of dealing in the manner they have done with the finances of the country, entailing on the country a great sacrifice and depriving her, for apparently the most insignificant objects, of resources which may be required in the hour—and God knows how soon that hour may come—when we are threatened with foreign dangers or internal difficulties.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could by no means agree with the noble Duke who moved the Amendment, that debates in that House were of no use unless a division took place. He thought the feeling of the House must be one of gratification that they had now reached the close of the controversy upon the paper duties, and that in the speech of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) they had heard the last accents of a party contest which had been one of the keenest and strangest that had happened for many years. He said the “strangest,” for what were they debating about? Her Majesty's Government, having an estimated surplus of two millions, propose to divide it between the reduction of the income tax and the removal of the Excise duty on paper:—and on this proposal they were met by an opposition which was most violent and almost fanatical. He must admit to the noble Earl that there was some show of justification last year for the opposition to the proposal for the repeal of this taxation which did not now exist; but he must say he had never heard anything more erroneous than the observations that had fallen from the noble Earl respecting the deficit of last year. The noble Earl, for instance, said that the debate in that House upon the paper duty took place at a time when it was quite manifest from long continuance of bad weather that we must have a bad harvest. The fact was that the debate in their Lordship's House took place at the end of May, when there was the most magnificent weather that could be desired. It was not for a week or ten days afterward that the bad weather began. Then the noble Earl said that the deficit was overcome by the Chancellor of the Exchequer taking into account five quarters of a 10*d.* income tax within the year.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I admit that was an error. I meant to have said that he imposed an income tax of 10*d.* and provided that three quarters of that income tax should come into the service of the year instead of two quarters, making five quarters of the whole income tax, instead of four quarters. It is quite true that in the early part of the year there was a 5*d.* income tax. I never meant that he had taken five quarters of 10*d.* income tax.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could only deal with the statement as it was made, and it did appear that the noble Earl attributed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the including of five quarters of 10*d.* tax within the year. The truth was Mr. Gladstone took credit for two quarters of the 5*d.* income tax due in arrear from the previous year, and he made a new arrangement for the future, whereby he collected three quarters in the remainder of the year. Another error of the noble Earl was one that had been repeatedly refuted last year—that Mr. Gladstone had estimated £500,000 as the whole cost of the China war. The sum really provided by Mr. Gladstone for the China war at the time of the paper duty debate was two millions and a half. There were £850,000 charged for the service of the previous year, a sum between £1,100,000 and £1,200,000 in the Army and Navy Estimates for the China war, and the half million which the noble Earl had assumed to be the only provision that was made. In point of fact, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in his Supplementary Estimate of July overestimated the expense of the China war by £800,000. There had been a saving upon the Chinese war in reference to the Estimates, and this went to the reduction of the deficit. This was an accumulation of mis-statements which was extraordinary, even upon financial questions, from the noble Earl. Another objection which had been raised by the noble Earl against Mr. Gladstone's calculations was that that right hon. Gentleman had shifted his ground, and had adopted a different basis of calculation this year to that which he took last year. But it was quite legitimate for Mr. Gladstone to take one basis one year and a different basis the next, provided that he clearly stated to the House of Commons in each case what basis it was on which his calculations were founded. The noble Earl himself had attempted to bamboozle the House as to the principle upon which the revenue for the year was calculated, and said that the difference between the deficit predicted by one noble Lord and that predicted by another noble Lord arose from their calculating upon a different basis. The predicted deficit of this year was last year stated at £10,000,000 or £12,000,000, on the basis of not taking into account the falling taxes. If it had been intended to include in this the falling taxes, then the deficit might just as well have been put down at £22,000,000. This explanation, therefore, must be abandoned. He thought it would be of advantage if noble Lords and hon. Members who indulged in predictions could be compelled to come forward at the beginning of each Session and state how far their prophecies of the preceding year had been verified or falsified. The noble Earl himself predicted last Session a deficit for this year of £2,800,000. As there was an actual estimated surplus of nearly two millions the noble Earl was in error by nearly five millions. But, deducting the taxes which were imposed in July to meet the cost of the China war, the noble Earl was in error to the extent of two millions, or £1,400,000 at least, a sum equal to the whole amount of the paper duties, which was the subject of this long-continued controversy. The noble Earl had assumed that the expenditure of this year would be fully equal to that of last, and hence his error.

THE EARL OF DERBY: What I stated was that if the expenditure of the next year was equal to that, we should have a deficit of £2,000,000.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: But surely the Government had a right to calculate as much on the termination of the China war as the noble Earl had upon its continuance. The calculation of the noble Earl, therefore, had proceeded upon a basis which might be erroneous, and which subsequently had proved to be erroneous;—he wished, however, to point out that it was in a great degree upon the strength of that calculation that their Lordships were invited last year to reject the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty; since, however, a deficiency could not be predicted of this year, the great objection to the repeal of that duty was the place which it occupied in the general system of taxation, especially as opposed to the repeal of the tea duty, the repeal of which was now advocated as a preferable measure. A few words might be said with regard to the latter duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated in Parliament that if last year the House of Commons had expressed a preference by its vote for the reduction of the tea duty, the Government would have been ready to accede to that proposal. To that statement he might have added that the Government came to the consideration of the choice between the tea and paper duty with a perfectly impartial mind and with a sincere desire to choose that for remission the abolition of which would conduce most to the public good. There were, of course, circumstances affecting this decision last year which no longer existed now. The existence of war with China last year made it more doubtful than it otherwise might have been, whether the advantage of any reduction of the tea duty would reach the consumer. But there were other considerations more powerfully than any other had influenced the Government, and which were exactly the converse of those to which their conduct had been attributed. It had, for instance, been perseveringly represented that it was the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the tendency of the po-policy of the Government, to remove the permanent sources of our indirect taxation, and to throw an undue burden upon the shoulders of those who bore the direct taxation of the country. Such was not the case. Now, in regard to the tea duties, he would direct attention to the scale of duties on that article for the last few years, since this bore materially on the choice between tea and paper. The power of a nickname was always very great, and he had noticed during those debates that the tea duty had been constantly referred to as a war duty. The facts, however, would point to another conclusion. In 1852-3, before the Russian war, the tea duty stood at 2s. 2½d. per lb.—that is in a time of profound peace. In 1853 the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then in office, proposed that a descending scale should be adopted, to terminate in 1860 by a duty of 1s. per lb. The Russian war then broke out, but so far from the arrangement having been stopped by that event the two first remissions were allowed to take place; in 1853-4, the duty fell to 1s. 10d. per lb., in 1854-5 to 1s. 6d. per lb., and it was not till 1855 that any addition was made. In that year Sir George Lewis, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer, raised it to 1s. 9d. But at the conclusion of the war, in 1857, it was placed at 1s. 5d. per lb. and at that figure it had remained ever since. What he wished to point out, therefore, was that the figure of 1s. 5d. in the pound had no reference whatever to the expenditure of the Russian war or any other war. It was a duty lower by 9½d. per lb. than had existed in times of profound peace previous to the Russian war. It had reference no doubt to increased expenditure, but not to increased expenditure due to any particular war. When, therefore, they had to consider the question of the tea duties last year, they had to bear in mind the fact that the expenditure of the country for military and naval purposes, although we had had several years of peace, so far from being less than in 1857, was very considerably higher—higher, in fact, by several millions. The question, therefore, really came to this—whether they were under any obligation to reduce the tea duties still farther at a time when they had been obliged to augment still farther naval and military expenditure? Certainly one consideration which weighed with the Government was this—that with such large military establishments to provide for it was reasonable and just that the whole consuming mass of the country should contribute to their maintenance and that the entire burden should not be laid upon the income tax or any other direct impost. That reason prevailed at the present moment. The military and naval expenditure was still six millions above the figure at which it stood in 1857. There was, therefore, no reason why the Government should advance farther in a reduced scale of duty which had been fixed in contemplation of a very different condition of affairs. The noble Earl had several times stated that he objected to the repeal of the paper duty because it involved the sacrifice of an important part of the permanent revenue of the country. He listened with some surprise to that statement of the noble Earl. Surely there ought to be some relation and consistency between the language of men when in office, and that which they held when out of office. True the noble Earl's Government in 1858 was in circumstances of considerable difficulty; he was weak as to his Parliamentary condition, and it was necessary for him at times to act upon the principle of "anything for a quiet life." But then they must also remember that the abstract Resolution respecting the paper duty proposed by Mr. Milner Gibson was not simply adopted as he proposed it, but was to a certain extent modified to meet the views of the Government of the noble Earl, so that with that modification, and in the terms finally adopted, the Resolution must be taken as expressing the opinion of an unanimous House of Commons. They were—

"That this House is of opinion that the maintenance of the Excise on paper as a permanent source of revenue would be impolitic."

Now, he maintained that the noble Earl who was at the head of the Government which acceded to that Resolution was hardly entitled to argue that the paper duty could be retained as a permanent source of revenue. But supposing the noble Earl had reluctantly agreed to that Resolution, he (the Duke of Argyll) was at least entitled to draw his inference from the language of the noble Earl's Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Disraeli. The words of that right hon. Gentleman were these—

He thought that, after such an admission from Mr. Disraeli, together with his own conduct, the noble Earl was not entitled to assume that the paper duty could be maintained as a permanent source of revenue. He would not go into the details of the paper duty, of which he believed they were all heartily tired; but in determining between paper and tea there was another very important consideration, namely, that the paper duty had been declared by the practical officers of the Inland Revenue to have become untenable, not that it could not be collected; but their statement was that the system of partial exemption which had been forced upon the revenue authorities in the course of years, and which favoured one class of dealers while it pressed heavily on another, had rendered the impost so unjust as between the different classes of traders, that the tax had become morally untenable. What was the real cause of the opposition to this Bill? He could not help thinking there were reasons for that opposition which had not been stated, and he drew that inference very much not only from the speech of the noble Earl that evening, but also from a speech of a noble Friend of his whom he was sorry not to see in his place, the late Lord Lieutenant for Ireland (the Earl of Eglinton). In a recent speech that noble Earl stated that, even if it were true that a most flagitious bargain had been made in respect to the Galway contract with a certain party in Parliament, that would not have been so bad as the throwing away of a great source of revenue by the repeal of the paper duty. How was it possible to argue with men whose minds were so intensely prejudiced as that assertion indicated? Was it not true that for the last thirty years the repeal of the paper duty had been the subject of a scientific, rather than a popular, agitation? He believed that the opposition to the repeal of that duty arose in a great measure from a dislike on the part of the noble Earl and his followers to the cheap press. It had been said that the whole of the duty would go into the pockets of the editors and proprietors of the penny papers. He believed that such an opinion was directly contrary to the known principles of political economy, and that, although for a period the proprietors of the penny papers might receive some benefit, the public would ultimately reap the advantage, if not in a lowering of the price, in the superiority of the article supplied to them. They would have a better article and more of it for their money, and in one form or another would receive the full benefit of the repeal of the tax. He believed that when such taxes were repealed, although the benefit might in the first instance go to some particular class, sooner or later the public were the gainers; and both political economy and experience taught that their repeal gave a stimulus to trade and industry. With regard to the incidence of the paper duty upon cheap publications, he had recently been supplied with some interesting statistics by Mr. Robert Chambers, the head of a great publishing establishment in Scotland, whose firm had done so much for the last thirty years for the education of the people and the extension of cheap literature. That gentleman had informed him that of the whole expense connected with the popular journals, including literary talent and printing, the item for paper was by far the largest, and that the tax upon that article was 25 per cent. He further informed him that his paper maker had announced to him that in the month of October next Mr. Chambers would receive the entire and full benefit of the remission of duty in the price of paper. That showed, he thought, that the benefit arising from the repeal of the tax would not be retained by any one class, but would be distributed over the community at large. With regard to the form in which the Bill had come up to their Lordship's House, he did not know that there was any remark of the noble Earl which was open to very great exception. The form of the Bill was said to be unusual. So it was; but then the circumstances were unusual. Even the noble Earl himself must admit that the course taken by their Lordships last year was at least unusual, even although it might not be held to be unconstitutional. He fully admitted that the Government had last year considerable difficulty in making out a technical objection to the course taken by the noble Earl. No doubt many Bills of Supply had been rejected by the House of Lords. But the course pursued by the noble Earl and by their Lordships was not so much a technical violation of the privileges of the House of Commons as a substantial violation of the established usages between the two Houses of Parliament. The real objection to that course was, not that the Lords had rejected a Money Bill, but that they had rejected a Bill for the supply of the year which was connected with the financial proposals of the Government, and that that rejection took place entirely in reference to financial grounds. He believed that on every previous occasion when the House of Lords had rejected a Money Bill, it was in connection, not with questions of finance, but questions of general policy, which were incidental to the tax, and that in almost every instance it was distinctly stated by the Lords that the ground of their rejection of the Bill was their disapprobation of some general policy connected with it. He could not help thinking that if the offence to the House of Commons was what he had indicated, the course pursued by the Commons, though unusual, was perfectly legitimate. He was glad that the noble Earl had thrown over the argument of the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) that this Bill was in the nature of a "tack"—it was beyond controversy that in no respect whatever it was so. The whole propositions were strictly and purely financial; there was no question of general policy not connected with finance included in the Bill, and the only question was whether the Government project, being brought in as a whole, might not fairly and legitimately be sent up to their Lordships in one Bill? With regard to the general question of making large sources of the taxation temporary instead of permanent, he confessed that, to a very great extent, he agreed with the noble Earl. He thought that that would be a very dangerous course; the interests of the country generally were such that, practically, a very large portion of the revenue must continue to be raised by permanent taxation. But it was quite possible that, in consequence of the steps taken by that House last year, the House of Commons might think it due to itself and to its own constitutional power over the finance of the country, that in future, as until a very few years ago, some one great annual source of revenue should be kept in their hands, so that they might be able to send up the financial proposal of Government coupled with the renewal of some annual tax. That was quite possible, and he did not see any objection to it in point of constitutional practice. It was a course which would naturally follow from the unusual course taken by their Lordships, and besides being strictly Constitutional it had the great argument of expediency to recommend it. It would be a most dangerous practice if the Government, in making their financial proposals, had to risk a serious conflict in both Houses of Parliament. At present every Government had to consider the position of parties in the Commons when they proposed either to remit or to impose a tax; but surely it would be a serious derangement of constitutional practice, and would place the House of Lords for the future in a somewhat invidious position, if the Government had to consider, not merely the tax which would pass or the remission which should be proposed to the Commons, but the taxes and remission which were most likely to receive the separate and independent sanction of a majority of the House of Lords. If such a precedent were established, it would probably tell very seriously upon the action of Government. At present the Government were sometimes compelled to propose financial measures which were not particularly palatable among the great masses of the population; but if the House of Lords were to take advantage of popular feeling, as an attempt had been made in this case to set up Tea versus Paper, the decisions of the Government would be very seriously biassed. It could scarcely be considered a Conservative doctrine that a Government must always be swayed by the feeling uppermost among the great masses of the people. In his opinion the Government ought to have due regard to such feeling, but there were times when they ought to take higher ground. Before sitting down he could not help alluding to that part of the speech of the noble Earl in which he had attributed personal motives to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect to the form which had been adopted by the Government in sending up this Bill to their Lordships' House. Now, he could not help thinking that when personal motives were attributed to a Minister the imputation should be made in that House where the Minister was present and had the power to reply. But was it reasonable for the noble Earl to attribute to personal motives on the part of his right hon. Friend a course of conduct and policy which had been recommended by one of the noble Earl's own most distinguished colleagues, and which had received the assent of an almost unanimous House of Commons? He must add that if it were true that the just authority of the Lords were assailed, that House had a right to expect succour from the Conservative party in the House of Commons. Had any such succour been afforded. He happened personally to be present in a place which should be nameless, when a member of that Assembly—one of the Conservative party—proposed a Motion which would, if adopted, have saved the House of Lords from the assumed affront. But what was the conduct of the Conservative party? There was such a rush out of the House that he believed some of the Members were almost in danger of receiving personal damage. He believed only thirty Members of the Conservative party voted with the honest and independent Member who tried to save the House of Lords from the insult which was about to be offered to them. The inference, therefore, was that if the vast majority of the Conservatives—if that distinguished Member of the noble Earl's Government (Mr. Disraeli)—refused to interfere to save their Lordships, it ought not to be attributed to any member of the present Government that he had personal motives in sending the Bill up in its present form. He had only one more observation to make before sitting down. The noble Earl closed his speech by a few solemn words of warning to the Government, that they were responsible, and not he, for the result of the course they were pursuing. On the part of the Government he was ready to accept that responsibility. He was happy to say that the financial operations of that year closed a very long series of operations which, begun in the time of Mr. Huskisson, were carried on by Sir Robert Peel, and had now been carried to completion by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Surely they had no reason to be ashamed of the results at which they had at length arrived. Last year they had raised, and they were to raise again this year, no less a sum than £69,000,000, and that with a facility greater than that with which any other nation in the world could raise a tenth part of that enormous sum. That revenue was raised without having recourse to one single tax which was protective, or in other words, without one single tax which was unjust to the consumer, in order to serve the interest of any particular producer; they raised that revenue without one single tax which bore upon particular trades to the injury and disadvantage of others. And last, though not least, they raised that enormous sum with an entire exemption of all the necessities, and not a few of the luxuries, of life. That was surely a triumphant result; and in spite of the solemn adjurations of the noble Earl, he must be allowed to tell him that all the ability and eloquence he had displayed in attacking the measures of the Government were only another instance of the eloquence and ability which could be displayed in attacking the most salutary reforms, and in defending a bad, but he rejoiced to think, in that case at least, a losing cause.

EARL GREY: My Lords, though I can hardly doubt that the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) who has moved an Amendment to the Motion before the House will follow the advice so wisely given him by the noble Earl opposite, and will not put your Lordships to the trouble of a division, I shall take the liberty of making some observations upon the financial policy of the Government as embodied in the Bill now under discussion. But, in the first place, allow me to congratulate your Lordships upon the conclusive testimony which this Bill bears to the propriety and wisdom of the course which you adopted last year in the rejection of the Bill for the repeal of the paper duties. We all remember how the vote of this House was condemned, not only out of doors, but within the walls of Parliament itself. It was argued that for the House of Lords to throw out a Bill for the repeal of a tax which the House of Commons had passed was in effect to impose a tax upon our sole authority. It was argued that our passing a Bill sent up to us by the Commons for reducing or abolishing a tax was a matter of form, and that we were not entitled to exercise a discretion on the subject. So far was this carried out of doors that from that time to this a paper of considerable circulation has headed its daily impression with a statement of the proportion of taxation which is daily levied upon the sole authority of the House of Lords. The present Bill puts an end to that kind of argument, because the House of Commons have admitted that the paper duties are legally and properly enforced—nay, more, that they ought not to be repealed until October next. I think it is of great importance that this principle has been established; because if it were once admitted that our passing a Bill for repealing a tax was a matter of form, and that the House of Commons was the only judge of what burdens should be imposed upon the people, the same doctrine must be applied not only to Bills for taking off taxes, but also to Bills for taking off permanent appropriations. Yet, it has always hitherto been held to be a doctrine of the Constitution that there are certain great expenses which ought not to be left to the mercy or caprice of a popular assembly; that the Civil List, which provides for the dignity of the Crown, the fund necessary for defraying the salaries of the Judges and maintaining their independence, and the sums required to pay the public creditors, should be settled by permanent appropriations; and, therefore, a great distinction has heretofore been drawn, not only by writers on the Constitution, but also by Parliament, and, indeed, all parties in the country, between those permanent taxes which it requires the consent of the whole Legislature to repeal and the sums which are annually voted by the House of Commons. If the doctrine put forward last year had been acquiesced in, this great principle of our Constitution would have been at an end; but, fortunately, it is no longer in danger, because it is now freely admitted that this House is entitled to exercise its judgment upon all Bills that are brought before it, whether they refer to matters of taxation, appropriation, or anything else. At the same time, I quite concur with the noble Earl opposite, that the right is one which ought to be exercised with discretion and judgment. No man could be more convinced than myself that, except in extreme cases, we ought not to interfere with the financial arrangements which have been made by the Commons; and, therefore, though I cannot say that I see in the form in which the present Bill comes before us that desire to conciliate to which reference has been made, but, on the contrary, discover in it traces of a mortified feeling, a sense of being in the wrong, and yet of inability to get out of it, a desire at all hazards to annoy the other party—I concur with the noble Duke who spoke last that the House of Commons had an undoubted right to pass the Bill in its present shape. I am not sure, indeed, that in those extreme cases in which alone our interference is desirable, their passing the financial arrangements of the year in this form would at all interfere with the exercise of our discretion; because if they proposed any arrangement so clearly wrong that public opinion—which is the ultimate arbiter of all these questions between the Houses—would not support them, we might send it back for reconsideration, with the perfect certainty that they must bow to that supreme tribunal. I even see some incidental advantages in this form of Bill, and I am quite sure that if the Government had brought forward the financial proposals of last year in the same shape there never would have been any occasion for our exercising our power; because all those who remember what took place in the House of Commons with respect to the financial arrangements for the year will agree with me that if the whole of those arrangements had been included in one Bill—the addition to the income tax, the reduction of the duty upon foreign wines, and the repeal of the paper duty—the final majority in the Commons in favour of the repeal of the paper duty, which was only nine, would have been converted into a minority. The noble Duke who spoke last says the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) was entirely incorrect in his statement as to the calculations upon which your Lordships were persuaded to reject the Bill for the repeal of the paper duties last year, and he tells us that if it had not been for the bad harvest, which reduced the revenue, the original Estimates of the Government would have been borne out by facts. Let us consider for a moment how far that is true. I rest the decision of this House, in the matter of the paper duties last year, upon an entirely different ground. I say it was justifiable quite irrespective of the harvest and the ultimate result to the revenue. The information at that time before us clearly proved, upon the calculations of the Government themselves, that if the paper duties were repealed there would not be the means of balancing the account at the end of the year. We rejected the Bill on the 21st of May. Less than two months after—on the 16th of July—the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought a supplemental Budget before the House of Commons. In that Budget he was obliged to inform the House that he wanted £3,300,000 more than was provided in the original Estimates. He did not say that this necessity arose from any deficiency in the revenue; he said nothing about the harvest—quite the contrary; he told the House that up to the end of June the revenue was in every respect satisfactory, coming up to or rather exceeding the expectations of the Government. The sum of £3,300,000 was wanted for the expenses of the China war. It is quite true, as the noble Duke has stated, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made some inadequate provision for the expenses of that war in February; but upon the authority of Parliamentary Returns I deny that he had made as large a provision as information in the possession of the Government at the time warranted. A Return was moved for at the end of last Session by Sir John Pakington of the dates of the orders for sending out the whole force to China. Those orders, as far as the troops are concerned, range from October until the end of 1859; and, as far as the stores are concerned, they begin in September and go on until March, 1860, the great bulk of them being dated before the close of 1859. Therefore, the chief expenses of the expedition had been at that time incurred. Moreover, there is a despatch from Lord Elgin, dated the 11th of July, stating that two days before the whole force to be employed in the war had been collected—I think at Shanghai—and would be ready for action early in the year. Your Lordships may remember that before we entered into a discussion upon the paper duties, I asked my noble Friend the President of the Council whether the India troops serving in China would be allowed increased pay and allowances, and, if so, whether the Government had made any provision for this additional cost? My noble Friend answered that those troops would be allowed such increased pay and allowances; but that the Government had not then made any provision for this extra cost. In the month of February of last year, when the Budget was laid before the House of Commons, a sum of £500,000 was asked for to defray the expenses of the Chinese war, and Her Majesty's Government had the means of knowing, if they chose to avail themselves of them, that that amount was ludicrously inadequate for the purpose which it was intended to meet. The point was still more clear when we came to discuss the question of the paper duty in this House, and to assent to the repeal of that tax under such circumstances would have been to deprive the country of a sum absolutely necessary for the expenses which we were about to incur. It is, however, contended—and no doubt it is true—that the calculations embodied in the Budget of last year were seriously affected by the badness of the harvest;

but it should be borne in mind that the prospects of that harvest were from an early period of the year extremely doubtful; that the sowing-time was most unfavourable, and that throughout the year the growing crops never looked well. It is also true that if a larger amount was lost to the Government owing to the state of the harvest, they obtained as a set-off £800,000 more in the shape of Customs than the Chancellor of the Exchequer had anticipated. I may add that when the right hon. Gentleman introduced his supplementary Budget on the 16th of July he not only availed himself of the entire sum which had been saved to him by the action of this House, but found himself compelled to raise by means of an increased duty on spirits an additional sum of £1,000,000 sterling. Despite, however, of this additional million, and the maintenance of the paper duty, the Government were obliged to admit a deficiency on the expenditure of last year of £2,500,000. It appears, then, that our financial situation at the close of last year was £3,500,000 worse than it was supposed to be at the beginning of the year. Now, it appears to me that the right and wise course, under these circumstances, to adopt would have been to take, in framing the financial scheme for the present year, the most unfavourable view of the revenue as well as of the expenditure, and thus to make sure that we should have, even in the worst state of things, a surplus in the coming year. It has hitherto been the wise practice of Governments and of Parliament so to arrange their financial schemes that if, owing to unfavourable circumstances in one year, there should be a deficiency, there might be in a subsequent year a balance on the other side, so that in the course of a series of years the debt of the country might rather be decreased than augmented. That, it appears to me, was the only honest course to pursue. But I would ask you whether, on the showing of Her Majesty's Government themselves, that is the character of the present Budget? For my own part, I am of the contrary opinion. I believe it to be a Budget which is eminently speculative. If, indeed, your expenditure should happen to be cut down as much as you anticipate; should your harvest be a good one; and none of those threatening circumstances which we now observe affect the revenue, then undoubtedly you may find yourselves in the possession of a surplus, and the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer prove to be correct. Reflect, however, for a moment to the contingencies to which we are exposed. What is likely to be the result of a short supply of cotton, or a great augmentation in its price? If I am not misinformed its price will be increased, even though the production of the raw material should not be interfered with by that lamentable civil war, the occurrence of which on the other side of the Atlantic we all so much deplore. I am told that in Liverpool the rate of freight of cotton has been raised from  $\frac{1}{4}d.$  to  $2\frac{1}{4}d.$  per lb.; and, if there be this augmentation in the cost of the raw material, is it not certain that you will have a slack trade during a portion of the year, and accompanying a slack trade, as a necessary consequence, a deficient revenue? Then, as to the prospects of the harvest, we know that the autumn was in many parts of the country very unfavourable to the sowing of the corn crops, which are not, I am afraid, very promising in many districts throughout the country. These are facts, my Lords, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems not to have taken into account. We have, I think, an augmentation already of the interest of our unfunded debt. We have, I am told, a very considerable sum to pay in connection with the Stade Dues. Great doubt prevails with respect to the receipt of the indemnity from China, on which so much stress has been laid. Indeed, I am afraid that even if we should receive that indemnity we shall find that we have not made due calculations as to the cost at which it is to be obtained, because we know that it is contingent on our keeping up a force at certain ports. Then comes a most serious question, with respect to which I find no allowance made in the estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I allude to the probable cost of the war which is now raging in New Zealand. I am afraid that that expenditure, like the expense of the Chinese war, is kept studiously out of sight. These are considerations which, I confess, prevent me from placing confidence in the financial policy of the Government. Looking back at it for several years, I cannot help saying that it is one which appears to rest on no principle deliberately considered and steadily adhered to. Recollecting the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for some years past, I am struck with the contradictory principles they exhibit within a brief space of time; and which principles were thrown overboard as soon as they had served the purpose. A few years ago the present Chancellor of the Exchequer invented, as a novel principle, the plan of raising money by Exchequer bonds, stating that they constituted no loan, but merely an advance, and that, the faith of Parliament being pledged, there was not the slightest doubt that at the proper time the bonds would be paid off. I doubted that that would be the case, and predicted that the bonds would turn out a permanent addition to the debt. Well, experience has proved that I was correct. In the last year and in the present year the Chancellor of the Exchequer turns round and says that the bonds could be renewed, and that there is not the slightest occasion to pay them off until convenient. Well, if that were so—if it was intended that these bonds should be renewed from time to time—why depart from the old system of Exchequer bills? Again, a few years ago, we were told by the right hon. Gentleman that it was inexpedient that our taxation should rest to too great an extent on annual taxation. That doctrine was also altogether thrown aside last year, before the question of privilege arose, and a very large and dangerous amount of revenue was made to depend on annual taxation. The same high authority, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, denounced the income tax in most unmeasured terms, declaring that it was a tax that ought to be reserved for war, and war only, and urged the claims of the poor for a reduction of the duties on tea and sugar. This want of steadiness and consistency in the views taken by the Government, and especially by a Member of the Government responsible for the finances of the country, leads to very serious evils—to a changing backwards and forwards of taxation which greatly adds to its burden. The inequality and injustice of the income tax are the more felt when the tax is imposed for short periods; but when the income tax varies backwards and forwards, being now high and now low, it presses with extreme severity on certain classes of income. What has been the consequence of the want of steadiness in the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? In 1855, with his entire and cordial support, the income tax was reduced to  $5d.$  in the pound. It has since been  $10d.$ , and is now to be  $9d.$ , and in one half year it was practically  $13d.$  in the pound. Parliament and the country have a right to expect from the Government greater stability in the measures they submit to Parliament, and in their policy with respect to the taxation of the country. None of your Lordships can have forgotten that in the course of the year 1854, when the Russian war was breaking out, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made most eloquent speeches enforcing the duty of providing for the expenses of that great European war, not by loans, but by taxation. What, however, did the Chancellor of the Exchequer do last year? The expenses of the comparatively small Chinese war were taken in great measure from the balances of the Exchequer and other sources, which proceeding was equivalent to a loan; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself submitted to Parliament a proposition for embarking in a great scheme of national defence on borrowed money. Shakspeare says that "borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry," and that is true in respect to States as well as to private individuals; and it is important, when it is proposed to embark in a system of fortifications which will only lead to an absolute waste of enormous sums, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should call on the House of Commons to provide the money by taxation, and not by borrowing. I find that it is the opinion of officers both of the army and the navy that the expenditure will be fruitless, that the fortifications when completed will be useless owing to the improvements in gunnery; and I believe that this extravagance would not have been sanctioned by the Commons if they had not been enabled to shift a great portion of the burden from their own shoulders to the shoulders of those who are to come after them. There is another important matter, the unanimity of the Government. For the last two or three years it has been said in common conversation that there are portions of the measures proposed by Her Majesty's Government to which certain Members of the Government are entirely opposed. It was rumoured last year that these national defences were opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other Members of the Government. On the other hand, a rumour was equally current that there were other Members of the Government who rejoiced exceedingly over the decision to which this House came last year on the paper duty. I have no means of knowing any of the secrets of the Cabinet. I hope such reports were not true, but they were current in men's mouths, and they derived much confirmation from the language held by various members of the Government. It is impossible not to be struck by the discrepancy in the tone of various Members of the Government, when the necessity of this expenditure is in question. It reminds one of a humorous passage in Sir Walter Scott's novel of The Antiquary, in which Sir Walter talks of the two partners of the bank. When he was in good circumstances the civil partner was brought to him, who was everything that was smooth, and who asked him only to say what he wanted and the thing should be done. When, on the contrary, difficulties accumulated, the smooth speaker retired, and the other partner came forward, who held very different language, and told him he should be outlawed unless he produced an impossible sum by a given day. The Government resemble, in fact, one of those Dutch clocks in which one figure or another comes out according to the state of the weather. Now, we have one Member of the Government coming forward to recommend a reduction of taxes and dilate on the enormity of the expenditure; and then, when it is argued that a good state of defence ought to be maintained, we have language of a totally different character from other Members of the Government. I should like to see more steadiness in the conduct of the Government, and less want of harmony in their measures. I wish to see a judicious economy and a thrifty provision for our expenditure; but I see a reduction of taxation made that would only be prudent and justifiable in the event of a determination on the part of the Government to make a great reduction of the expenditure; while at the same moment they are proposing measures which tend to keep up this large expenditure. I should like to see a more judicious economy enforced. When I see what is going on abroad and the immense preparation that is going on in various parts of France, I do not think that any reduction can safely be made in our means of defence. But the Government have not taken a statesmanlike view in regard to what ought to be done. Two years the Speech from the Throne recommended an increased grant of money for the navy. I then observed that it was most impolitic, in the then state of naval science, to go on increasing the large ships of war. I was not listened to. The present Government were not then in office, and they are not, therefore, responsible for what was then done. The body really responsible is the House of Commons, which takes up these matters so lightly, and urges the Government into measures which have not sufficiently been considered. What has been the result of the expenditure of 1859? The result is that before these large ships are completed there is not an officer who does not agree that they have become perfectly useless for the purposes for which they were designed. The other day I went on board one of our splendid line-of-battle ships—the Duke of Wellington, at Portsmouth. I was told what an admirable ship she is; how well she sails and steams, and that if she had new engines she would be the finest ship of the class. But how did the officer who told me this conclude? He said, "It makes me melancholy to think that the day for these three-deckers is gone by." What with iron-plated ships, gunboats, large shells, and molten iron, it is impossible to risk these huge three-deckers in action. I believe it is under consideration whether these great ships cannot be cut down with advantage and plated with iron. The Government are doing precisely the same thing with respect to the fortifications that they have done with these ships. The whole art of gunnery and the science of fortification are in a state of revolution. They are spending enormous sums of money, the repayment of which is to be spread over thirty years, and, long before these fortifications are finished, they will be pronounced useless. The public have a right to complain, and to ask the Government on the one hand to keep down the expenditure as low as they can, and that, on the other hand, some settled views shall be deliberately adopted and steadily adhered to by which the expenditure thus increased shall be provided.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he would not long detain their Lordships, but as he was responsible for the Motion made last year to resist the repeal of the paper duty, and as his arguments on that occasion had been impugned in the present debate, he desired to vindicate the accuracy of the calculations he had made on the probable amount of the deficiency which he apprehended would be found to exist in the Estimates for the late year. He knew that this calculation had been attacked "elsewhere," and a similar charge had been made, and with equal error against his noble

Friend Lord Derby. The only error they had either of them committed was that of having adopted, as the basis of their reasoning, the hypothesis of Mr. Gladstone's respecting the expiration of the property and war duties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that there would be an enormous deficiency if things remained exactly as they were last year and the expiring taxes had not been renewed. This he called, as would be remembered, his great chasm. He (Lord Monteagle) had based his calculations on the same ground; adopting for the sake of argument, Mr. Gladstone's statement of facts, and he had further assumed that good faith would be kept with the public, and that the income tax, and the tea and sugar war duties would be reduced. It was, of course, very easy to say that a calculation was erroneous when the person who made it had not the power of giving an answer, and when the objector claimed and exercised a power of comparing two calculations made upon different bases, as if they rested on the same principles. The fact was that the difference between himself and the right hon. Gentleman arose from the difference of the meaning of the terms which they employed; the right hon. Gentleman used words in one sense at one time, and in a different sense at another, surplus, deficiency, little chasm and great chasm with him had their peculiar meanings; and the consequence was that there was confusion and alternate identity and difference which did not in reality exist. At any rate those who live in glass-houses should not throw stones; and if ever anybody did live in a glass-house it was the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself; for seldom was there a case presenting a greater contrast between the predictions of the financier and the results of his measures, than was to be found in relation to the financial propositions of the last few years. According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's last balance sheet on the 31st of March last the expenditure was no less than £2,558,000 in excess of the income; and he should like to know by what ingenuity it could be shown that this sum could be reconciled with the estimated surplus of £464,000 promised to Parliament, on the 10th February, 1860, or the more modest admission of a deficiency of £1,286,000 acknowledged on the 15th July, 1860. Was there ever witnessed "a greater crash and ruin of unfulfilled prophecies?" How could the deficiency of

£2,558,000 have been provided for out of the small balance of £464,000 surplus that was calculated on for that year? But it was provided for in part out of very different sources. Financially, the Government had been living by anticipating the Revenue. The income tax, collected in the ordinary manner, would have produced £8,900,000, but by the mode of collection adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer it was made to produce £10,900,000; the malt duty, which in the ordinary course of receipt would have produced £5,700,000, actually realized £6,274,000. This could not be considered as a natural increase of revenue, it was a mere discount of Government bills before they were due. The hop duty had proved a disappointment; but by anticipating the two former duties the Chancellor of the Exchequer had added £3,000,000 to the receipts, though not to the Revenue of the year. Thus last year the Government were living, not on increased income, but by anticipated receipts; they were now repeating the same ingenious process, and on a large scale. But it could not be continued, and, unless the expenditure should be largely reduced, or new sources of income discovered, the deficiency must continue, or, perhaps, increase. He feared, therefore, that the financial statement of this year would prove fallacious like the last. This year, as well as the last year, there were financial charges kept back. Last year, although the Budget was not stated until after the Defence Commissioners had completed and even presented their Report, and the Government, therefore, well knew the recommendations it contained, they carefully kept out of sight that a large sum of money would be required for fortifications. They maintained an obstinate silence, refusing all information, and withheld a Report which, though dated 7th February, 1860, was not delivered to Parliament till the 13th June. They then obtained a loan of £2,000,000 to be raised on terminable annuities for the expenditure of the last year. The total estimate was no less than £9,000,000; yet the Government had not informed Parliament how much would be required for these defences in the course of the present year. Nor had they told them how the means were to be provided for to defray the increased interest on the unfunded debt. What would be the full and ultimate demand on the public purse was still left a matter of mystery and concealment. Nor was this all; further services were now named, though not included in the Budget; there was a proposal to settle the question of the Stade Dues by money compensation; but how much was to be paid, and when had not been as yet officially stated. The inconvenience of such a mode of dealing with the finances piecemeal had been shown last year when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was compelled to go down to the House and propose a supplementary Budget. How will they reconcile this course with that which they now propose as for their new but not very constitutional decision? The course they propose to adopt was not more rational than extraordinary. It was avowed that the combination of all the financial proposals in one Bill was intended to restrain the free action of the House of Lords, and to this course as a friend to the Constitution of England he (Lord Monteagle) was strongly opposed. He did not think that House in consequence of its successful vote of the last Session was fairly open to the charge of disregarding the rights of the Commons. The new mode of coercion recommended by the Government had been censured by one of the most faithful friends of popular rights. Mr. Fox, in 1787, in allusion to a proceeding similar to that now proposed by the present Government warned the House of Commons against a step that he described as being "Not only a bad precedent for the Commons, but one which would as absolutely preclude the House of Lords from the rights of free debate, as if they followed the example of Oliver Cromwell and silenced that necessary and constitutional branch of the Legislature." [Hansard's Parliamentary History, vol. 28, p. 508.] On a subsequent day Mr. Fox repeated his argument pointing out "the difficulty in which the House of Lords would be placed by the blending together of two objects in one Bill," concluding by the advice that "instead of giving the Lords reason to complain of the Commons for having narrowed their grounds both of debate and voting, they ought studiously to avoid giving cause for such complaint." [March 21, 1787. Hansard's Parliamentary History, vol. 26, p. 757.] He (Lord Monteagle) did not ask their Lordships to reject the Bill for a repeal of the paper duties now sent to them by the Commons a second time, but he called upon them to act with caution, lest in acquiescing in the objectionable union of two differing and contradictory financial enactments they might be held to adopt a principle capable of unlimited application, and practically restricting the rights of that House, and its legislative freedom of action. In the present instance could the House of Lords believe that the blending together of these two Bills was at all necessary to prevent any interference with the rights of the Commons? The deliberate decisions of the other House were always received with respect by their Lordships, and the decision of the Lords as pronounced last Session by a majority of eighty-nine votes was no assertion of usurped privileges, but the exercise of an unquestionable right. This had now ceased to be a matter of controversy. Yet that decision had last Session led to an almost unexampled amount of vituperation coming from certain quarters not, perhaps, wholly disinterested. That vituperation had been overcome mainly by the good sense and feeling of the people at large. Their Lordships would recollect the opening of an office in Parliament Street to organize a resistance to what was most untruly designated as the aggression of the Lords. It proved a miserable failure. The proposition to substitute annual for permanent taxation was another mode which was recommended for coercing the House of Lords; but he begged again to warn the Government of the serious nature of the course they seemed but too ready to untie in adopting. Let them consider the consequences that would flow from converting our permanent taxation into taxes annually voted. This would be fatal to Mr. Pitt's greatest measure—the establishment of the Consolidated Fund—and would disturb the security of all charges placed upon that fund from the Civil List of the Sovereign to the deposit of the peasant in savings banks. To deprive the fundholders of the security they at present possessed was a proceeding of too much danger to be compensated even by the magnificent idea countenanced by high authorities of coercing the House of Lords. He feared that the abandonment of the paper duty had been resolved on, not for any public purpose but to afford some consolation to certain parties for the check they had received last year from the wise and he would add the popular proceeding of that House in the last Session. Another important question deserved a more serious consideration. A contingency which now seemed imminent, had in 1842 been foreseen and announced by the sagacity of Sir Robert Peel. It seemed to be approaching rapidly. In considering the financial state of England you are told by official authority that you are bound to take into account the financial position of India. Mr. Laing, the financial representative of the Government of India, had recently included in his Budget an announcement of incalculable importance. His words were as follows:—

“I have only allowed for a small decrease in the Home Charges proportionate to what we know of the actual numbers in Report—namely, from £2,772,610 in 1860-1, to £2,500,000 in 1861-2; but I hope and believe the reduction will be much larger. It is perfectly manifest that the officers and men belonging to Indian regiments in depôt are as much a reserve for England as for India. In case of any sudden and serious danger threatening England there is no doubt that these troops would be available there, and it is not fair that India should pay the full cost of the reserve establishments in India under such circumstances. The day is past when England can consider India as a sort of milch-cow on which to draw for a little here and a little there in order to ease an English Estimate or resuscitate an English Budget. Strict and impartial justice must be the rule in all money matters between England and India if England wishes to get a return for her capital, which will soon amount to £100,000,000 invested in Indian securities and railways, and wishes to see India the best source of supply for her raw material and the best market in the world for her staple manufactures. I know that arrangements are pending at home by which we hope to commute all charges for depôt or, otherwise, for a fixed sum for every soldier in India.”—Bombay Times, May 11.

This is frank, and these statements held out very clearly a prospect that at least some portion of the military expenditure in India must hereafter be provided for in the English Estimates. From the observations he had already felt it his duty to make he (Lord Monteagle) believed that there would be a difficulty in meeting expenditure so increased, and in such case next year we might be driven to impose new taxes. We shall then regret the unwise step we take in repealing the paper duties. They were now about to repeal an indirect tax on paper, and to diminish a direct tax—the penny in the pound imposed on property. But this apparent equality in the apportionment of relief was but delusive, the country must remember that the penny of the income tax might, and probably would, be reimposed hereafter to meet any deficiency; while, if they now gave up the paper duties, it was perfectly impossible ever to revive them. He must not, however, be misunderstood. He was no admirer of the paper duties, or indeed of any other tax. All taxes were necessary evils. He would be glad to repeal a tax if it could be done without risk; but it behoved Parliament to select well the taxes chosen for repeal, and above all things to be cautious in dealing with a source of revenue which, once given up, could never be restored. The taxes which had the first claim to be remitted or repealed were, in his judgment, those imposed to provide for the exigencies of war. Introduced to meet the pressure of an emergency, Parliament was logically and even morally bound to reduce or abolish them after that emergency had ceased. To this the faith of Parliament was pledged. He was surprised to hear it asserted that the increased tea and sugar duties were not to be considered as war taxes. Why, that was the very appellation which had been applied to those taxes by the Ministers themselves. The noble Lord concluded by disclaiming any asperity of feeling towards the Government in the remarks which he had made. He had risen before the noble Lord to his left (the Lord President) to give him the advantage of a reply, and he did not apprehend in his case, as unfortunately had been shown in the case of his colleague the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) who had preceded him, that Doris amara suam intermisceat undam.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that as he had gained his object by eliciting an expression of the opinion of the House, he would accede to the suggestion of his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) and would not press his Amendment.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that since the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) had acceded to the appeal made from both sides of the House and had withdrawn his Amendment, he would not trespass on their Lordships' time by offering any lengthened reply to the observations made in the course of the debate. His embarrassment in rising to address their Lordships on a question of such vast importance was increased by finding himself so liable to offend the critical ears of his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Derby). His noble Friend had objected to his peculiar phraseology in pronouncing the word "wropped," which he presumed the noble Earl pronounced "wrapped." This, however, was a question of personal pronunciation, and he must assert the right of every Englishman to pronounce certain words in the way which pleased him best; and before he could bow to the noble Earl's correction he must know whether it was wrong to pronounce the name of the capital of the central county in England "Derby" instead of "Darby." He must say he felt much gratified with the course the debate had taken. It was most satisfactory to him to know that, after that very short discussion, the Bill would receive the assent of their Lordships' House without further opposition. They had now heard all that could be said against the present Budget. ["No!"] He had a great opinion of the mercy of the noble Lords who had spoken against the measure, but he must presume that they had urged all the objections which they could find against it. The points upon which the noble Duke chiefly relied in opposing the proposals of the Government were the absence of any surplus, the superior claims of the tea and sugar duties over the paper duties for repeal, and the mode in which the Bill had been introduced into their Lordships' House. He had already stated the reason why the Government were entitled to assume that their estimated surplus was correct. The noble Earl had laid down a rule with which he could not agree. It was incumbent on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give a straightforward account of his anticipation as to the revenue, founded on the calculations laid before him by the different Departments. The noble Earl said it was his duty to place his estimate of the expenditure at the highest possible point, and to place the income at the lowest amount which he expected to receive. The noble Earl employed the word "honest" repeatedly in his speech; yet the course he suggested would not be, he would not say honest, but either expedient or wise. The Minister was bound to explain distinctly to Parliament the exact financial position of the country, and if he anticipated a large surplus it was not competent for him, especially in times when Governments were not omnipotent, to represent that surplus at a fancifully reduced amount, instead of proposing to apply it to the remission of taxes which, in his deliberate judgment, ought to be, and safely could be, remitted. By following the noble Earl's recommendation he might gain his object the first year; but, when the House of Commons and the country came to know that the Minister was in the habit of extracting from the pockets of the people more taxation than was required to defray the pub-

lie expenditure, there would be an immediate reaction, and the proceeding would be defeated. He would not enlarge on the inconsistency of denying the surplus and yet advocating a reduction of the tea duty, involving a greater sacrifice of revenue than that proposed by the Government. As to the tea duty being a war tax, its present rate was imposed after the war had been entirely closed. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer strongly objected to that measure at the time, and in a manner, as he thought, more violent than the occasion required, even if he had been right in his opinion. But only three months afterwards, when the expenditure—although at a period of peace—came to bear more of the character of a war expenditure, his right hon. Friend came forward and cordially approved the course taken by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer. With respect to the form in which the present Bill was introduced, he owned that the debate entirely satisfied him. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Rutland) was the only person who thought the measure offensive to their Lordships and unconstitutional. Most of the other speakers had admitted that it was quite constitutional, and perfectly within the powers of the other House. A noble Earl near him (Earl Grey) had gone even further, for he said the House of Commons were justified in the course they had taken. The noble Lord the Comptroller of the Exchequer (Lord Monteagle) had said that to frame the Bill in its present shape was wholly unnecessary. It was all very well to state that, but, if last year, before the rejection of the repeal of the paper duty, he had suggested in the Cabinet that the second reading of the Bill would be thrown out by their Lordships, the idea would have been treated as incredible. The noble Baron had directed his remarks principally against the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, as the right hon. Gentleman was not there to answer them, he thought it would have been better and more dignified if some of those remarks had been avoided. A great part of the noble Baron's argument was levelled, not against that Bill, but against the proceedings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year, and even against the propositions of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was previously in office. Noble Lords opposite seemed exceedingly anxious to defend themselves. The noble Baron said they discussed the repeal of the paper duty in August last with the knowledge of a bad harvest. A simple reference to Hansard would show that it was in May that they debated and rejected it. Another noble Earl (Earl Grey) said they had a knowledge of the bad harvest in May.

EARL GREY explained that he had said there was then a suspicion as to the harvest, but that the rejection of the Bill was not justified on that ground, but on the fact that in a subsequent statement the Chancellor of the Exchequer said there was a necessity for additional taxation.

EARL GRANVILLE: It was certainly stated that there was a great deal of doubt as to the harvest. The noble Earl went further; he said that in July the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not admit that the chances of the harvest were bad, but that up to that moment the revenue was very good. The noble Earl complained that troops and stores were ordered out to China in the autumn. That was perfectly true, and it was for the purpose of sending them that increased Estimates were taken, an additional sum of £500,000 being asked for in the military and naval departments. The whole depended on when that war broke out and how long it lasted. The noble Baron, who was formerly Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Monteagle), laughed at the idea of the weather being regarded as an element in the deficiency. He must say he was not a little surprised at this. That very autumn on malt and hops alone there was a deficiency of £1,000,000, attributable, of course, to the weather; and something like another £900,000 on spirits, from the state of the barley crop. A good deal of irrelevant matter had been introduced into the debate to which he would not refer. He should not enter into the financial statement of Mr. Gladstone, and it would be even more out of place to go into the question mooted by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) with regard to the Government having borrowed money last year for fortifications. Again, with regard to the construction of a certain class of ships now building, to which the noble Earl had objected, he thought that a very fair subject for debate, but certainly not upon the present occasion. He did not think it necessary to go into the financial statement of Mr. Laing, an extract from which had been read by the noble Baron, whether directly bearing on this country or on India; but this he might say, that the inference which the noble Baron drew from it was altogether unfounded. The noble (Earl Grey) had spoken of rumours of disunion in the Cabinet. Considering the noble Earl's connections and intimate relations with them all, he could not help observing that if such a thing as disunion existed and was known to the noble Earl, it could have become known to him only by the confidence of private communication, and then his high sense of honour would have made it impossible for him to introduce the matter as an element of discussion; but if it was unknown to him, and he had based his observations merely from flying rumours, there was no justification for the noble Earl having made it an argument in debate. But he did not think that his noble Friend was quite the person to talk about disunion in Cabinets. With regard to what took place in Lord John Russell's Cabinet, his (Earl Granville's) lips were of course sealed; but, earlier than that, when he was very young in political life, he remembered hearing a story which was current at the clubs at the time of Lord Melbourne's Government. His noble Friend the noble Earl objected to all the measures of his colleagues; at length Lord Melbourne requested him to sit down and write his objections. Rumour said that the noble Earl declined to do so; whereon Lord Melbourne, rubbing his hands, said, "When you have no one to object to but yourself you cannot get on." He congratulated their Lordships on the general tone of the debate, and still more on the practical termination of it. Prophecies were not safe things to indulge in; but this measure had been well considered. It was right in principle, and likely to lead to the same happy results that all similar measures for the removal of restrictions on commerce had succeeded in accomplishing.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly; and Committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

INDIAN COMMISSIONS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR GAVIN said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether first Commissions in the Regiments transferred from the Local Army in India to the Crown are obtainable with or without purchase, or by competitive examination?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the first commissions would be available in the first instance for providing for the demands of the sons of officers in the Indian Service, to whom the privileges they had formerly enjoyed were to be continued. The general question of entering the Queen's Army was a different matter, on which he was not now prepared to give an opinion.

SOVEREIGNS OF THE SYDNEY MINT.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If Her Majesty's Government have any Reports from the Master of the Mint, or other official persons, on the subject of making the Sovereign coined at the Branch Mint at Sydney a legal tender throughout Her Majesty's Dominions; and, if so, whether there is any objection to produce such Reports for the information of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, said, there was a correspondence now in progress upon this difficult and at the same time interesting question, whether the Australian sovereign should be allowed to circulate throughout Her Majesty's Dominions, or at least through the United Kingdom. That correspondence, of necessity, proceeded but slowly, as there were several parties to it—the Colony on the one hand, and on the other, in this country, the Treasury, the Bank of England, and the Colonial Office in particular. He should be glad, however, if it were desired, to produce the correspondence as far as it had gone, for it was very desirable that public attention should be called to the subject, as it might assist the Government in the consideration of the subject—and much consideration would be necessary before a safe conclusion could be arrived at.

UNITED STATES—THE CIVIL WAR— PRIVATEERING.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the proposal made by Her Majesty's Government to the United States, and the so styled Confederate States of America, to interdict the armed ships and also the privateers of both parties from carrying prizes made by them into the ports of the United Kingdom, or of any of Her Majesty's Colonies or possessions abroad, is or is not at variance with former practice; and also whether it is true that the Government of the United States have agreed to act towards the ships of this country on the principles laid down in the declaration of Paris?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: With regard, Sir, to the last question of the hon. Gentleman, that forms a part of the subject which the hon. Member for Galway county (Mr. Gregory) has intimated his intention of bringing forward to-night, and it is, therefore, better that I should defer any remarks upon it. We have made no proposal to the Government of the United States or to the Confederate States with regard to bringing in prizes to any of Her Majesty's ports; what we have done is to give orders to the authorities in the ports of the United Kingdom and to Her Majesty's Governors in the Colonies to interdict the entrance of ships of war or privateers with prizes into any of our ports. With regard to the usage it is difficult to say what the usage has been, because there is hardly any instance of a considerable maritime war, being carried on in which many prizes were made where this country has been neutral. There is no doubt, according to the opinion of the Queen's Advocate, supported by the authorities on the Law of Nations, that every Power has a right to interdict the entrance of prizes into their ports. Mr. Wheaton in his well known treatise lays it down that it is entirely within the discretion of any Power so to interdict the entrance of ships of war or privateers with prizes.

THE ENGLISH AGENT AT PESTH. QUESTION.

MR. DUNLOP said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it be the case that the Austrian Government has demanded the withdrawal of Mr. Graham Dunlop from Pesth, and whether he has been, in consequence, recalled to Vienna; also, whether his conduct while at Pesth has given occasion of dissatisfaction to Her Majesty's Government, or any just cause of complaint to that of Austria?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the position of Mr. Dunlop was that of an Attaché to our Embassy at Vienna, and he was sent to Pesth by his (Lord John Russell's) desire, and according to the wishes of our Ambassador at Vienna; but it was remarked soon afterwards by the Austrian Government that his presence there might seem to give some countenance to the disaffected party in Hungary. His answer to that was that if at any time the Austrian Government should wish him to leave, as we had no right to keep an Attaché there, he should be withdrawn immediately. The Austrian Government did express their desire that he should leave, but it was not founded on any part of the conduct of Mr. Dunlop. On the contrary, the Austrian Government had no fault to find with him; and Her Majesty's Government had every reason to be satisfied with the faithful and impartial reports which he had sent home.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to know whether there is any objection to produce Count Rechberg's Despatch requiring Mr. Dunlop's withdrawal?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there were no despatches from Count Rechberg on the subject. He had stated some time ago in conversation, that if Mr. Dunlop was to remain at Pesth other agents from other countries would be sent there, and it would be inconvenient to the Austrian Government. Count Rechberg never made a formal demand that Mr. Dunlop should be withdrawn.

THE VOLUNTEER VOTE.—QUESTION.

In answer to Sir JAMES FERGUSSON,

LORD ELCHO said, his wish was to bring on the Motion of which he had given notice with regard to the Volunteer Vote as soon as possible. He was informed by the Under Secretary for War that it was his intention to bring on the Volunteer Vote the first in Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates to-night, and if so, he (Lord Elcho) should bring his Motion on then.

PROTESTANT WORSHIP IN SPAIN. EXPLANATION.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Perhaps the House will allow me to make a statement which affects myself personally. I wish to explain what has been my conduct with regard to a debate which took place in this House, and at the same time to answer certain charges made against me. It appears that on the 18th of May a question was put in this House to my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) with respect to Mr. Brackenbury and the Vice Consul at Xerez. After that debate my noble Friend called my attention to the subject, and I immediately sent for the papers and examined them carefully. Some days were necessarily employed in framing a draught despatch on the subject; but on the 28th of May I wrote this draught to Consul Brackenbury —

“ Sir,—With reference to your correspondence with Sir Andrew Buchanan respecting Protestant worship at Xerez, I have to state to you that the refusal of Mr. Gordon to allow Protestant service to be performed in his house, on the ground that he could not, as a Roman Catholic, conscientiously do so, makes it desirable that his office as British Vice-Consul should be transferred to some other person. Her Majesty's Government are perfectly aware that, as Mr. Gordon points out in his letter to Mr. Methuen, there is no Act of Parliament under which British subjects have a right to claim the use of a Consul's house for the performance of Divine worship; but it is obvious that in Spain, where the laws are such that British subjects are unable to obtain permission to worship according to the tenets of the vast majority of Englishmen, in any other place than the Consular residence, Her Majesty's Government are bound to favour the appointment to Consular offices of persons who are not impelled by conscientious scruples to refuse to their countrymen facilities for Protestant worship in their Consular residences. I have, therefore, to instruct you to recommend, as a successor to Mr. Gordon, some other British resident at Xerez, who would not object to the performance of Protestant service in his house.”

The House will now be able to judge whether I am in fault or not.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish to say one word in explanation. The date of the despatch is the 28th of May. The discussion took place in this House on the 18th of May. I said last night that I had read a letter dated the 27th of May, and up to that period Consul Brackenbury had received no orders from Her Majesty's Government or the British Minister at Madrid. As I know that the mail only takes five days from Cadiz to London, I ask the House whether or not the noble Lord, with due submission to his important duties, might not have made the communication at an earlier period?

UNITED STATES—THE CIVIL WAR. OBSERVATIONS.—MOTION POSTPONED.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that, before the Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply was read, he wished to make an appeal to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), and to ask him whether it was absolutely necessary that he should proceed with the Motion of which he had given notice:—“ To call the attention of the House to the expediency of the prompt recognition of the Southern Confederacy of America ”? He believed he was speaking the opinion of a great number of persons who were well acquainted with everything which related to the United States of America, and who were deeply interested in our maintaining friendly relations with those States, when he said that it would be very inexpedient at the present moment to enter upon such a discussion.

MR. GREGORY said, in answer to the question of the hon. Member, he could assure the House that he was the last man who would willingly involve the country in any embarrassment, or take any course which would in any degree be prejudicial to the maintenance of friendly feelings with America. He had proposed to bring forward this Motion because he thought it only fair that one section of the States should have an opportunity of justifying the course which they had taken, and the only object which he had in view in bringing forward the subject was that he might endeavour, if possible, to give a perfectly impartial statement of the differences which exist between the two sections of that country. He must say that he felt himself almost pledged to do so, in consequence of the letters that have been published in the papers, and the speeches that have been made by American Plenipotentiaries; but, although they had heard only one portion of the question, although the information which had been published came almost exclusively from Northern sources, and although he was almost pledged to persevere in his Motion, yet seeing that there was such a strong feeling in the House on the subject, he was unwilling to do anything which could in the slightest degree aggravate or embitter the dispute. He would not put himself in opposition to the wishes of the House, so generally expressed, and, therefore, he would postpone the Motion to some future opportunity. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham said, “ Withdraw it.” He would postpone it sine die, with the hope that he should have some opportunity before the close of the Session of bringing forward the subject; because he must say that it was most unfair and most unjust that publications should be circulated throughout England in which the Southern Confederacy were accused of unwarrantable secession, and its members were called traitors and perjurers; and that he should have no opportunity whatever of putting forward their case in a manner in which it could be dispassionately considered.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman meant to bring the subject forward on another occasion or to postpone it altogether?

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he hoped it would be understood on behalf of those who did not take the same view as the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken—["Order."]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the noble Lord that there is no Question before the House.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES wished to ask the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. Forster) whether it was his intention to proceed with his Motion; which, he apprehended it was perfectly competent for him to do, notwithstanding the withdrawal of the Motion of the hon. Member for Galway?—"To call the attention of the House to the inexpediency of interfering in behalf of those Citizens of the United States who are now in insurrection against their Government, by a recognition of the Confederacy which they have formed."

MR. W. E. FORSTER entirely agreed in the feeling of the House that it was most undesirable there should be a discussion on the merits of the quarrel between the States of America. He should never have thought of putting his notice on the paper had it not been for the notice of the hon. Member for Galway. If it were only the intention of the hon. Member to postpone his Motion for a short period he believed it would conduce to a better understanding of the relations with America and to preventing misconception were he to bring forward his Motion to-night. [Ories of "No!" and "Agreed."] With the understanding that the Motion of the hon. Member was postponed indefinitely, he would withdraw his Motion altogether.

MR. CRAWFORD asked the hon. Member for Galway, whether his notice would remain on the paper? ["No—he said sine die."]

Mr. Gregory

On Motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply,

APPOINTMENT OF MAJOR GENERAL EDEN &c.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CONINGHAM rose to call the attention of the House to the appointment of Major General Eden to the colonelcy of the 50th Regiment. He said that in bringing forward this subject he desired to disclaim all personal motives; he desired to ascertain on what principle these important offices, giving considerable emoluments, were conferred. He understood that the principle on which the appointments in the Army and Navy were made was the principle of solution by merit. If they were made on that ground, he did not know how it was applied to the case of Major General Eden; and if they were made on the ground of seniority certainly this appointment of General Eden could not be justified. It was clear that Major General Eden had not received his appointment on the ground of seniority, for there were many officers who stood before him in the Army List, and whose names had been honoured by distinguished services. There was, for example, General Nicoll, a full General, who entered the service in 1803, and was severely wounded in his 107th action. In the list of major generals he found the name of Major General Cole, who had entered the service seventeen years before Major General Eden, who stood fifth on the list of major generals, and to whose name many distinguished services were attached; while General Eden stood twenty-fifth on the list. Then, if the principle of seniority was abandoned and if the principle to be adopted was that of meritorious services, he might say that Major General Eden's name did not appear on the list of good service pensions. There were a number of other officers whose services were almost fabulous, and, therefore, if those appointments were to be made on the ground of merit, nothing could be more unfair than the choice of Major General Eden. If the selection were owing to the circumstance of his being a Guardsman it was equally unfair, as there were distinguished names before his on the list of Guardsmen. Among the General Officers who were not colonels of regiments he might mention the following:—Major General Porter, who entered the service in 1810, and who went through six campaigns in the Peninsula, Major General Elliott, who also entered the service in 1810, and had the war medal with five clasps; Major General Pringle Taylor, also an officer of distinguished service; Major General Sir Robert Garratt, who entered the service in 1811, and served till 1854-5; Major General T. Williams, Major General Napper Jackson, Major General M'Pherson, Major General Bell, who had obtained a medal of three clasps; Major General Sir Robert Law, who wore a medal with six clasps. In fact, it was only necessary to turn to the Army List in order to see with how much unfairness this lucrative sinecure had been conferred. He had reason to know that that appointment had created great dissatisfaction throughout the service. He had received a letter from an old officer at Liverpool who stated that Major General Eden had no services to point to, and neither a medal nor a bit of riband to display, and that the appointment was regarded by all veterans as a most atrocious Horse Guards' job. He did not suppose that it was Major General Eden's fault that he had not had an opportunity of rendering distinguished services to his country, or that, if he had had such an opportunity, he would not have taken full advantage of it; but he held that important emoluments such as those of a colonelcy should be bestowed, not merely on a good man, but on the best man that could be selected. There was a similar appointment last year, which excited not a little dissatisfaction, and the Horse Guards could not be allowed to continue to dispense patronage in the same fashion. He wished to ask the Under Secretary for War on what principle the appointment was made, and whether the same principle was to be applied for the future? He felt that no apology was required for bringing the subject before the House. It was not a matter of prerogative, with which the House had nothing to do, but one which it was not only their right but their duty to consider.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he thought if the hon. Gentleman had taken back his recollection to a conversation that took place in this House last year, he would not have supposed that there was any doubt as to the responsibility that attached to the appointment to the colonelcy of regiments. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, in his evidence before the Committee on Military Organization, distinctly stated that the responsibility of these appointments rested on him; and in a discussion that subsequently took place in this House he in no way disputed the right of the House of Commons to call in question anything connected with the administration of the army. With regard to the observations the hon. Gentleman had made, he did not collect from them that he had raised any fresh point from those which had been raised in the previous discussion. He had certainly mentioned the names of two or three officers who he considered should have been preferred to Major General Eden for this appointment. But before doing so he hoped the hon. Gentleman would permit him to say that he wished he had consulted those who were acquainted with the position of officers in the Army List; because he had mentioned the names of several officers who were not on the established list, but who had retired in one way or other, and who had not even the right to be considered. That disposed of his statement about General Cole and others. [MR. CONINGHAM: What others?] He believed that Major-General Piper also was not on the established list. He thought it unnecessary to discuss the names of those officers who had been mentioned by the hon. Member, with this exception, that in mentioning the name of Major General Bell, whose name had been before mentioned in the House and in the public prints, as an officer who had a first claim to such an appointment, he thought he might be allowed to say that Major General Bell stood forty or fifty lower down in the list than Major General Eden; and there were many other officers not mentioned by the hon. Gentleman who could not have been passed over in favour of Major General Bell. Now the principle on which these appointments were recommended by the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary for War was this—the fixed list of General officers was taken as they came in seniority, with this exception, that officers who had rendered distinguished services in the field—and by distinguished services he meant officers who had distinguished themselves by command in the field, not officers who had by the accident of the service been engaged in the field—should be considered before those who had not been fortunate enough to have been so engaged. Now, let them see how this principle had been carried out in the case of General Eden. No less than twelve officers junior to Major General Eden had been appointed to regiments previous to his appointment. He would not trouble the House with mentioning the names of those officers, because he thought it better to avoid, as far as possible, discussion on the comparative merits of officers. But with regard to the services of Major General Eden, he begged to repeat what he said on a former occasion. It had been stated elsewhere that Major General Eden was a Guardsman. He (Mr. Baring) stated the other in this House that Major General Eden was not a Guardsman. Of course, he conceived that any Gentleman who paid attention to these subjects would have understood that he meant that General Eden did not rise to the rank of lieutenant colonel by service in the Guards, which was the advantage which officers of the Guards had in respect to their promotion to the rank of Major General over the Line. General Eden served to the rank of lieutenant colonel in a regiment of the Line, taking his share of service like any other officer attached to Line regiments. It had been stated that Major General Eden had not served in the Colonies; but the fact was that he had served in the West Indies twice. The first time he served with his regiment as major for a year, and the second time as lieutenant colonel of his regiment for the same period, and the reason he did not stay longer was, that his health suffered so much that he was obliged to return home. Was it a reason that he should be deprived of his chance of these appointments, that he had not been able from the disposition of the regiment he commanded, to render service in the field? General Eden served uninterruptedly for thirty-seven years on full pay. After his promotion to the rank of Major General he had the command of the Western District for four years. That was not a lucrative command—on the contrary, the officers who had those commands were in all probability put to considerable expense; therefore, so far from that being an objection to the appointment of General Eden to the command of a regiment, it might be said on the contrary that it gave him an increased claim. He, therefore, thought the principle of selection, as he had stated it, had been fairly carried out in this case, and the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary for War were fully justified in giving Major General Eden a regiment, and no such words as "Horse Guards' job," and so on, ought to be applied to this appointment. If the expression used by the anonymous correspondent of the hon. Gentleman were to be considered for a moment by those who had the management of the affairs of the army, and if the officers who had not been to the seat of war were to be debarred from consideration in appointments of this kind, the greatest dissatisfaction would be created, and great injury done to the service.

COLONEL NORTH did not withdraw a word which he had said the other evening upon this subject. The post of honour for an officer was that to which he was ordered by his Sovereign, and nothing could be more fatal to the Army than only to reward service in the field. And what was service in the field? If an officer sat upon his horse at the head of his regiment or his brigade, exposed only to the same fire to which every drummer boy in the regiment was exposed, that was not distinguished service, and did not merit peculiar reward; but, on the other hand, if he had performed services such as those of General Sir Hope Grant, who had recently concluded the war in China, no one would grudge him any honour or reward which might be conferred upon him. General Eden had had on all occasions fulfilled his duties as an officer. He never refused to go to the colonies. On the contrary, he was two years there with his regiment as major and lieutenant-colonel, and returned home, not of his own choice, but to the command of the dépôt. Three years afterwards he received the command of his regiment, and immediately joined it; but his health was so seriously injured that he was obliged to return home two years afterwards, and was then told by his medical advisers that if he was again exposed to a tropical climate his life would be in considerable danger. That surely was a service which did not disentitle him to the rewards of his profession. He did not think that he should ever have a better opportunity than this of asking the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) to explain why he and his Friends availed themselves of every opportunity like this to make attacks upon the Guards—as gallant and distinguished a body of men as ever served in any army in the world? Had the hon. Gentleman anything to say against the conduct of the officers of the Guards? Had they not always performed their duty in the most honourable and distinguished manner? Had the hon. Gentleman anything to say against the non-commissioned officers of the Guards? They were as fine a body of men and as good soldiers as any in the world. If he had nothing to say against them he had better spare his remarks, which old soldiers must feel to be extremely disagreeable and insulting. One of the complaints most frequently urged against the Guards was that they did not serve in India or the Colonies; but the hon. Gentleman himself once belonged to a heavy dragoon regiment, and it was only very recently that the heavy dragoons began to take Indian or colonial service. If the hon. Gentleman thought that he could excite a feeling of hostility or jealousy between the Guards and the Line, he should recommend him to employ his time in some more profitable manner, because that was an undertaking in which he would never succeed.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton had been rather hardly used by the gallant Officer. His hon. Friend did not say a word against the non-commissioned officers of the Guards, because it was known that in those regiments all the work was done by the non-commissioned officers. He was rather surprised that hon. and gallant Officers should be so anxious to come forward and defend the acts of the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary for War. It was much the same as if all the lawyers in the House were to rise to defend the Lord Chancellor, or a number of clergymen the Archbishop of Canterbury. He wondered that the hon. and gallant Gentlemen had not better taste, and did not see that the public might be led to imagine that they took this course in the hope that they themselves might get a turn some day—an imputation under which he was sure that the hon. and gallant Officer who had just spoken would be most unwilling to suffer.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, that he was not backward in giving the name of "job" to any act either of the Horse Guards or of the Admiralty which he thought deserved that title; but in this instance he thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) had been misinformed, and had not sufficiently acquainted himself with the circumstances. General Eden had much cause to complain of the conduct of the hon. Gentleman towards him. He had not the honour of knowing General Eden, but he had taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the facts of the case. That gallant officer came under the second category laid down by the Under Secretary of War—namely, officers who had not had the good fortune to be distinguished in battle, but who had served their country long and faithfully in whatever part of the world they were called on to do so. The hon. Member for Brighton had endeavoured to prejudice his case by saying that, as a Guardsman, he had received extra pay. [Mr. CONINGHAM was understood to express dissent.] Yes, a particular stress had been laid on extra pay. Now, what were the facts? General Eden on joining the service entered the 84th Regiment, and having served in it for some time he went into the 52nd, and did duty wherever he was ordered. Finally, he went to Jamaica with the 56th Regiment, which was so wasted with illness that a number of men, greater than that which originally left home, was buried while the regiment remained there under the command of General Eden. That he called much harder and perhaps as meritorious service as if he had been called to meet death on the stern field of battle. A Medical Board sat upon him, and he was ordered to come home; he went out again in nine months, and, being once more attacked with yellow fever, another medical board sat upon him, and declared that unless he went home at once his life would not be worth a month's purchase. He wished to return to Jamaica, but his medical advisers would not allow him to do so. And now came the question of extra pay. He laid out £3,000 on exchanging from lieutenant colonel in the Line to be captain and lieutenant colonel in the Guards; and everybody knew what loss of rank was involved in giving up the command of a regiment to do captain's duty at St. James's. The hon. Member ought to have informed the House that of the long list of officers which he had mentioned all, with one exception, had long retired from active service, and were what was called vulgarly in the navy "Yellow Admirals." A very great injustice had been done in this discussion not only to General Eden, but to the Horse Guards. Let the hon. Member put his finger on a job and support the statements with good arguments and sound information, and he would support him; but it was prejudicing the cause of reform both in that House and in the public mind to bring forward a case such as that of General Eden proved to be upon investigation.

GENERAL LINDSAY was exceedingly sorry that this, to some extent, should have been made a Guards' question. It had been said that it was the non-commissioned officers who made the privates, but from something like thirty years' experience in the Guards, he knew that it was the officers who made the non-commissioned officers, and they in turn helped to keep up the discipline of the battalion. He supposed that when the hon. Member for Brighton alluded to the increase of pay, he was not so much speaking of the increase of pay as a Guardsman, but as a General Officer removed from the Guards. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that that increase of pay entirely ceased when the officer became a colonel of a regiment, and was absorbed in the general pay. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that the whole subject of military appointments had been explained before two Parliamentary Committees—one in 1833, and another which sat last year—he meant the Committee on Military Organization. The rule laid down in appointments was that those officers were first preferred who had performed distinguished military service, and then colonial service. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that Major General Eden had been under this principle passed over by a number of officers junior to him on account of meritorious war services. Two of these had served in the Peninsula, one in India, one with distinction in the Crimea, one in the Crimea and at the Cape, one in the Mahratta war, and one had served in India and also distinguished himself at Lucknow. Remembering that with the exception of the Crimean war there had been no great European conflict since the Peninsular campaigns, it was only natural that the great majority of officers in the rank of generals should have seen little service in the field, though they had commanded regiments with distinction in every part of the world. Whose fault was it that they had not been engaged on war service? One of the most painful feelings to which an officer could be subjected was when war was going on to be excluded from his share of the glory and advantages. Would it not, then, be additionally unjust to lay it down as a rule that any man who had not seen actual war should be debarred from becoming colonel of a regiment? He thought it would be most injurious to the service if the claims of those who had been debarred the opportunity of war service, because their regiments were employed in other or colonial service, were neglected. The Duke of Wellington, while always taking care to reward distinguished merit in the field, had always laid it down as a principle that officers unable to be with the army in a campaign, but who were serving their country in other parts, should not be passed over. He could corroborate the statement made by the hon. Member for Liskeard, and he might add that General Eden, as it happened, did not exchange from the 56th Regiment into the Guards till the former had been ordered from Jamaica to Canada.

MR. WHITE said, if hon. Gentleman entertained a low estimate of the impartiality of the Horse Guards the hon. Member for Liskeard himself was responsible for that impression, having while in office, or shortly after his retirement, stated that the best thing which could happen at the Horse Guards would be for the Serpentine to be turned through it, as that would be the only effectual method of getting rid of all the jobbery and corruption which prevailed there. General Eden ought to be grateful to his gallant colleague the Member for Brighton, as his Motion had been instrumental in eliciting all the testimony which had been given to his good services and admirable conduct. He only regretted the gallant Member for Oxford should have felt it necessary to import the Guards' element into the discussion. [Colonel NORTH: Why do not you leave the Guards alone?] He hoped they would not be left alone, but that on all occasions testimony would be borne in that House to the gallantry and good service of the household troops. But he thought they showed an excessive sensitiveness on all occasions.

DEATH OF COUNT CAVOUR.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, may I be permitted to call the attention of the Government and the House thus early to a subject which has been alluded to in the other House of Parliament, and which, I am quite sure, without any reference to party-feeling or prejudice, might now elicit an expression of feeling in this House—I refer to the death of Count Cavour? It does appear to me that this is a fitting occasion when the House of Commons might take an opportunity of expressing its deep feeling of regret and sympathy for the loss which Italy has just sustained in the premature death of that statesman—a man who was certainly the most conspicuous statesman that ever directed the destinies of any nation on the Continent in the path of constitutional liberty. I believe it would be well that some slight allusion should be made to this subject. It is not for us to scrutinize the decrees of Providence in the dispensation of human affairs, but I do think that the calamity which has fallen on Italy, and which has darkened the prospects and the peace of Europe at this moment, is a subject that ought to engage the attention of this House, and that, irrespectively of that tribute which the public opinion of this country will pay to the memory of Count Cavour, it becomes us to give an official expression to our own feelings of regret for the loss of the man, and of condolence with that nation on whom this loss must most heavily fall. I may remind the House of that which is, perhaps not, within its knowledge—that in 1850 the French National Assembly entered in the procès verbal of the 5th of July a record of its regret at the loss which at that moment this country was sustaining. I think that, without doing anything derogatory to this Assembly, we might take some such course now. The noble Lord at the head of the Government might suggest some mode by which we could enter on the records of this House an expression of our sense of the loss which Italy and Europe generally have sustained in the death of Count Cavour. Many hon. Gentleman in the House disapproved the policy of Count Cavour. Many of us—perhaps from not knowing the difficulties and dangers which encircled his course—questioned his policy and criticised his conduct. But he is gone; he lies wrapped in the sleep of death, and I believe it is befitting us, when we now see the merits of his character rising so conspicuously to our view, to give some expression to our sympathy and regret. I am sure I not only give utterance to the opinions of many in this House, but also of very many in this country, when I tender to the memory of that man my tribute of respect and regret as a simple Member of Parliament.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, having been engaged in diplomatic transactions with Count Cavour, and the hon. Baronet having thought proper to mention the subject on this occasion, I cannot but feel it due to the memory of him who is gone to say that I believe there never was a man who devoted himself, heart, and mind, and soul, more entirely to his country than the late Count Cavour. Undoubtedly he had great ability, he had capacity for great labour, and that ability and that labour were devoted, from the earliest time at which he was capable of giving an opinion, to achieve the independence of the people of Italy. There is no one who looks back to the time when he commenced that enterprise but must see that it was a task attended with the greatest difficulty. The manner in which he began to interest the Powers of Europe, by proposing to act in concert with England and France in the Crimean war, and afterwards at the Congress of Paris, by stating, in the face of European statesmen, what he considered to be the grievances and wrongs of Italy, while it showed how deeply he felt those grievances and wrongs, showed also that he had an intuition as to the means by which alone the independence of Italy, now happily achieved, could be accomplished. This is not the time to speak of the various transactions in which he has been engaged. I had the good fortune both diplomatically to treat with him and to be personally and privately acquainted with him, and I cannot forbear offering this tribute to the memory of a man destined to stand conspicuous in history.

THE O'DONOGHUE: Sir, I rise for the purpose of expressing my entire dissent from the proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, and from the praises lavished on the late Count Cavour by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. One of the principal features of Count Cavour's policy was hostility to the temporal power of the Pope. And, Sir, the character of that policy was a persistent and systematic misrepresentation of the state of things in the States of the Church, in order to screen and favour the aggrandisement of Sardinia. Sir, this policy—such a policy—may, I have no doubt, harmonize with the prejudices of many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of this House, who are ready to believe every story about Papal misgovernment with that stupid bigotry of many of the people of this country, who are equally ready to believe it; but I have no doubt that it is a policy which is a gross outrage on the feelings of the great majority of Christians throughout the world. I say that I yield to no man—either to the hon. Baronet or the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary—in my desire to see the Italian people free. I say that I yield to no man in my desire that Italy should be entirely free of Austrian domination; but I refuse to accept the armed supremacy of Sardinia over the heretofore free peoples of Italy as a true definition of Italian liberty. Sir, I am not afraid, even in this House of Commons, to say that I think I see the finger of God's justice in the death of Count Cavour. [Loud cries of "Oh, oh," and interruptions.] Sir, do not let the House misunderstand me. ["Oh, oh!" and renewed interruptions.] I am far from exulting ["Oh, oh!"] at the termination of his career. ["Oh, oh!"] On the contrary, I regret it. I regret the death of Count Cavour ["Oh, oh!" and continued interruptions], though, no doubt, I regret it for reasons very different from those of many other hon. Gentlemen. [Renewed cries of "Oh, oh!"]

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: Sir, I think that the hon. Gentleman opposite (the O'Donoghue) entirely misapprehended the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth. It was not his intention that the House of Commons should dispute over the dead body of a great man. He desired, and I believe most Members of this House desired, without reference to any particular form of opinion, to pay the homage of constitutional opinion in this country to a statesman who founded constitutional institutions in his own, and who, in addition to that glorious achievement, has doubtless brought about a great national unity—has realized and made a fact what for so many years has been the dream of the best men in Europe. We feel here—I know that I feel—so deeply the disappearance of this foremost man in Europe from this earthly scene that I am conscious that words are utterly inadequate to express the solemnity of the occasion. We are not called on to discuss the character of an individual, but to express as solemnly and as simply as we can our sense of the mighty loss which Europe has sustained in the removal of a great guiding mind—a mind which had the power not only to grasp the destinies of Italy, but in a great degree to contribute to the peace of the world by the combination of a determination, a moral courage, and an intellectual vigour which I believe exist in no one other statesman of Europe. My hon. Friend has alluded, with a modesty which becomes the son of so great a man, to the fact that the National Assembly of France entered upon its formal records the sympathy of France and Europe for the death of Sir Robert Peel. Perhaps it is not so much in accordance with our usages—separated as we are from the immediate action of continental struggles—to adopt such a formal proceeding; but, as in the other House of Parliament, so in this, I believe it would be well that both sides should give expression to their sympathy and regret, all the better, perhaps, for being the less mixed up with political feelings and political opinions. And, Sir, on that matter I should not have said a word had it not been that the hon. Gentleman opposite has taken upon himself the function of interpreting the ways of Providence in a manner which I am sure he himself, in his better moments, will not approve. Even though led away by religious enthusiasm—[The O'DONOGHUE: No!]

—it is hardly for him or for me, or for any mortal man, in the exercise of his miserable, feeble judgment, to say whether the disappearance of Count Cavour from this world will tend to that object which the hon. Gentleman himself wishes to promote—whether the confusion and difficulties which the Catholic Church has sustained in later times may not be rendered more distant, and those difficulties may not be increased—whether that humiliation, which I never wished to see, may not be effected in the absence of that great man, who, I believe, never let out of his mind the important fact of the constitution of the Catholic Church, and who, having lived and died a sincere member of that Church, did nothing more against it than he believed to be consistent with his character as a statesman, and necessary for the prosperity of his country. It would ill become me to pronounce a panegyric on his name, for the best panegyric is to be found in the sympathy of the whole civilized world. The feelings we entertain are not merely to be attributed to a sense of the loss we have sustained, but to the fear which, I believe, will agitate the mind of every far-seeing statesman who looks to the difficulties that may arise on the great questions which are now to be discussed, and which will be discussed without the aid of that great and powerful spirit whose wisdom and patriotism have so often directed such discussions to success.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot refrain from adding a few words to what has been said by those who have preceded me. I must own that there can be no person more fitted to introduce this subject to the consideration of the House than the son of that eminent statesman whose memory was made the subject of a formal tribute of admiration by the Legislature of the neighbouring country of France. Sir, my hon. Friend has suggested that some proceeding of the same sort might be adopted on the present occasion. But, with all submission, I would say that every country is guided by its own habits in such cases, and that that which may be congenial to the customs of countries on the Continent may not be in accordance with our own. I believe there is no instance on record of any proceeding such as my hon. Friend would suggest even in the case of the most distinguished statesmen of our own land whose departure from among their contemporaries may have been the subject of regret. Therefore, I think the House will content itself with an expression of sympathy with what has fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth, and from other Gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion. I am not going to follow the hon. Member who has spoken on the other side of the House (the O'Donoghue), who has introduced matter which I think had better been omitted. But I feel that I should be wanting to my own sentiments if I refrained from concurring with those who have expressed the deep regret which is felt for the loss of this distinguished man—a loss not only to his own country, which will deeply deplore him, but to the whole of Europe, and whose memory will live embalmed in the grateful recollection of his countrymen and in the admiration of mankind so long as history records his deeds. When I speak of what Count Cavour has done it ought to be borne in mind that the most brilliant acts of his Administration, and those which have most attracted the notice of the world—namely, the political extension of unity throughout Italy—are, perhaps, not those for which his countrymen will most revere his memory. It should be remembered that he laid the foundation of improvements in the constitutional, legal, social, and, indeed, in all the internal affairs of Italy, which will long survive him, and confer inestimable benefits on those who live and on those who are to come hereafter. It may be truly said of Count Cavour that he has left a name “to point a moral and adorn a tale.” The moral which is to be drawn from the life of Count Cavour is this—that a man of transcendent talents, of indomitable energy, and of inextinguishable patriotism, may, by the impulses which his own single mind may give to his countrymen, aiding a righteous cause—for I shall so call it, in spite of what may be said to the contrary—and, seizing favourable opportunities, notwithstanding difficulties that appear at first sight insurmountable, confer on his country the greatest and most inestimable benefits. That is the moral to be drawn from the history of Count Cavour. The tale with which his memory will be associated is one of the most extraordinary—I may say the most romantic—recorded in the annals of the world. We have seen under his influence and guidance a people who were supposed to have become torpid in the enjoyment of luxury, to have been enervated by the pursuits of pleasures and to have had no knowledge or feeling on politics, except what may have been derived from the traditions of their history and the jealousies of rival States—we have seen that people, under his guidance and at his call, rising from the slumber of ages with the power of “a giant refreshed,” breaking that spell by which they had so long been bound, and displaying on great occasions the courage of heroes, the sagacity of statesmen, the wisdom of philosophers, and obtaining for themselves that unity of political existence which for centuries had been denied them. Sir, I say these are great events in history, and that the man whose name will go down to posterity connected with such a series of events, whatever may have been the period of his death, however premature it may have been for the hopes of his countrymen, cannot be said to have died too soon for his glory and his fame.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES. VOLUNTEER CORPS.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £133,276, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Volunteer Corps in Great Britain, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862, inclusive.”

LORD ELCHO said, a notice had been on the paper in his name for a long time, having reference to this Vote, with a view to his calling the attention of the House to the wants of the Volunteer Corps. He regretted that he had not had an opportunity of calling attention to the subject sooner, as much misunderstanding had prevailed as to the views of those who wished it to be discussed in the House. If he had introduced this question at the first formation of the Volunteer corps, the main want to which he would have had to call the attention of the Committee, he would have been to the want of popularity experienced by the Volunteers—for there was no denying the fact that when the Volunteer movement first began it met with little sympathy from the public and little encouragement from official men. He recollected the Prime Minister talking, in his jocular way, about “the Rifle fever;” but a great change had come over the public mind. To be popular a man must now be a Volunteer; the Volunteer service was now always associated at public dinners with the toast of the Army and Navy, and he hoped the Volunteers would prove themselves worthy of the honour; and as for his noble Friend the Prime Minister he was himself a member of a Rifle corps, and they all knew that he could not go through the forms of an election without being attended by a Volunteer guard. It was not, therefore, to any want of popularity on the part of the Volunteers that he had to call the attention of the House, but to more material wants which, if not attended to, would lead to a diminution of the number of the force. He had endeavoured to ascertain the numbers of the Volunteer force, and he was able, on the authority of Inspector General McMurdo, to state the numbers with near accuracy. There were, of Cavalry and Mounted Rifles, 562; Artillery, 20,360; Engineers, 1,482; and Riflemen, 125,551; making a total of 147,955. That statement was made up from returns which had been in the office for two months previous, and since then the numbers had increased by about 2,000, so that altogether the force might be taken as numbering 150,000 men. That was a large force to have been raised by voluntary enlistment. But the Committee would readily see that something more than public spirit and patriotism were necessary to call into existence a force of this description. Such a force had not been raised without a very considerable outlay incurred by those who had either served in or assisted it. The expenses of a Volunteer corps were not confined to the mere uniform, accoutrements, and drill-sergeants. They had to provide themselves with drill and musketry instruction, drill-grounds, ranges, targets, armouries, armourers, head-quarters, and then came advertising, printing, postage, stationery, travelling expenses, and bands. The Committee might smile at this last item, but it was very dull work, and the men could with difficulty be got together, without bands, and although he admitted that they led to a considerable expenditure, bands were really a sine quâ non. Prizes and incidental expenses must also be taken into account; and he did not think he should exaggerate when he stated his conviction that these 150,000 men had spent, or had cost those who supported the movement, the sum of £10 per man—so that about £1,500,000 had been raised by voluntary taxation for the establishment of this force. A conviction existed on the part of those who had the means of forming a judgment, that unless some further assistance was given in addition to that which they now received from Government, a very large proportion of the force would gradually fall away; and he should endeavour to show that Government could give further assistance without in any way interfering with the Volunteer character of the force; at all events, without interfering more than at present. It was said out of doors that if the Government gave any further assistance they would destroy the independence of the force, and alter its Volunteer character. Now he, as a Volunteer, must express his utter inability to understand the meaning of the word “independence” as applied to a military force. If the independence of the Volunteers meant that this force of 150,000 men was not to be under proper control and authority—if it meant that any Volunteer officer, on his own responsibility, and without the consent of the authorities, might at any time collect together 10,000 or 20,000 men in any part of the country, of whom he was to be the self-appointed commander—the sooner such a force was done away with the better; because the day might come when such a force might be a source of danger instead of safety to the State. He was confident, however, that he expressed the opinion of nine-tenths of the Volunteers when he said that, while they wished to retain such an amount of independence as was their due, being Volunteers, and as was consistent with the War-Office Memorandum of June last, they felt also that the force ought to be under legitimate control and authority; they felt that they were constitutionally under the War Office, and under the War Office they wished to remain. A great deal had been said about the Horse Guards. The Horse Guards was a bugbear which frightened a great many people, but he did not believe it frightened the Volunteers. As to the illustrious Duke now at the head of this Department, he, from the commencement of the Volunteer movement, had done all in his power to foster it. He was colonel of a Volunteer Rifle regiment; he was president of the National Rifle Association; on all occasions he had given them good advice; and, moreover, he had done signal service to the Volunteers and to this country by setting the example of binding together in a sort of brotherhood of arms the Regulars and the Volunteers. He (Lord Elcho) hoped, therefore, they would hear no more of attempts on the part of the Horse Guards to interfere with the independence of the Volunteer force. It was observable that those who decried further Government assistance, and who declared that it would alter the character of the force, were generally persons who made eloquent speeches in favour of the Volunteers, but who did not further assist the movement either in purse or in person. If the Volunteer character of the force was destroyed by Government assistance that character was gone already. When about two years ago the Secretary of State for War brought into operation the old Act of Geo. III., under which the Volunteer force was constituted, the only inducement he held out was that if the Volunteers lost an arm or a leg, Chelsea Hospital was open to them, and that, if killed, their widows would receive a pension. On the other hand, they were to clothe, accoutre, arm themselves, and bear all expenses. It was soon found out, however, that Volunteers did not come forward so freely as was hoped for, and the pure Volunteer principle was, therefore, broken in upon. The Government first armed the Volunteers; and then, with a view to teach them the use of their arms, adjutants were provided, with inspectors and a staff, and the Government also provided ammunition. Though, however, there was here a departure from the pure Volunteer principle upon which the force was originally constituted, still assistance was given according to a strict principle, which was that Government gave such assistance as was necessary to secure the efficiency of the men. All they now asked for was that this principle should be extended, and that the Government should give only the further assistance which was necessary to their efficiency. The conviction that something more was necessary in order to maintain this force led to a meeting of commanding officers of the metropolitan corps, and the resolutions passed at that meeting embodied the views both of those were present and of those who did not attend, the latter having subsequently given their assent to them. These resolutions amounted to this:—That the Government, who now gave the Volunteers aid in the shape of adjutants, arms, inspectors, and ammunition, should extend the assistance to drill sergeants, practice ranges, and some allowance for enabling them to take proper care of their arms. For his own part, he confessed that he could see no difference in principle between giving an adjutant and giving a drill sergeant. Drill sergeants were difficult to obtain, each cost £40 or £50 a year, and in the country a company of fifty or sixty men could not incur the expense of providing themselves with drill sergeants. Then, subscriptions from honorary members could not be permanently relied on; they formed a most uncertain source of income; and, what was worse, the Volunteers were put to shifts to obtain money by means of bazaars and balls, to which, though such devices might not be discreditable, the House of Commons ought to save them the necessity of resorting. He had received a letter from Sir Arthur Elton, the late Member for Bath, in which the same views were set forth, and the writer expressed his opinion that the Volunteers ought not to be left to raise the wind in any such way. The assistance asked for being strictly in accordance with the principle on which Government aid had been hitherto given, it was only right and fair that the Government should render such further aid. The resolutions which he had referred to were, as he had said, adopted by the officers of metropolitan corps; but in order to ascertain the views of the officers in the country he, having been chairman of the meeting, took the liberty of circulating these resolutions throughout the country. To his letter there had been between 100 and 200 replies, and, with one exception, all were favourable to the proposals contained in the resolutions, the writers declaring almost invariably that without some assistance of this kind the Volunteer force could not be expected to continue at anything like its present number. The following were found to be the expenses of various corps taken indiscriminately:—The Brecknock Rifles of 347 men expended on drill, maintenance of rifle range, and similar expense, exclusive of orderly room and so forth, £244; the 15th Suffolk, an administrative battalion, 569 men, £516; the 2nd Essex, with 700 men, £830; the

—he thought he recognized the voice of, he hoped, an efficient member of that corps, and he would correct him if he were wrong—mustered between 400 and 500 men, and their expenditure on these items was £303; but they expended £1,346 for their share of a rifle range. The members of this corps had peculiar advantages; they lived in barracks at Lincoln's Inn, in the Temple, and Gray's Inn; they had drillgrounds close to their own doors, they hung up their rifles with their wigs and gowns, and whenever they had a spare hour they took their rifle off its peg—whether with or without the wig and gown he did not know, for he never saw them at drill—ran down and had an hour's drill on the green in their own courts. Therefore, if at a review they appeared to do better than other corps, it must be remembered that they were very advantageously situated, besides the peculiar intelligence which belonged to gentlemen of the long robe. The 1st Orkney, numbering 56 men, expended £47; the Robin Hood Rifles, of 600 men, spent £531. The result showed that the expenses to which the Volunteers were put on these heads amounted to between 10s. and 15s. per man. A sum of £1 per man had been mentioned at the meeting at the Thatched House, as the amount which should be contributed by the Government, but that was merely meant as an index to the Government of the maximum cost of these things. The additional 5s. was proposed to be expended on what were called travelling expenses. This might be a point open to dispute; but it must be borne in mind that we never could get administrative battalions into a proper state of efficiency unless they were brought together and exercised in battalion and brigade drill. That would, of course, be a source of expense; but it was a matter for the Government to consider whether these companies ought not to be brought together. They certainly never could be efficient without such meetings. There never had been any question of asking the Government for anything so foolish as that each individual Volunteer should have £1 to spend as he liked; though, of course, if the Government thought it most convenient to give the assistance in money, they would take security that it was properly spent. It was for the Government to decide whether they would give aid at all, and if they did give it they would decide whether they would give it in money or in kind. His own impression was that it would be better to give it in kind. It was drill sergeants in particular that were wanted; but in regard to the cost of ranges, the custody of arms, and such expenses, different corps were so differently situated that perhaps it would be simpler for the Government to say that such a sum per man would be a reasonable expenditure to allow. All those points were logically connected with the assistance already given to the Volunteer character of the force, and did not in any way affect the determination which had always been studiously kept in view to preserve the movement from anything like an eleemosynary character. The present Vote of £40,000, spread over a force of 148,000 men, amounted to about 5s. per man, and in addition there was about £4,000 a year for staff and inspectors at the Horse Guards; and if the additional assistance were granted which he asked for, the whole Vote would amount to about 20s. or 25s. per man. The question for the House to decide was whether the Volunteers were worth from 20s. to 25s. per man? There were some persons who thought that through the Volunteers they might bring about some reduction of the regular army; but that was not the feeling of the Volunteers. They wished that the regular army should be maintained at its full strength. The Volunteer force, after all, was only held together by a rope of sand—fourteen days' notice, and your regiment was gone, and the regular army, therefore, ought not to be diminished by a single man. In any remarks, therefore, which he made as to the comparative cost of the Volunteer and regular forces, he had no wish to argue for the diminution of the regular forces. Including in the calculation the four Votes of the Estimates, pay and allowances, clothing, provisions, and barracks, and the expenses of the Horse Guards and the War Office, the annual cost of a regular soldier was £55, and including other items it would come up to about £83 per man. The Volunteer, of course, could never be as efficient as the regular soldier, but he certainly could not be said to be dear at 25s. per head. It would ill-become him as a Volunteer to speak of the efficiency of the force; but he thought everybody must have been surprised by what he saw at the reviews in Hyde Park, at Edinburgh, and at Knowsley. Wherever they had appeared, in fact, they had conducted themselves in a most satisfactory manner. It was said that the opinion of the Continent was the opinion of history. Last year the military attaché of the French Embassy was present at an inspection of the City of London Rifle Brigade at the Horse Guards. That gentleman, looking at the inspection, said to a friend of his, "I came here expecting to see a National Guard, and I see soldiers." In a few words he would refer to the corps to which his hon. and learned Friend opposite belonged—the Inns of Court. Colonel M'Murdo assured him, after he had inspected them in Richmond Park, that it was the best regiment he had ever seen." "Perhaps," he added, "the 60th Rifles, when they went first to Scinde, under Lord Melville, were as active and efficient in skirmishing as the Inns of Court." It showed what intelligence could do, and it was a great comfort to know that if the Inns of Court were ever called into the field they were likely to be as formidable to their enemies as they were to their clients. Being a Volunteer, he would not dwell further on the efficiency of the force, but he would take this opportunity of saying a word in reference to the social and political bearings of the Volunteer movement. He did not believe that it was possible to exaggerate the social good which the movement had done. They lived in a country where the different classes of society had but few opportunities of mixing together and understanding and appreciating one another. They met at cricket, at the Derby, on the Serpentine in a hard winter, and in Scotland at curling on the ice. But in this country the opportunities of meeting were few, and it was a great social want—a want rendered greater on this account, that unfortunately they had in this country men who, by the studied perversion of history and fact, endeavoured to set class against class. He said the antidote to this was to be found in the Volunteer movement which brought men together and bound them together in a patriotic and holy brotherhood of arms. Of the physical good he would not speak, because healthful exercise and improved habits spoke for themselves. But he would say a word on the political bearings of the question. Let them look at the position in which England stood a few years ago, before the Volunteer movement was started. Their fleet was little, if at all, superior in numbers and appointments to that of France. He heard a gallant officer say that in case of invasion they could not put more than 13,000 infantry in line. They had an untrained population, and the result of a consciousness of weakness was to produce periodical panics. He would not attempt to say whether those panics were or were not justified by the aspect of things on the continent of Europe, but he would say that they were justified by a state of weakness which, to say the least, invited aggression. That was not the state for a great country like England to be in—England which, at the commencement of the century had defied invasion and had stemmed and rolled back the tide of French flood of conquest that had desolated and swept over the rest of Europe. The Russian war did not add to our military prestige, notwithstanding the sufferings and heroism of our gallant soldiers, because it was believed that we were defective in military organization. The feeling engendered by such a state of things, rendering the country liable to periodical panics, was intolerable to every man whose love of country rested on higher considerations than their own unrivalled power of producing cotton prints at the lowest figure, and the Volunteer movement was hailed as a deliverance from this state of things. Many persons now claimed to be the authors of the Volunteer movement, and their various pretensions had given rise to some controversy. He had heard a gentleman, in returning thanks for the press, say that he knew personally twenty-seven gentlemen who claimed to be the originators and authors of the movement. But he would name one person who, in his opinion, was the main cause of the improved position in which they now found themselves. His belief was that it was the Nestor of Parliament, the trumpet-tongue of Lyndhurst, that first roused the spirit of the country to a due sense of its position. He should never forget the words spoken by Lord Lyndhurst in "another place"—

"I will not trust the liberties of this country, its honour and its interests, to any declaration or any promise of any friendly Power or any Power whatever. I will rely on my own power, on my own resources, on my own vigour, and on the strength of my own right arm."

Those words ought to be written over the doors of Parliament, as they were engraved on the heart of every Volunteer. But this was, in fact, not a new movement. The spirit of the Volunteers of 1803 survived.

and only wanted to be kindled into a flame. The man who gave the necessary stimulus was Lord Lyndhurst. Before the revival England was in danger of losing her moral weight in the councils of Europe, through a disbelief in her physical power. What was her position now? The fleet was reconstructed; the army was perfected and organized; there was an efficient Yeomanry force, and a fine Militia. But, as a French writer recently expressed it, "Behind all this we have the British nation in arms." The position of England was much more honourable and creditable than it was, and if they wished to know what had been the effect of the change, he would say ask public opinion on the Continent, would that he could say, "Ask Cavour." But let them ask the Emperor Napoleon—let them ask the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, whether the state of this country now did not enable them to speak and write as the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary of England ought to speak and write, and whether they had not now that weight in the councils of Europe which a country such as this ought to have. They had had an incidental discussion to-night on the state of Italy. His conviction was that England, by her moral influence, backed by her physical strength and under the able guidance of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary—and, though he saw sneers on the faces of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, he would repeat, under the able guidance of his noble Friend—the moral weight of England had done more to consolidate the liberties of Italy than the active intervention of France. If, then, they wished to consolidate those liberties; if they wished to retain the French Alliance, they must render England inviolate against attack. It must not be supposed, because he thus spoke of the Volunteer movement, which he believed to be the main cause of the improvement in the position of England, that it was encouraging an aggressive spirit on the part of the people. He believed the contrary to be the fact. He believed that with nations, as with individuals, when not conscious of strength or of the justice of their cause, they were touchy and quarrelsome, and that when strong they could afford to treat with contempt or pass unheeded that which otherwise they would feel bound to notice. In proof of this he might state that some months ago a distinguished diplomatist said to him, "The cause of peace is now greatly strengthened because we diplomatists feel ourselves strong enough, when necessary, to make concessions." He had endeavoured to state the views of the Volunteer force temperately, and he hoped without exaggeration. What reply he should receive from Her Majesty's Government he was unable to divine. He trusted that it would be favourable. He trusted that they would not make those who were working and slaving in the cause bear the whole burden, because they could not rely on the subscriptions of honorary members to the same extent being continued. He hoped the Government would be prepared, without departing from the line which they had chalked out for themselves, and from which they need not depart, to accede to their request. He hoped the Government would be prepared to support and maintain the great force which had thus been raised, and which it had been well said was laid at the feet of the Sovereign as the noblest present ever made to any ruler. He was confident that if by withholding timely assistance and pursuing a shortsighted economy they allowed the Volunteer force to be starved out of existence, a heavy responsibility would rest on the Government and on the House of Commons.

VISCOUNT VALLETORT thanked the noble Lord for bringing the subject before the House, and expressed his concurrence in all he had said; for he fully agreed that the time had come when the Volunteer force had a right to demand some further assistance from the central Government. There was, however, no reason to complain of what the Government had already done for them, because the Government had pursued a wise and prudent course in leaving the Volunteer movement at its commencement to be supported by private zeal and liberality. With regard to the origin of the movement which had led to the great results which no one anticipated, he believed the question would never be satisfactorily settled. It was not the movement of any individual, but of the whole people, who had shown a growing desire that the nation should be secure and not exposed to periodical panics. If, indeed, there was any one who by his zeal, assiduity, and hard work in the cause, coupled with unobtrusiveness, had entitled himself to the gratitude of the public, it was the noble Lord who had brought the subject forward. Thanks to the indefatigable exertions of the noble Lord, and of others who had taken a lead in the matter, and to the liberality of the public who desired to escape from constantly re-curing panics, the force was now established on, he hoped and believed, a permanent basis. He believed that upwards of £1,500,000 had been spent in establishing the movement, and that mainly by the Volunteers themselves. With regard to further aid from the Government, he reminded the House that it was one thing to get subscriptions for the support of a corps when a general interest was first excited in the movement, and quite another thing to secure a steady annual amount of subscriptions in the future. He confessed he was not one of those who thought that the War Office had exercised any undue control over the Volunteers, and, therefore, he did not join in the complaint against that Department. The movement had produced a great change in the sports and pastimes of the people. A few years ago scarcely any one who did not visit the deer forests of Scotland could use a rifle, but men were now to be found in almost every village who could handle it expertly. The growing popularity of rifle-shooting as a sport would tend greatly to give permanence to the Volunteer force. The bulk of the expense of the different corps of Volunteers had been borne by themselves, and it was only fair, when they paid for their own personal expenses, that they should not be mulcted on every occasion for travelling and other necessary purposes. All they asked was that the permanent expenses necessary for the efficiency of a corps should be paid by the Government, and in such a way that the Government should be no loser. Those expenses came under the heads of instruction, both in musketry and drill, care of arms, and means for rifle practice. But what the Volunteers required more than money was that they should continue to enjoy the cordial goodwill of their fellow-countrymen, which would be jeopardized if the country supposed that any money was granted to them for which they would not give a fair and full equivalent. He, therefore, trusted that whatever the Government did in this matter they would do it cautiously for the sake of the Volunteers themselves, as well as the public.

SIR HARRY VERNEY was very much in favour of the proposal of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), which he believed Members generally would consider involved no excessive amount of assistance. The strength of this country had been immeasurably increased in the opinion of people on the Continent since the establishment of the Volunteer force, and he for one expected from it great things. He would trust the safety of the country far more to the Volunteer force than to any fortifications for which they were called upon to vote so much money. But they could not expect that force to be kept up in its present state of efficiency unless the Government gave them some further assistance and bore the expense of one non-commissioned officer to every two companies. He looked upon the movement as one of the best which had ever originated in the country, and he thought they were much indebted to the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) for the energy, temper, and tact which he had shown in promoting it up to the present time.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, the corps composed almost entirely of working men—one of which he had the honour to command, and the organization of which often involved considerable expenditure on the part of the officers commanding companies—had, in his opinion, a certain claim upon the State for such assistance as was necessary to render them efficient. The want of efficient instructors was much felt. In country places great difficulty was often experienced in obtaining drill sergeants, particularly such as were acquainted with the new drill, and much inconvenience arose in consequence in battalion drill. He thought this was a form in which assistance might very properly be given by the Government. War-office interference was a bugbear of which he was not afraid; indeed, his impression was, that if the War-office had committed a fault, it was in not interfering enough.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, the question was what was the best way of rendering the Volunteer movement a permanent institution; and he thought that this was not to be attained so much by any grant of money per head, as by contributions in kind—by providing those necessary details which were now defrayed at the expense of the corps: such as practice grounds and instruction. If Government made an annual grant of money to the Volunteers, the public might possibly demand additional surveillance, and require that additional powers should be granted, either to the Horse Guards or to the War-office, in order that they might see that the money was properly expended, but there was a mode in which the Government might give most valuable aid in kind—that was by granting, in proportion to the number of effectives who were present at the annual official inspection, a certain number of drill sergeants to each corps. These sergeants should be, not retired soldiers, but supernumeraries, borne on the effective strength of their regiments, as that would furnish a security for their good behaviour, and would create a new link between the Volunteers and the regular army. Many a corps that was competent to go through its company and battalion drill had never fired a shot at a target; and working men, who had subscribed for their uniforms and other incidental but necessary expenses, found it impossible to defray the cost of a rifle range. In this respect, especially in the neighbourhood of large towns, where difficulties existed in the way of procuring sufficient space for the purpose, the Government might render material assistance.

MAJOR BARTTELOT suggested that in many corps the officers would find it a very complicated duty to have funds entrusted to their hands for which they would be compelled to render an account to the War-office. If non-commissioned officers of the disembodied militia regiments could be allowed to serve as drill sergeants to the Volunteer force, he thought it would add much to the efficiency of a body which had become a permanent necessity in the country.

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, that at one of the largest and most influential meetings of Volunteers which had ever been held, it was determined to call the attention of the authorities to the fact that, while in England Volunteers had the advantage of access to the musketry establishment at Hythe, in Scotland they were debarred from that advantage on account of the distance. Lord Herbert, under whose attention this subject had several times been brought, had undertaken to give it his most serious consideration; and as he had some little hope that the boon which he sought might ultimately be granted, he ventured to urge it again on the attention of Her Majesty's Government. He hoped the request made by the noble Lord, the Member for Haddington, would be acceded to by the House, as it certainly would be endorsed by the country; and, on the part of the Volunteers, he begged to tender to the noble Lord his thanks for the able and satisfactory manner in which he had made known their wants.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he took a very different view of this question from any which had yet been put forward. He divided the subject into two parts. In the Estimates he found a sum of £42,000 to be applied to the requirements of 150,000 Rifle Volunteers, and another of £90,000 for 14,000 Yeomanry Volunteers. He had listened with very great attention to the speech of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) and concurred in every word of it. It was impossible to overrate the importance of the Volunteer movement, which had achieved safety for the country, had prevented the recurrence of monetary panics, and had given us a position among nations which previously we did not hold. How had these results been attained? By downright hard work; by continual attention to drill; by attendance, night after night, for weeks and months, on the part of men who attended to their shops all day, and gave up their time for recreation in order that they might learn the business of soldiers. Military officers in that House would confirm his statement that these results could only be secured by continued application, and that to think that men, by dint of wearing fine uniforms and congregating for a short time, were to become Heaven-inspired soldiers, was a perfect farce. If, instead of £42,000, a demand had been made for £100,000 on behalf of Rifle Volunteers who worked thus arduously, he would willingly have given it. That was one picture: now he turned to the other, upon which he would not willingly cast his eyes, did not duty compel him to do so. This sum of £90,000 was to be disposed of for the amusement of some eighteen colonels who were noblemen, including three Dukes, and thirteen colonels who were squires, including four Baronets. One of the most respected of those colonels sat opposite—the great Field Marshal of the Yeomanry of the West. For that hon. Baronet (Sir William Miles) he had the most sincere respect, and he had not the slightest intention of saying anything personally offensive to him or the gallant men whom he commanded. But if he found that they had gone backwards instead of forwards, that they did not attend to their drill, his duty bound him to tell the truth. To suppose that by riding forth once a-year with a band of music at their head, or that thirty-two hours' drill would make them fit to stand shoulder to shoulder with the regular cavalry, would be an egregious mistake. If it were supposed the Yeomanry could do the duty of regular troops it was a gross error. If it were thought they might be useful as a constabulary force it was a gross delusion. The Yeomanry could not be depended on to quell a local disturbance of a serious character, for it would take twelve hours to collect them in any county. The Volunteer Riflemen would be a much better force to stand by the constabulary in case of need, and, being on the spot, could be summoned in an hour. He had seen a mob of 10,000 run away from the shaking of the tails of a troop of Life Guards' horses. Could hon. Gentlemen show him that the Yeomanry were a successful body in that way? Wherever they had met with anything like opposition they had invariably behaved ill. Why, a whole regiment of them had laid down their arms to an unarmed mob, and a body of Yeomanry had run away, major and all, from a mob armed with stones and a couple of fowling pieces for which they had no ball cartridge. If such was the conduct of the Yeomanry in the face of an unarmed mob, were they of any use in repelling an invasion? In 1798, when 900 Frenchmen found their way from Rochelle to Killybegs Bay in Ireland a little too late, for the battle of Vinegar Hill had put down the Irish rebellion, a regiment of Yeomanry, to their great horror, found themselves face to face with some of those Frenchmen. How did they act? They turned their horses' heads to where their tails ought to be, and got them into a frantic gallop, which ended in some of themselves being thrown into a ravine and destroyed. No one doubted the courage of Irishmen. It was the want of discipline that led to such conduct; for, when the Limerick Militia came suddenly on the vanguard of these same Frenchmen, the colonel took off his hat and exclaimed, "Here they are, my boys!" and the militiamen went at them with the bayonet and gave them such a handling that they never made head afterwards. At Ballina the Yeomanry were tried again; but they turned their rear front to the French and ran away incontinently. He hoped that so many fine men and horses as the Yeomanry now had would not be thrown away, but that they would consent to dissolve themselves into that more efficient force the Volunteers. The Volunteers had shown that with a little more study they would be prepared to take their places by the side of the Line. The illustrious Duke at the head of the army, whose courage had been tried, and whose professional knowledge no one could doubt, had spoken in high terms of what the Volunteers promised to become, and in eloquent terms enforced on them the necessity of discipline. Let the country refuse to pay for what was worthless. If the Yeomanry did not make themselves good soldiers, they had no right to ask the House to put its hands into the pockets of the people to pay them. Their own officers corroborated what he had said as the non-efficiency of the drill in the evidence given before a Commission which sat at the War Office, evidence from which the hon. Member quoted to prove the impossibility of getting the Yeomanry to attend squad drills. The horses which many of them rode were battered old hacks, hired for the purpose, or borrowed from their friends. He knew cases where omnibuses had been stopped in order that Yeomanry might go forth to glory on their horses. He had heard of a trumpeter who used to drill on a fine black horse which was the pride of the troop. Being one day late the captain of the troop was angry and remonstrated with him; when, with great simplicity, he replied, "Why, sir, I was waiting till the hearse came home." It had been stated in evidence by the Earl of Dudley that this Yeomanry force could be only induced to attend drill by being invited to dinner, and they required a vast deal of that sort of persuasion to do any drill work at all, his Lordship was Colonel of the Worcestershire Yeomanry and gave his testimony of that corps in particular. This was the old way of recruiting doctors' mates for the navy—put down a burgoon tub on the pier at Aberdeen and they came of themselves. So the Yeomanry would not come unless they were fed like animals. Why should the Yeomanry be in a better position than the Volunteer force? It was better for the Yeomanry to dismount from their horses, shoulder their rifles, and let the cavalry business be done by those who really understood it. When he found that such men as the Duke of Newcastle, the Duke of Beaufort, the Duke of Buckingham, and eighteen other noblemen, colonels in the Yeomanry, went knocking at the War Office door for £10 a-piece, which he supposed they wanted to pay their expenses with. He thought it was a bad thing to go forth to the country that these wealthy noblemen possessed so little patriotic spirit as to receive these sums, while the Volunteers laid so heavy a tax on themselves. He should propose that the Vote for the Yeomanry force be reduced by £30,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

ed to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Volunteer Corps in Great Britain, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862, inclusive."

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he hoped the Government would take into their consideration the proposal of his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). The noble Earl asked for little enough; and he felt certain that when the novelty of the Volunteer movement was worn away, that Volunteer Rifle force, which was at present so efficient and so constantly increasing, would dwindle down both in numbers and in discipline unless some support was given to them either in kind or in money. The Volunteers did not seem to have determined in what form they ought to accept assistance from the State, but he would recommend them to try to keep at their own disposal any money that might be granted to them, for they might depend upon it that they would find their drill-serjeants would be much more efficient if they had themselves the power of paying and of dismissing those men. He should be glad to see our 150,000 Rifle Volunteers increase to 200,000; and he saw no reason why the Government should not make them an allowance at the rate of £1 for each man. He believed that a sum of £200,000 in our public Estimates would be a small sum to pay for the services of so many hearts and hands prepared to defend the country in any emergency. It was for the Government to choose between the Rifle Volunteers and the Yeomanry, and if they thought they could get an efficient corps of Mounted Rifle Volunteers as of Yeomanry, he would say at once accept the services of the former. The hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) had spoken in depreciation and ridicule of the Yeomanry. The regiment that he (Sir William Miles) had the honour of commanding had twice saved the town of Frome—once from burning. He was sorry to say that there was a considerable effusion of blood, but still the Yeomanry preserved the town. That, at least, was one occasion on which the Yeomanry had acted well, and he was certain that other corps would act well, also, if occasion arose. The hon. Gentleman must know very well that the force was more efficient than he chose to admit. They had permanent serjeants in his corps, almost all of whom were old soldiers or pensioners; they resided in the neighbourhood of the troops; and the result was that the troops could have squad drill several times between the fixed periods of permanent duty, so that they were sufficiently drilled when they came together to do their regimental duty. If his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol had any doubt upon the matter why did he not ask the inspecting officer his opinion? Surely the Government would be informed by that officer of their shortcomings, and they would be mentioned in the report. The question was whether the Yeomanry force was an efficient one for the purpose for which it was intended? They were not intended to act with the regular army, but he should like to know where the hon. Member would find a better qualified body of men to perform such duties as that of escorts, outposts, and other duties auxiliary to an army in case of an invasion than the Yeomanry, who knew every bye-lane and hedge in the country. That was the duty for which they were designed, and having commanded a Yeomanry force for many years he could vouch for their efficiency. He should very much like to see the Rifle Volunteers, the Pensioners, and the Yeomanry force brigaded together occasionally, as in case of invasion they would be the forces called upon to act together. The Militia was the proper force to act in concert with the regulars, but the Rifles, the Yeomanry, and the Pensioners should be subsidiary. He recollected waiting some years ago upon the noble Lord now at the head of the Government, when he was Home Secretary, on this subject; when the noble Lord admitted that it would be an admirable thing for the force if the permanent duty were prolonged; and he quite agreed with the noble Lord in this. All the common movements were learnt in squad and troop drill, which were entirely voluntary—not a single farthing was allowed for them. But when they were called out for duty, when they were absent seven or eight days, and were thirty or forty miles away from their homes, he put it to the Committee whether 7s. a day was a higher rate of pay for horse and man than they were entitled to. As to the officers' pay, did anybody for a moment think that noblemen like the Duke of Beaufort would care for the paltry £10 or £12? Did the officers decline when the question was put to them whether they would accept the 7s. a day as well as the men? The contrary was the case. Was it likely the colonels cared for the £10 or £12, when they often laid out in regimental expenses as much as £20, £60, and even £150? He thought, therefore, that the hon. Member for Bristol had thrown out a taunt against the colonels of the Yeomanry regiments which they little deserved. Either the Yeomanry force ought to be a paid force, and should be properly paid as such, or it ought to be a purely Volunteer force. They ought to come to some distinct understanding on the matter. The recommendation of the Yeomanry Committee at the War Office was that the allowance for clothing and the contingent allowance should be reduced by 30s. He wished to know whether at the same time the Government were going to pay for the clothing? or whether, as now, the colonels were to pay and receive the amount from the Government? It would be easily understood that in a Yeomanry regiment, where the clothing and accoutrements were for a considerable period in the entire charge of the men, and could only be looked after by the staff when the force was out, the repairs would be considerably greater than in a regular regiment; and, as was stated by the officers examined, it was only by putting their clothing and contingent allowances together that they hitherto had been able not only to maintain their clothing in good repair, but to leave a handsome sum in hand when it was necessary to clothe anew. During the sixteen years he had commanded his regiment he had paid to the tailors, accoutrement makers, and saddlers, £8,078, and for repairs, £3,174, making in all £11,252. In the same time he had received for the Government allowance for clothing, £9,990. Therefore, in order to keep the regiment in good order, he had submitted to a loss of £1,260, or about £76 a year. The sum was not much, and it might be said that he had the honour of commanding the regiment. It was not for himself that he spoke, but for those good men and true who were inspired with military ardour and a love for the service, but who had not sufficient money to stand the expense. He should understand if Yeomanry were mounted Volunteers, but they were a corps existing from 1809, and they had always been paid the sum the Government now paid. The question arose, could they not take something less. He had been considering what they could take off without affecting the service. A question was put to the effect what would he say to reducing the contingency to £1. He doubted the ability of the colonels to do it; but on full consideration he found he could pay all the men, and even the sergeants, to be raised from £30 to £36 10s., and he would merely leave to the Government the payment of £36 10s. for the adjutant. That would make a considerable alteration in the estimate, because he found that if 10s. was taken away from the Vote on each man there would be a saving of £7,250 on the whole Vote; to which must be added £3,500, making £10,500. But they must take from that the additional adjutant's pay. They would, therefore, deduct £912, which would leave merely £10,000 saving. It was his desire to meet the wishes of the Government; but if the pay of the Yeomanry for contingent and clothing was reduced 30s. he knew it could not be done for this money, and it would be better to disband the force at once and trust to the Rifle Volunteers.

MR. BUXTON acknowledged that the Volunteers had expended an enormous amount of pains and patience as well as money, and that the movement had added greatly to the reputation of the country. There was no military man who would not allow that, in case of invasion, ten Volunteers would be equal to at least one trained soldier. He was a Volunteer himself, and, therefore, made a modest estimate of their efficiency. In that case 150,000 Volunteers would be equivalent to 15,000 regular troops, and the cost of that number of regular troops would be upwards of £1,000,000. In that point of view the Volunteers had some claim on the liberality of the Government. He did not, however, complain of any want of liberality on the part of the Government, because he thought the Government had always acted towards the Volunteers with great tact and judgment. But if the Government did make up their minds to give additional aid, he hoped it would be in kind and not in money. He was persuaded that if they received money they would lose their prestige in Europe. The thanks of the country were due to the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), who by his speech to-night had crowned his energetic services to the Volunteers.

MAJOR EDWARDS said, that he was extremely gratified by the eloquent speech of Lord Elcho who had brought forward this subject, and he was sure that every hon. Member would be equally gratified with himself, and would acknowledge that they were under deep obligations to the noble Lord for the interest he took both in the Yeomanry corps and the Volunteer corps, and he (Major Edwards) hoped that the latter would increase until it was equal to the old Volunteer corps which was raised at the time of the threatened invasion by the French, in 1803, when their numbers amounted to 400,000 men. The present force did immense credit to the noble Lord, and other noble Lords (Lord Ranelagh for instance) and hon. Gentlemen who took as deep an interest in it as himself, and he was sure that the country was proud of the magnificent body of men which was now attached as a contingent to our regular army. Having said thus much of the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), he wished he could say as much of that of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), who seemed to labour under one or two remarkable delusions. The hon. Member for Bristol made two great speeches in the Session usually, one in favour of the Ballot, the other against the Yeomanry Cavalry, and on both of those subjects he seemed to entertain the grossest delusions. There were one or two remarks which the hon. Member for Bristol had made which were capable of easy refutation. Three or four years ago the hon. Member, in a more humorous speech than he had made that night, took the liberty of calling the Yeomanry Cavalry—or rather of comparing them with—"hogs in armour"—but that joke fell as flatly on the House as the jokes which the hon. Member had perpetrated that evening as to the efficiency of the Yeomanry Cavalry. Now, he (Major Edwards) could place in opposition to that hon. Gentleman's opinion that of a distinguished and gallant officer, late a Member of the House—namely, Major General Sir James Chatterton. He remembered that gallant officer stating that he had inspected more than sixty regiments of Yeomanry, and he could not wish to see, under the circumstances, a more efficient body of men as a contingent to the army. He thought such an authority as that of General Chatterton would perhaps have a little more weight than the authority of any civilian, and even than that of the hon. Member for Bristol. With regard to the number of days during which the Yeomanry cavalry were permitted to assemble, he thought that the hon. Member had got into a little confusion even on that question. It was quite true that they were miserably paid, thanks to the parsimony of the hon. Member and those who entertained similar opinions; but he could tell the hon. Member that the regiment to which he had the honour to belong

not only assembled eight days in the year, but had troop and squad drill perhaps as many as fifty, or at all events forty times during the year. It was to be remembered that the Yeomanry Cavalry were not paid for those days upon which they assembled for drill, but that that was an entirely voluntary act upon their part, in order to make themselves as efficient as possible. In point of fact they cared very little comparatively about their pay for permanent duty. He thought no one could deny that they well deserved their pay; and he was sorry to see Members of that House doing everything they possibly could to rob them of it. In reality it was by no means an efficient pay, but a mere acknowledgment of the services they rendered to their country. He would remind the House that the Yeomanry Cavalry were in a position altogether different from that of the rifle corps. They had to provide their horses; they were under the immediate control of the War Office; and they were bound; at any time they were called upon, to render any services demanded of them by the Commander-in-Chief. How efficiently they had performed that duty in agricultural districts, or in country towns, the hon. Member below him (Sir William Miles) had explained by citing an instance which he thought the House would agree with him ought to be sufficient to convince any hon. Member. However, if that were not sufficient, he (Major Edwards) could cite another case of more importance. Did not, he asked, the Yeomanry Cavalry save Manchester, and had they not the thanks of the country for the service they rendered? He hoped that the remarks and the ridicule which the hon. Member for Bristol had lavished on this force would fall as flatly upon the country as it had fallen upon the House. He had read most diligently the report of the Committee which had been sitting at the order of the Secretary of State for War, for the purpose, as he believed, of cutting down the expenses of the Yeomanry Cavalry which was the oldest constitutional force of the country, and had been established throughout England during the last two centuries. It was at the command of the Secretary for War that the Committee had sat; but he had failed to find out in the evidence adduced before it any reason why the allowance for clothing or contingencies ought to be cut down in the slightest degree. On the contrary, any one who carefully looked over the evidence would, he thought, be of opinion that the present rates could not afford to be diminished with due regard to the maintenance of the efficiency of Yeomanry Cavalry. In regard to the officers' pay and the recommendation for its reduction, what, he asked, did it amount to? When they were dealing with money questions in that House they thought very little of £1,000 or even £100,000; and what was the sum which they expected to gain by this proposed reduction? They would simply save £3,500 by placing the officers of the Yeomanry Cavalry on a par with the privates. Were they to understand by this proposition that it was considered that the officers were at no greater expense than the privates? He could tell them that there was hardly a Yeomanry officer in Her Majesty's service who ever saw a shilling of his pay; and not only was he mulcted of all his pay, but every officer commanding a regiment, was called upon annually to make up an enormous deficiency for unavoidable expenses, and, in fact, every Yeomanry Cavalry officer of whatever grade he might be, going on permanent duty, was put to a very serious expense. Those gallant officers, however, did not grumble. They considered it necessary that they should perform their duty, and they performed it to the best of their ability. Something had been said as to placing the Yeomanry Cavalry on a par with Rifle Volunteers, but the House would remember that they were placed in very different circumstances. They had their horses to provide for, whereas the Rifleman had none; nor was he liable to be called out for duty at any moment as the Yeomanry Cavalry were; and that great difference would always exist, and continue to be a difficulty with which they would have to deal. They had heard a good deal about the practicability of raising Volunteer Cavalry rifle regiments. Why, that had been tried and had utterly failed. In his opinion if any such system were attempted to be adopted, instead of having a magnificent force numbering 14,000 mounted men, as they had at present in the Yeomanry Cavalry, they would fail, he might add they had already failed, to raise a force of 500 men as Yeomanry Volunteers. He thought it was absurd—the experiment having been tried and having failed—to have it brought forward as a suggestion in that House. For his part he trusted that it would never be tried again. Whether they looked at the prospect of affairs in the manufacturing districts and considered the probability of large masses of operatives being thrown out of employment, or whether they had regard to the threatening aspect of affairs on the Continent, he thought in either case the House would agree with him that this was of all others the most unfit time to endeavour to retrench so old, so constitutional, and so respectable a force as that of the Yeomanry Cavalry.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, he rose to bear testimony, as a military officer, to the extreme efficiency of the Volunteers, and would urge upon the Government to give the Volunteer force that assistance which they had a right to expect. But he thought that assistance should only be given in kind. There were four things which he thought necessary for placing the Volunteer force of the country in a state of efficiency—first, the supplying them with good and efficient arms; secondly, the furnishing them with a good and plentiful supply of ammunition for practising; thirdly, the supplying them with good practice ranges; and fourthly, the placing at their disposal good drill instructors, who should be supplied from the regular regiments of the Line. With regard to the Yeomanry, he assured the hon. and gallant Member who had last spoken (Major Edwards) that the object of the Committee appointed by the War Office was to inquire how the position of the Yeomanry Cavalry might be improved. His own belief was that they constituted a very efficient force considering the small amount of money spent on them. The Committee recommended that the annual allowance for clothing should be £1 8s. per man and 2s. per man for contingencies, making a total of £1 10s. per man per annum, as they had gone carefully through the cost of the various articles, and as they had recommended that the Staff of sergeants and one trumpeter should be paid directly by the Government and taken off the contingent fund out of which it was at present paid. The Committee also recommended that the adjutant's pay should be increased.

MR. DEEDES said, the Committee that sat upon the Yeomanry had to consider the smallest amount of expense at which that force could be kept in a state of efficiency. They recommended a reduction under the head of contingencies, in consideration that the Government would allow and pay a drill sergeant for each troop. The hon. Gentleman who had brought forward this proposition (Mr. H. Berkeley) complained of the inefficiency of the Yeomanry when they went out for duty; but the hon. Member now proposed to take away the chief means they had for increasing their efficiency. He should like to have the hon. Gentleman down at Dover with him for drill for eight days, and he had no doubt he should be able to work a great change in the hon. Gentleman. The reason why the Yeomanry were paid when upon permanent duty was, that they were then taken away from their homes, and incurred considerable expense on account both of themselves and their horses. The sum allowed was only 7s. per man; but he could state that it cost the members of his own regiment, when assembled for training, 12s., 13s. 6d., or 14s. per man per day. For the voluntary drills, which also impose some expense upon the members of Yeomanry corps, no allowance was made. He was sorry that this question had been mixed up with the discussion of that which had been so well introduced by his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) in all of whose recommendations he concurred. He could not agree with his hon. Friend (Sir William Miles) that the Government had to choose between the Yeomanry and the Volunteers. The duties of the two forces were perfectly distinct, and need not at all clash with each other. He acknowledged the advantage which Volunteer corps had derived from the appointment of adjutants to administrative battalions by the Government; but he thought that the attaching a sergeant to each company, or to two companies, as might be convenient, would be of infinitely greater service. He thought assistance should be given not in money but in kind. He trusted the Yeomanry force would have the confidence of the country, that it would be found increasing, and he for one should be prepared to vote an increased sum, if necessary, to keep it in a state of efficiency.

MR. TURNER said, there was an observation made by the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley (Major Edwards) which he could not allow to pass without some remark. The hon. and gallant Gentleman stated as one of the distinguishing services of the Yeomanry that, in 1819, Manchester was saved by the Yeomanry of Cheshire. It was very true that the Yeomanry of Cheshire attacked a peaceful assembly of persons who had met together to declare their want of bread and of representation. The people complained of want of representation, and that want had been supplied, in part at least, by the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London; and they were crying for bread, and that want was supplied by the policy of the late Sir Robert Peel, and the repeal of the corn laws but the charge of the Cheshire Yeomanry had created a feeling of ill-will which was not yet allayed. The people of Manchester did not look on Rifle corps with ill-will, though there were now regiments both of Foot and Mounted Rifles. They regarded them with feelings of cordiality and good-will, knowing that they had no disposition to suppress the feelings of their countrymen, even though these might be clamorously expressed, but were united with the sole purpose of defending the country against a foreign foe.

MR. CAYLEY admitted that the reference of the hon. Member for Beverley (Major Edwards) had been a little unfortunate, but wished to say that the discontent referred to by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Turner) was caused, not by the price of food, which at the time did not exceed 42s. a-quarter, but was consequent on the want of employment occasioned by the Bill of 1819. The hon. Member had made an invidious reference to the cost of the Yeomanry, and to their not paying their own expenses. He should have remembered, however, that the Manchester Mounted Rifles were on the spot, and consequently required no payment; but the Yeomanry had in some cases to be moved thirty or forty miles to their duty. Moreover, as there were but 500 Mounted Rifles in the whole of England, it would be poor policy on that ground to deprive the country of the services of 14,000 or 15,000 Yeomanry. The sneer of the hon. Member for Manchester and the jokes of the hon. Member for Bristol would be estimated, no doubt, at their proper value by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who, he trusted, would give due weight to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Haddington, so admirable and comprehensive in all its parts. He did not think undue assistance was asked on behalf of a force which had enabled the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary—to whose policy he gave his entire approbation—to maintain language more emphatic than British Ministers could previously have held. The Committee should bear in mind that Volunteering, which was a relaxation in towns, was, in fact, an addition to the labour of persons in the country; and it required all the influence of country gentlemen to insure its being introduced with anything like success.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that he, like so many other hon. Members, felt great satisfaction at the able speech of the Member for Haddingtonshire, and fully concurred in the opinion he had stated, that without some further assistance the Volunteer force could not be maintained in its present state of efficiency. In the country districts in particular, where there was great difficulty in forming full companies, he thought there must be a great defection from the ranks unless they were supplied with the means of learning their duties with less expense. He thought that some erroneous views were held with regard to the sum of money which was claimed for providing for the proper custody of their arms. It was not intended that the money was to be paid to each Volunteer; and, even if it was, did any one suppose that Volunteers would be less independent because the Government provided them with armouries, practice ranges, and more efficient means of studying drill? The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had seemed to lay the chief stress upon the formation of Volunteer corps in towns. On this point he (Sir Joseph Paxton) was at issue with him, believing that if the entire force was to be efficient, and was to possess a national character, it must be largely made up from the rural districts. He had made some calculation as to the sacrifices which those who joined the corps were required to make, and he had brought out the following results. The Government required that a man should undergo every year twenty-four days drill before he could be considered efficient; and starting on that date a man with an income of £150 a year would pay £11 10s. 6d.; a man with £100 a year, £7 13s.; and man with £75, £6; £50, £3 14s.; and £36, £2 16s. In the country districts they would find very few with an income of £150, and it was quite out of the question that without the assistance of Government the corps could be maintained in those places. He supported the movement on national grounds, but he also supported it because he believed that it would ultimately tend to economy in their Army Estimates.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I suppose it was inevitable that in the discussion on this Vote the question of the old Yeomanry Cavalry and that of the new Volunteers should have been mixed up; but taking those two subjects together has caused great inconvenience. With regard to the Volunteers, I think that as the matter had to be brought under the notice of the Committee, it could not have been brought before us more appropriately than by my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire, who has been so conspicuous for the zeal, energy, and ability which he has shown in connection with this new force. No man can deny that this Volunteer movement has been a most magnificent, national movement, and that it has been carried on with a spirit of patriotism which is most honourable to the country; and I believe that if occasion should require it—if an emergency should arise—we should see that force amount to double or treble the number who now surround their standards. If it be in the power of the Government to encourage this movement and give it permanency by conceding such a proposal as my noble Friend has suggested, I think they would act well in doing so. With respect to the other subject of this discussion, it is not my intention to follow the hon. Member for Bristol in that annual exhibition—his field-day he might call it—by which he seeks to amuse himself and the House on this topic. I must leave his views to be dealt with by Her Majesty's Government, for if those views go to anything at all, they go to doing away with the old Yeomanry force. I wish, however, to say a few words on the Report of the Committee; and I think I may speak more freely on it than any other Yeomanry officer who has addressed the Committee, for I have not the honour to command the regiment with which I am connected. I have heard the views of many officers in respect to this Report, and I believe I am justified in saying that the gentlemen connected with Yeomanry regiments regard it with unanimous disapprobation. I believe that the Committee were actuated by good intentions, but that they made a great mistake. I look upon the recommendations as of a most paltry and unworthy character; and I earnestly hope that the Government will not adopt them. I could very well understand the Government saying that the new Volunteer force would supersede the Yeomanry—I could understand their saying that whatever the Yeomanry might have been in past times they were no longer required. If that be the view of Government let them say so plainly, and let them part on honourable terms with a force which has existed for so many years and done good service. On the other hand, if they intend to maintain the Yeomanry, let me entreat of them not to take a course which, as a pecuniary saving, it is not worth their while to adopt, but which cannot be received otherwise than as an offence by those whom it will affect. I regret the Report of the Committee, and I hope it will not be acted upon by the Government.

MR. T. G. BARING said, the House and the country could not but regard it as a novel thing that there should have been three or four hours' discussion of a question with hardly any difference of opinion. No man was better entitled than his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire to bring this subject before the House, and he had done so with a correct appreciation of the interests of the force which he so worthily represented, with an eloquence which he could not attempt to imitate, while the moderation with which he had stated his views entitled him to the thanks of the Committee. The Committee were aware that Her Majesty's Government had shown their sense of the value of the Volunteer force on every occasion on which they had had an opportunity of doing so, and he was glad to say that, in the whole course of this discussion, not one word had been uttered savouring of jealousy between the Volunteers and the regular military force of the country. He could fully corroborate what had been said by his noble Friend with reference to the desire of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to render every assistance which personally he could give to the Volunteer force, and it was well known to the Committee that His Royal Highness had, on every occasion on which an opportunity occurred, exerted himself to improve and extend their efficiency. The position in which he (Mr. Baring) stood that night was a new one—he had rather to defend the smallness of the Vote than its largeness. But the sum of £42,000 in the Vote was very far from being the actual cost of the Volunteer force—it only went to pay the adjutants. There was for the pay of the staff for the inspection of Volunteers and other establishment expenses a sum of £9,000. There was a sum of £2,000 for Volunteer batteries; there was in addition to these sums an expense for ammunition of £64,000: so that in the Estimates of this year there was an actual charge of £117,000 on account of the Volunteer force. In addition to that there were a large number of rifles in the hands of the Volunteers—and in the opinion of the Government there was no place where the reserve of rifles could be better placed, though certainly they would not last so long as if they had been kept in the Tower store. About one-twelfth of their cost was calculated for the tear and wear of the arms this amounted to £43,000 so that the actual expense of the Volunteer force could not be put at less than £160,000 for the current year. There would next year be about £20,000 more, for there were many new corps entitled to adjutants who had not yet received them. The Government did not think the sum proposed for the Volunteer corps too much. On the contrary, they thought that a still larger expenditure might, if necessary, with propriety be devoted towards the maintenance of a force so valuable. The Committee would see, however, that the amount of £1 a head, which the noble Lord proposed to give to each Volunteer, had already been more than equalled by the proposal of the Government; but the real question was how far the present amount of payment was sufficient to maintain the force. The only part of the speech of his noble Friend which he disagreed with was that in which he rather shadowed forth than distinctly proposed that a money allowance should be given to the Volunteers. He did not understand his noble Friend to stand by that proposition. He agreed with those hon. Members who had stated that there were strong reasons why assistance given in kind should be of more advantage to the force than money allowances. His noble Friend argued that, as assistance was already given to the Volunteers, they should not, by increasing that assistance, change the nature of the force. That was true; but, if they were to give a money allowance instead of giving assistance only in kind, that would be such a change as might have an injurious effect on the feelings of independence of the Volunteers, while it might also lead foreign nations to the inference that the force was not, after all, the offspring of patriotism, but was called forth by the payment of money. Therefore the Government were of opinion that it would not be desirable to hold out any expectation of money allowances being given in aid of their expenses. He thought his noble Friend had stated most correctly the objects for which the country might properly incur expense. With respect to ranges, however, there was a strong objection to Government interference. He was certain that if the Government had agreed to provide ranges for the force they would have had to pay ten times the price that was now paid for them. But the instruction of the corps in drill was by far the most important matter, and should, he submitted, be the first object of Government. The Government had had this subject under their consideration, and he hoped that something further would be done in the course of this year towards the promotion of that end, either by the course which had been suggested that evening of employing non-commissioned officers for that purpose—not detaching them from their regiments, but allowing them to be sent back or by some other mode that might be devised. If the course to which he had just referred could be carried out, it would be done at little cost to the country, and greatly to the advantage of the Rifle corps. He would now say, with regard to the permanence of the Volunteer movement, that he saw no symptoms of a falling off. His noble Friend computed the number at 147,000; and while this was a great increase upon the number of last year, hardly a day passed without some applications at the War Office for the recognition of new corps. The Volunteer movement was based mainly, on the patriotism of the people; but he believed that the rifle shooting was one of the surest elements of its permanence; and the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had done the greatest possible benefit to the movement by the part he had taken in the formation of the National Rifle Association, and in the organization of the summer shooting matches at Wimbledon. There were great differences between the numerous corps throughout the country, as to their financial condition. Some were badly organized at first, no subscriptions for members being required, and in others the members did not pay their subscriptions regularly. A few of such corps might not be able to maintain their position; but looking broadly at the whole force, and believing that £2 a head—£1 for clothing, and £1 for other expenses—was amply sufficient to keep up a corps, he did not apprehend that many corps would fail for want of the requisite support; indeed, he gathered, from a Return which had been communicated to him by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, that the average necessary expenses of a Volunteer were about 15s. over the whole country. In Middlesex the average subscription was about £1, and in many other counties it was quite sufficient, added to the subscriptions of the honorary members, fees upon commissions, and other receipts, to defray the charge of the corps. He had no fear, therefore, that the movement would not be permanent. In answer to the remark of the hon. Member for Dundee (Sir John Ogilvy) he would say the Government were not prepared at present to establish a school for musketry instruction in Scotland; but one was about to be opened at Flectwood, which would be a more convenient locality for Scotch Volunteers than Hythe. He would now address himself to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol—although he thought he might very well leave him in the hands of the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir William Miles), who had pretty clearly shown that his hon. Friend was less acquainted with the details of the Yeomanry force than with those of Parliamentary corruption. He (Mr. Baring) thought it obvious that if the Yeomanry were not occasionally to be called out for permanent duty they had better be given up altogether, and the Motion of the hon. Gentleman would take away the money required to pay the expense of the permanent duty. He could not, therefore, agree with the Amendment. But neither could he agree with those Gentlemen who complained of the Report of the Committee that had lately recommended a reduction in the expenditure for the Yeomanry. Some hon. Gentlemen said that the reduction was too trifling to be worth the making; but he could not agree that a saving of £13,000 a year was a trifling affair. The only question was whether this reduction could be made without detriment to their efficiency? But he could not believe that Lord Eversley, Lord Aylesbury, and his hon. Friend the Member for Kent (Mr. Deedes), who commanded Yeomanry corps second to none in the kingdom for efficiency, could have recommended any reductions that would injure the efficiency of the force. The hon. Baronet the Member for Somersetshire (Sir William Miles), who commanded a corps that was a model for its numbers and spirit, admitted that the contingent expenses might be reduced from 30s. to £1 per man without detriment. This would give for his regiment £400 per annum. From that he would reduce £77 as expended on objects that might he thought be spared; and, if that were done, the hon. Baronet's proposal would give the regiment which he commanded £323, while the Report of the Committee proposed to allow £328. So that he hoped the hon. Baronet would be able to keep up the efficiency of his regiment upon the reduced allowance without any difficulty. It was proposed that the officers should receive only the pay of privates. For his own part, as a Yeomanry officer, he should have preferred receiving no pay at all; but the reason why the Committee had made that recommendation was that if the officers had been asked to give their services for nothing, many of the men would have followed their example, and as others could not have afforded to do so, the result would have been the introduction of a class feeling which could not have failed to prove most detrimental to the interests of the force. The Government regarded the Yeomanry as a body of Volunteer Cavalry, which might be of essential service in time of emergency. It was far from their wish or intention to diminish the efficiency of the force; but they had no fear that such would be the result of the reductions recommended by the Committee. He trusted, therefore, that while the Committee sympathized with the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire in the statement which he had made with respect to the increased efficiency of the Volunteer force, they would not at the same time take a course which would tend to create a rivalry—which he should be sorry to see exist—between that force and the Yeomanry, by making a deduction from the allowances given to the latter.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had generally been opposed to the Government in his desire to reduce the Estimates, but in this case he must urge on the Government to agree to the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire. He fully concurred in the eulogiums that had been passed on the Volunteer movement. That force, it appeared, consisted of 150,000, while the regular army only amounted to 146,000. Yet upon this latter force we spent £15,000,000; though it was stated by Colonel M'Murdo that there were many of the regiments of Volunteers that were fully equal to the troops of the Line. He hoped, therefore, the Government would not hesitate to agree to the proposition of the noble Lord; and if they had any difficulty in procuring the

MAJOR EDWARDS wished to say one word with respect to the proposed reduction of the money voted to the Yeomanry. There was a meeting of sixteen field officers held on the subject the other day, and they were all of opinion that the reduction in the Vote was unjust and undesirable. Another meeting had since been called of all the officers of the Yeomanry that could be got together, to discuss the question, and he hoped that this Vote would not be reduced until their mind was known.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY thought that the speech of the Under Secretary for War would afford considerable satisfaction to a large number of Volunteers. It was a mistake, he added, to suppose that the members of that force—at least, so far as he was aware—wished to have aid given them in the shape of a Vote of money; while, if assistance were rendered them in kind, considerable service might be done.

CAPTAIN JERVIS was sorry to hear invidious distinctions made between the Yeomanry and Volunteers. They were both admirable bodies of men. The Yeomanry, he considered, was the finest Volunteer Cavalry in the world. But he wished to point out this distinction between the Yeomanry and the Volunteers. The Yeomanry were liable to be called out at any time by the civil authorities, while the latter were responsible as to the Secretary for War, and could be called out only in case of invasion. This, he thought, justified the difference in the expenditure in their favour.

MR. WYLD remarked that the services of drill sergeants could be obtained in London for 18s. per week, and in the provinces at 25s.

MR. PEACOCKE observed that the Volunteers in the county with which he had the honour to be connected (Essex) would prefer having assistance afforded them in kind rather than by a Vote of money. The force experienced great difficulty in procuring sergeants, and the consequence was that there was not among the several corps that uniformity of drill which it was desirable should prevail, and which would prevail if sergeants were duly furnished by the Government.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that a short time ago a very successful review was held at Brighton; and that was one of a number of facts which led him to believe that it would be better to leave the Volunteer force to manage their own affairs.

LORD ELCHO said, that while he admitted that the review at Brighton was a great success, he thought he was correctly representing the feeling of the large majority of the Volunteer corps when he stated that it was on the whole better that manœuvres on an extensive scale, such as were there executed, should be regulated and controlled by proper military authorities. He felt extremely grateful, he might add, to his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War for the reception which he had given to the remarks which he had felt it to be his duty to make that evening as well as for the zeal which he manifested in the Volunteer cause. He thought that it might be collected that the Government intended to give to the Volunteers drill sergeants, and he hoped that they would be in sufficient in number and of the best description. There were undoubtedly other causes of expense, such as practice ranges and the custody of arms, and he trusted the Government would consider whether they could not take those burdens from the Volunteers too. He was sorry to find that the hon. Member for Bristol was disposed to act on the principle of robbing Peter to pay Paul. For his own part he believed the Yeomanry Cavalry to be a most valuable force, and if they could possibly be amalgamated with the Volunteers they might act as Mounted Rifles.

MR. H. BERKELEY having intimated that he would not press his Amendment to a division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £158,185, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Fortifications at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862, inclusive.”

SIR FREDERIC SMITH asked for some explanation with respect to an item of £4,000 in the Vote for the purchase of land at Alderney. It appeared that £30,000 had been already voted on that account, while only £25,000 had as yet been expended. Under those circumstances he did not see how a further sum could be required for that purpose.

MR. CHILDERS said, he should be glad to receive some explanation of the item for the improvement of the defences of the Mauritius. He believed it to be necessary to complete the defences of Fort

George, but there was a plan on foot for carrying out enormous defences on land, which would involve a complete waste of money. He trusted the sum now asked for had nothing to do with that general scheme. With regard to the Ionian Islands, the improvement of the defences was estimated to cost £50,000, and he feared that some general system of fortifying the Ionian Islands was contemplated. In the present state of the navy he did not see the necessity of throwing away this sum, which would not render those Islands impregnable against an attack from France, for instance. With respect to Gibraltar, there had been every successive year Votes for improving the fortifications. Unless satisfactory explanations were given, he should move to reduce the vote for the Ionian Islands, the Mauritius, and Gibraltar.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said that by a memorandum in the account of the receipt and expenditure for Army and Militia services in 1859-60, it appeared that certain sums had been received from various Colonies in aid of the Military expenditure. There had been received from the Ionian Islands, on account of staff expenditure and fortifications, the sum of £49,000; from Malta, £12,400; from Ceylon, £47,954, &c. Could the Under Secretary for War state on what principle these payments had been made; whether these colonies undertook to pay the whole of the staff expenditure and half the amount of the fortifications; and whether the Colonies would undertake to pay the same proportion of the increased expenditure now going on?

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked whether the proposed expenditure of £4,000 for Alderney was in addition to the former grant of £1,000,000, and how it happened that the marginal note referred, not to Alderney, but to Guernsey? He also asked what was meant by £2,000 for Volunteer batteries? Further, he called attention to the item of £5,000 for Malta.

MR. CONINGHAM called attention to the Vote of £3,000 for Gibraltar. He believed that this expenditure which the Government had embarked upon was one of the most extravagant possible, and ought to be arrested.

LORD HOTHAM wished to make an inquiry relative to the item of £40,000 for the defences in the Humber. He never had stated, and never would state, the reasons why these works were necessary, but they were perfectly well known in the locality and also to the Government. The necessity for something being done had never been denied. The Secretary of State for War told him last Session he need take no further trouble, and that a Vote would be taken. Ground was purchased, and everything indicated a commencement of the works. It had, however, come to his knowledge that an alteration had taken place in the intentions of the Secretary of State. Could the hon. Gentleman state what that change was, and for what reason it had been come to?

MR. T. G. BARING said, he was not aware of any change in the intentions of his noble Friend, the Secretary for War, but he had had no special communication with him on the subject. Land had been purchased, and it was proposed to commence a battery near Hull. The money would be taken in the Vote for commercial harbours. In answer to the noble Lord (Lord W. Graham) he had to state that the sum received from the Ionian Islands had been paid into the Exchequer, and could not be applied in diminution of the Vote. With regard to the Gibraltar fortifications the sum asked for was increased in consequence of less convict labour having been available than had been contemplated. The Vote for the Ionian Islands was to complete certain works of defence on the land side; but it was not intended to enter upon any new scheme of fortifications there this year, and if any such extended scheme were brought forward the House would have the opportunity of deciding upon it in the Estimates of next year. The Vote for the Mauritius was to be spent in continuing the fortifications of Fort George. By agreeing to these Votes for the Ionian Islands and the Mauritius the House would not be committed to any extended plans of fortifications. It was the opinion of Government that the less spent in fortifying distant dependencies the better; and that the best defence of our distant colonies and possessions was the British Navy. With regard to the Vote at Alderney, the sum had nothing to do with the naval works there, but was for the purchase of land necessary in order to unite the works already completed; and if the present Vote were agreed to, he believed that £2,000 would complete the whole sum required at Alderney. As to the plans at Harwich and Newhaven, it had not been the custom to lay the plans for military works before the House, but they had been carefully considered.

Lord Hotham

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the Estimate of the proposed expenditure at the Ionian Islands was £50,000, of which £5,000 was asked in the present year, leaving £45,000 to be voted. Now, he thought the House of Commons would utterly object to such an expenditure upon the Ionian Islands. These Islands were kept as a political necessity, but they did not add to the military strength of the country. On the contrary, they were rather a cause of weakness, inasmuch as they caused our force to be distributed.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he believed the works at Alderney to be a mistake from first to last, and he should, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by £4,000, being the sum proposed to be spent there.

MR. LIDDELL asked whether Alderney was to be considered as a defensive position or a harbour of refuge? If it was a military position, what was it intended to defend? If it was intended as an harbour of refuge he was prepared to show that it would be utterly useless. It was really a barren rock, which nature had provided with the best defence; but the Government had erected works of defence, and now there were to be new works to defend those previously constructed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the answer to this was a very short one. Alderney was not a harbour of refuge. It was a military post connected with the defence of the Channel, and a post considered of the utmost importance by the best military authorities. The Duke of Wellington, who was somewhat of a judge of war, laid great stress on the fortification of Alderney, which, in connection with Portland, would be a station of the utmost importance with a view to the defence of the Channel.

MR. GREGORY reminded the noble Lord that, in the Duke of Wellington's time, the present improvements in maritime war were unknown. In his opinion, Alderney was a source of positive weakness to us. In order properly to defend it, a numerous garrison was necessary, and when in France this very year, a French officer, in speaking to him upon this subject, said, "It will be impossible for you to place a sufficient number of men there to protect it against us; but we can afford a sufficient number to enable us to hold it, and, therefore, every penny you are spending there is spent for our benefit, and not for your own." It was notoriously the opinion of every officer who commanded a ship of war that it would be better to throw the money into the sea than continue this expenditure. The expenditure was not merely useless, but positively detrimental. The harbour was nothing better than a shell trap, for an enemy's vessel might anchor outside and shell every vessel taking refuge there.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that so far from the improvements in navigation diminishing the value of Alderney they very much increased it. So long as vessels were impelled by sails, communication with Alderney might be difficult; but the application of steam rendered Alderney much more valuable, both as a work of defence, and as a place from which to watch Cherbourg, and as a means of communicating with our side of the water. If the House was to adopt the principle laid down by the hon. Member and go to French officers of the army and navy for their judgment of the value of our defences, it would, no doubt, be very easy to demonstrate that it was ridiculous for England to keep up her army, that we were throwing away money in maintaining a navy, and that, as to fortifying Portsmouth and Plymouth, it was the most childish thing in the world; in fact, that it would be much better to trust to the forbearance of our enemies, to leave everything at their mercy and discretion, and thus save our money.

COLONEL NORTH said, that if it was the opinion of the Commission, of which Sir John Burgoyne was the head, that Alderney should be fortified, there could be no further question about it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON pointed out that the question now was not whether Alderney should be fortified, as all the fortifications were complete, but whether we should buy a piece of ground lying close to the fortifications, which it was necessary to keep clear of buildings, in order that they might perform their purpose?

MR. CONINGHAM said, that when he crossed over to Cherbourg with the late Sir Charles Napier, that great naval authority ridiculed the idea of Alderney being useful as a post of observation on the French harbour.

MR. JACKSON said, he crossed over at the same time, and he asked the gallant Admiral whether, if the French fleet were in Cherbourg, they could be kept there? His answer was, "Without a doubt."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that if the French had possession of the Channel for twenty-four hours we should lose not only Alderney, but all the Channel Islands, and whatever garrisons we might have placed in them.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £4,000, for the Purchase of Land in Alderney, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 128: Majority 93.

Original Question again put,

MR. CHILDERS thought the answer of the Under Secretary as to the item for the fortification of the Ionian Islands was not satisfactory. If only £5,000 were required, they ought to know why £50,000 was put as the total estimate in the first column. The Government seemed to have changed their mind as to the whole work. He moved that the Vote be reduced by this £5,000.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to remind the Committee that the Ionian Islands were not a colony, but a State that was placed under our protection upon certain conditions. Now, according to the principle laid down by the Foreign Secretary, that the majority of a people had a perfect right to claim their independence, the Ionians ought to be annexed to Greece, as they had expressed their desire for annexation. If, then, they were allowed to follow up the noble Lords' principle, these fortifications would be turned against ourselves.

COLONEL DUNNE said, if the people of those Islands wished to separate from us, and if we wished to keep them, the sooner those fortifications were completed the better. The fortifications there belonged to us, although the people might not. Unless the Government finished those fortifications there all the money we had laid out on them would be thrown away.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he had the authority of Lord Herbert for assuring the Committee that by assenting to this Vote of £5,000 they would not pledge themselves in any way to the £50,000 which appeared in the first column of the Estimates. It would not be expended in any new works, but simply in repairing works to make the town safe against a coup de main on the land side.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that before Lord Seymour's Committee a few years ago it was stated that if those fortifications had never been begun we should have practically been in a better position, as we had the command of the sea. Did the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary mean that this £5,000 was not part of the £50,000?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the £5,000 had nothing to do with the £50,000.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH asked why the £50,000 was placed in the first column at all?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked why in another column it was stated that after this Vote £45,000 would be required to complete the works?

CAPTAIN JERVIS could state of his own knowledge that this Vote was absolutely necessary to complete the fortifications. Whether the Ionian Islands should be held as a military post was a very different question, and should be discussed at another time.

COLONEL DICKSON pointed out that £50,000 was stated in the Estimates as the total cost of the works.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON understood that the £5,000 now asked for was required for the restoration of certain works now in existence, and that the rest of the £50,000 was intended for fortifications as to the construction of which the House would have a future opportunity of deciding. On that understanding he would agree to the Vote.

MR. T. G. BARING confirmed the statement of the hon. Baronet, and repeated that the £5,000 had nothing to do with the £50,000.

MR. MONSELL hoped the Under Secretary would inform them what the definite object was which was to be accomplished for the £50,000. The destruction of the fortifications at Corfu had interfered with the drainage, and caused much pestilence and misery to the people.

CAPTAIN JERVIS explained that a certain part of the fortifications were pulled down in order that they might be held by a smaller body of men, and denied that the operation had been attended with any unhealthiness to the inhabitants.

COLONEL DUNNE believed that the £5,000 was to be applied to the encircling of the principal work, and that the £50,000 was required for the erection of a lunette or covering fort.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £5,000, for the Improvement of Defences in the Ionian Islands, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 92; Majority 33.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Third Reading read, and discharged.

Bill re-committed in respect of Clause 15.

House in Committee.

MR. HEYGATE complained of the injurious operation of the right hon. Gentleman's legislation on his (Mr. Heygate's) constituents. Continually renewed, and changed from year to year for two or three years past, it threw trade and business into uncertainty and confusion.

Clause 15 (Imposing a penalty on persons signing any agreement for the hire of a furnished house).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the addition to Clause 15 of the following proviso:—

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed to render any person liable to any penalty for or on account of any letters or correspondence by post, containing the terms or conditions offered or accepted for the taking or letting of any furnished house."

MR. CRAUFURD thought the words did not meet the difficulty, as they only exempted persons from the liability of the penalty on account of letters and correspondence sent by post. The penalty was incurred for omitting to use the stamp on all memoranda of agreements.

MR. HENNESSY thought the proviso did not meet an objection which he had previously stated. The clause enacted that where the adhesive stamp was not cancelled all who signed the instrument and those who prepared it were liable to a penalty of £20. By a previous section the stamp must be cancelled by both parties, so that if one party alone cancelled it, and the other also signed the agreement, all parties were liable to the penalty.

MR. AYRTON hoped that the proviso as to sending letters by post would be amended. It was at present as preposterous a piece of legislation as ever was submitted. If a person sent a letter by post it was to be recognized; but if it was sent by a footman the sender would be liable to a penalty. The law at present as to agreements was satisfactorily established, and he hoped the clause would not be insisted upon.
